

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

INTRODUCTION TO THE GOSPELS AND ACTS.

THE GOSPEL ACCORDING TO S. MATTHEW.

Author of this Gospel was a publican or tax-gatherer, residing at Capernaum, on the western shore of the sea of Galilee. As to his identity with the "Levi" of the Second and Third Gospels, and other particulars, see on Matthew. Hardly anything is known of his apostolic labours. That, after preaching to his countrymen in Palestine, he went East, is the general testimony of antiquity; but the precise scene or scenes of his ministry cannot be determined. He died a natural death, may be concluded from the belief of the best-informed of the Fathers—that of the apostles James the greater, Peter, and Paul, suffered martyrdom. That the first Gospel was written by this apostle is testimony of all antiquity.

As to the date of this Gospel we have only internal evidence, and that far from decisive. Accordingly, opinion is much divided. That it was the first issued of all the Gospels was universally believed. Hence, although in the order of the MSS., those by the two apostles were placed first in the oldest MSS. of the Old Latin version, while in all the Greek with scarcely an exception, the order is the same as in our Bibles, the Gospel according to Matthew is in every case first. And as this Gospel is of all the four the one which bears the most evident marks of having been prepared and edited with a special view to the Jews—who certainly first required a written Gospel, and would be the first to make it—there can be no doubt that it was issued before any of the others. That it was written before the destruction of Jerusalem is equally certain; for, as Hug observes (Introduction to the New Testament, p. 216, Fosdick's translation), when our Lord's prophecy of that awful event, on coming to the warning about "the abomination of desolation" they should "see standing in the holy place," he interprets (contrary to his invariable practice, which is to refer it to a call to his readers to read intelligently—"Whoso readeth, let him understand" (Matthew, 24. 15)—a call to the divine signal for flight which could be intended only for those who lived before the event. But how long that event this Gospel was written is not so clear. Some internal evidences seem to imply a very early date. Since Jewish Christians were, for five or six years, exposed to persecution from their own countrymen—until the Jews, being vexed by the Romans, had to look to themselves—it is not likely (it is argued) that they should be left so long without a written Gospel to reassure and sustain them, and Matthew's Gospel was eminently fitted for that purpose. But the to which Luke refers in his Introduction (see on Luke, 1. 1-4) would be sufficient for a time, especially as the living of the "eye-witnesses and ministers of the word" was yet sounding abroad. Other considerations in favour of a very late date—such as the tender way in which the author seems studiously to speak of Herod Antipas, as if still reigning, a writing of Pilate apparently as if still in power—seem to have no foundation in fact, and cannot therefore be ground of reasoning as to the date of this Gospel. Its Hebrew structure and hue, though they prove, as we think, the Gospel must have been published at a period considerably anterior to the destruction of Jerusalem, are no evidence in favour of so early a date as A.D. 37 or 38—according to some of the Fathers, and, of the moderns, Tillmann, &c. Ouse, Birks, Trepelles. On the other hand, the date suggested by the statement of Irenæus (3. 1), that Matthew wrote his Gospel while Peter and Paul were at Rome preaching and founding the Church—or after A.D. 60—though by the majority of critics are in favour of it, would seem rather too late, especially as the Second and Third Gospels, were doubtless published, as well as this one, before the destruction of Jerusalem, had still to be issued. Certainly, statements as the following, "Wherefore that field is called the field of blood unto this day;" "And this saying is only reported among the Jews unto this day!" (Matthew, 27. 8, and 28. 16), bespeak a date considerably later than the recorded. We incline, therefore, to a date intermediate between the earlier and the later dates assigned to this Gospel, & pretending to greater precision.

We have adverted to the strikingly Jewish character and colouring of this Gospel. The facts which it selects, the to which it gives prominence, the cast of thought and phraseology—all bespeak the Jewish point of view from which it was written and to which it was directed. This has been noticed from the beginning, and is universally acknowledged.

It is of the greatest consequence to the right interpretation of it; but the tendency among some even of the best Germans to infer, from this special design of the First Gospel, a certain laxity on the part of the Evangelist in the statement of his facts must be guarded against.

By far the most interesting and important point connected with this Gospel is the language in which it is written. It is believed by a formidable number of critics that this Gospel was originally written in what is loosely called Aramaic, but more correctly Aramaic, or Syro-Chaldaic, the native tongue of the country at the time of our Lord; and that the Greek Matthew which we now possess is a translation of that work, either by the Evangelist himself or some unknown translator. The evidence on which this opinion is grounded is wholly external. But it has been deemed conclusive by Grotius, &c. (and his translator) Marsh, Townson, Campbell, Olshausen, Græsvell, Meyer, Erard, Lange, Davidson, Grelot, &c. Weister and Wilkinson, &c. The evidence referred to cannot be given here, but will be found, with remarks on satisfactory character, in the Introduction to the Gospels prefixed to our larger Commentary, pp. xxviii-xxxii.

How stand the facts as to our Greek Gospel? We have not a tittle of historical evidence that it is a translation by Matthew himself or any one else. All antiquity refers to it as the work of Matthew the publican and apostle. The other Gospels are ascribed to their respective authors. This Greek Gospel was from the first received by the Church as an integral part of the one Quadriform Gospel. And while the Fathers often advert to the two Gospels which we now possess as apostles, and the two which we have from men not apostles—in order to show that as that of Mark leans so much on Peter, and that of Luke on Paul, these are really no less apostolical than the other two—though we attach less value to this circumstance than they did, we cannot but think it striking that, in thus speaking, they never drop a hint as to the apostolic authority of the Greek Matthew had ever been questioned on the ground of its not being the original.

INTRODUCTION TO THE GOSPELS AND ACTS.

Further, not a trace can be discovered in this Gospel itself of its being a Translation. Michaels tried to detect, and fancied that he had succeeded in detecting, one or two such. Other Germans since, and Davidson and Cureton among ourselves, have made the same attempt. But the entire failure of all such attempts is now generally admitted, and candid advocates of a Hebrew original are quite ready to own that none such are to be found, and that but for external testimony no one would have imagined that the Greek was not the original. This they regard as showing how perfectly the translation has been executed; but those who know best what translating from one language into another is, will be the readiest to own that this is tantamount to giving up the question. This Gospel proclaims its own originality in a number of striking points; such as its manner of quoting from the Old Testament, and its phraseology in some peculiar cases. But the close verbal coincidences of our Greek Matthew with the next two Gospels must not be quite passed over. There are but two possible ways of explaining this. Either the translator, sacrificing verbal fidelity in his Version, intentionally conformed certain parts of his author's work to the Second and Third Gospels—in which case it can hardly be called Matthew's Gospel at all—or our Greek Matthew is itself the original.

Moved by these considerations, some advocates of a Hebrew original have adopted the theory of a double original; the external testimony, they think, requiring us to believe in a Hebrew original, while internal evidence is decisive in favour of the originality of the Greek. This theory is espoused by Guericke, Olshausen, Thiersch, Townson, Trapelles, &c. But, besides that this looks too like an artificial theory, invented to solve a difficulty, it is utterly void of historical support. There is not a vestige of testimony to support it in Christian antiquity. This ought to be decisive against it.

It remains, then, that our Greek Matthew is the original of that Gospel, and that no other original ever existed. It is greatly to the credit of Dean Alford, that after maintaining, in the first edition of his 'Greek Testament' the theory of a Hebrew original, he thus expresses himself in the second and subsequent editions: 'On the whole, then, I find myself constrained to abandon the view maintained in my first edition, and to adopt that of a Greek original.'

One argument has been adduced on the other side, on which not a little reliance has been placed; but the determination of the main question does not, in our opinion, depend upon the point which it raises. It has been very confidently affirmed that the Greek language was not sufficiently understood by the Jews of Palestine, when Matthew published his Gospel, to make it at all probable that he would write a Gospel, for their benefit in the first instance, in that language. Now, as this merely alleges the improbability of a Greek original, it is enough to place against it the evidence already adduced, which is positive, in favour of the sole originality of our Greek Matthew. It is indeed a question how far the Greek language was understood in Palestine at the time referred to. But we advise the reader not to be drawn into that question as essential to the settlement of the other one. It is an element in it, no doubt, but not an essential element. There are extremes on both sides of it. The old idea, that our Lord hardly ever spoke anything but Syro-Chaldae, is now pretty nearly exploded. Many, however, will not go the length, on the other side, of Hug (in his Introduction, pp. 226, &c.) and Roberts' Discussions, &c., pp. 25, &c.). For ourselves, though we believe that our Lord, in all the more public scenes of His ministry, spoke in Greek, all we think it necessary here to say is, that there is no ground to believe that Greek was so little understood in Palestine as to make it improbable that Matthew would write his Gospel exclusively in that language--

he was the same person with the John Mark of the Gospels.' But Grotius thought differently, and so did Schleiermacher, Ussell, Burton, and de Costa; and the grounds on which it is concluded that they were two different persons appear a quite unanswerable. 'Of John, surnamed Mark,' says Campbell, in his Preface to this Gospel, 'one of the first things worth is, that he attended Paul and Barnabas in their apostolical journeys, when these two travelled together (Acts, 15; 18, 21). And when afterwards there arose a dispute between them concerning him, inasmuch that they separated, he accompanied his uncle Barnabas, and Silas attended Paul. When Paul was reconciled to Mark, which was probably a year after, we find Paul again employing Mark's assistance, recommending him, and giving him a very honourable testimony (Colossians, 4. 10; 2 Timothy, 4. 11; Philomon, 24). But we hear not a syllable of his attending Peter as his minister, assisting him in any capacity; and yet, as we shall presently see, no tradition is more ancient, more uniform, and better sustained by internal evidence, than that Mark in his Gospel, was but 'the interpreter of Peter,' who, at the close of his 2 Epistle, speaks of him as 'Marcus my son' (1 Peter, 5. 13), that is, without doubt, his son in the Gospel—converted to this through his instrumentality. And when we consider how little the Apostles Peter and Paul were together—how soon they even met—how different were their tendencies, and how separate their spheres of labour, is there not, in the sense of all evidence of the fact, something approaching to violence in the supposition that the same Mark was the intimate associate of both? 'In brief,' adds Campbell, 'the accounts given of Paul's attendant, and those of Peter's interpreter, concur in nothing but the name, Mark or Marcus; too slight a circumstance to conclude the sameness of the man from, especially when we consider how common the name was at Rome, and how customary it was for the Jews in that age to assume some Roman name when they went thither.'

Regarding the Evangelist Mark, then, as another person from Paul's companion in travel, all we know of his personal history is that he was a convert, as we have seen, of the apostle Peter. But as to his Gospel, the tradition regarding Peter's aid in it is so ancient, so uniform, and so remarkably confirmed by internal evidence, that we must regard it as an established fact. 'Mark,' says Facius (according to the testimony of Eusebius, Eccelesiastical History, 3. 39) 'becoming the interpreter of Peter, wrote accurately, though not in order, whatever he remembered of what was either said or done by Christ; he was neither a hearer of the Lord nor a follower of Him, but afterwards, as I said (he was a follower), of Peter, who copied the discourses for use, but not according to the order in which they were uttered by the Lord.' To the same effect Irenæus (adv. Hæreses, 3. 1); 'Matthew published a Gospel while Peter and Paul were preaching and founding a Church at Rome; and after their departure (or decease), Mark, the disciple and interpreter of Peter, he also gave forth as in writing the things which were preached by Peter.' And Clement of Alexandria is still more specific, in a passage served to us by Eusebius (Eccelesiastical History, 6. 14): 'Peter, having publicly preached the word at Rome, and spoken to the Gospel by the Spirit, many of those present exhorted Mark, as having long been a follower of his, and remembering what he had said, to write what had been spoken; and that having prepared the Gospel, he delivered it to those who desired him for it; which, when Peter came to the knowledge of, he neither decidedly forbade nor encouraged him.' Origen's own testimony, however, from other accounts, is rather different: that Peter's hearers were so penetrated by preaching that they gave Mark, as being a follower of Peter, no rest till he consented to write his Gospel, as a memoir of his oral teaching; and 'that the apostle, when he knew by the revelation of the Spirit what had been done, was agrieved with the zeal of those men, and sanctioned the reading of the writing (that is, of this Gospel of Mark) in the church' (Eccelesiastical History, 2. 18). And giving in another of his works a similar statement, he says that 'Peter, from a sense of humility, did not think himself qualified to write the Gospel; but Mark, his acquaintance and pupil, is said to have recorded his relations of the actions of Jesus. And Peter testifies these things of himself; for all things that are written by Mark are said to be memoirs of Peter's discourses.' It is needless to go further—to Origen, who says Mark composed his Gospel 'as Peter guided' or 'directed him, who, in his Catholic Epistle, calls him his son,' &c.; and to Jerome, who but echoes Eusebius.

This, certainly, is a remarkable chain of testimony; which, confirmed as it is by such striking internal evidence, may be regarded as establishing the fact that the Second Gospel was drawn up mostly from materials furnished by Peter. In Costa's 'Four Witnesses' the reader will find this internal evidence detailed at length, though all the examples are not equally convincing. But if the reader will refer to our remarks on Mark, 16. 7, and John, 18. 27, he will have convincing evidence of a Petrine hand in this Gospel.

It remains only to advert, in a word or two, to the readers for whom this Gospel was, in the first instance, designed, the date of it. That it was not for Jews but Gentiles, is evident from the great number of explanations of Jewish customs, opinions, and places, which to a Jew would at that time have been superfluous, but were highly needful to a Gentile. We can here but refer to chs. 2. 18; 7. 3, 4; 12. 18; 13. 3; 14. 12; 15. 42, for examples of these. Regarding the date of this Gospel—about which nothing certain is known—if the tradition reported by Irenæus can be relied on, that it was written some, 'after the departure of Peter and Paul,' and if by that word 'departure' we are to understand their death, we date it somewhere between the years 64 and 69; but in all likelihood this is too late. It is probably nearer the truth to date it eight or ten years earlier.

THE GOSPEL ACCORDING TO S. LUKE.

THE writer of this Gospel is universally allowed to have been Lucas (an abbreviated form of Lucanus, as Silas of Thessalonians), though he is not expressly named either in the Gospel or in the Acts. From Colossians, 4. 14, we learn that he was a "physician;" and by comparing that verse with v. 10, 11—in which the apostle enumerates all those of the circumcision who were then with him, but does not mention Luke, though he immediately afterwards sends a salutation from us—we gather that Luke was not a born Jew. Some have thought he was a freed-man (libertinus), as the Romans valued the healing art on persons of this class and on their slaves, as an occupation beneath themselves. His intimate acquaintance with Jewish customs, and his facility in Hebraic Greek, seem to show that he was an early convert to the new Faith; and this is cursorily confirmed by Acts, 21. 27-29, where we find the Jews enraged at Paul's supposed introduction of Greeks into the temple, because they had seen "Trochimus the Ephesian" with him; and as we know that Luke was with Paul on that occasion, it would seem that they had taken him for a Jew, as they made no mention of him. On the other hand, his fluency in classical Greek confirms his Gentile origin. The time when he joined Paul's company is clearly indicated in the Acts by his changing (at ch. 16. 10) from the third person singular ("he") to the first person plural ("we"). From that time he hardly ever left the apostle till near the period of his martyrdom (2 Timothy, 4. 11). Eusebius makes him a native of Antioch. If so, he would have every advantage for cultivating the literature of Greece, and such medical knowledge as was then possessed. That he died a natural death is generally agreed among the ancients; Gregory Nazianzen alone affirming that he died a martyr.

The time and place of the publication of his Gospel are alike uncertain. But we can approximate to it. It must at any rate have been issued before the Acts, for there the 'Gospel' is expressly referred to as the same author's "former treatise" (Acts, 1. 1). Now the book of the Acts was not published for two whole years after Paul's arrival as a prisoner at Rome, for it concludes with a reference to this period; but probably it was published soon after that, which would appear to have been early in the year 63. Before that time, then, we have reason to believe that the Gospel of Luke was in circulation, though the majority of critics make it later. If we date it somewhere between A.D. 50 and 63, we shall probably be near the truth; but nearer it we cannot with any certainty come. Conjectures as to the place of publication are too uncertain to be mentioned here.

That it was addressed, in the first instance, to Gentile readers, is beyond doubt. This is no more, as Davidson remarks, ('Introduction,' p. 186), than was to have been expected from the companion of an 'apostle of the Gentiles,' who had witnessed marvellous changes in the condition of many heathens by the reception of the Gospel. But the explanations in his Gospel of things known to every Jew, and which could only be intended for Gentile readers, make this quite plain—see chs. 1. 26; 4. 31; 5. 26; 21. 37; 22. 1; 24. 13. A number of other minute particulars, both of things inserted and of things omitted, confirm the conclusion that it was Gentiles whom this Evangelist had in the first instance in view.

We have already adverted to the classical style of Greek which this Evangelist writes—just what might have been expected from an educated Greek and travelled physician. But we have also observed that along with this he shows a wonderful flexibility of style, so much so, that when he comes to relate transactions wholly Jewish, where the speakers and actors and incidents are all Jewish, he writes in such Jewish Greek as one would do who had never been out of Palestine, or mixed with any but Jews. In de Coena's 'Four Witnesses' will be found some traces of 'the beloved physician' in this Gospel. But far more striking and important are the traces in it of his intimate connexion with the apostle of the Gentiles. That one who was so long and so constantly in the society of that master-mind has in such a work as this shown no traces of that connexion, no stamp of that mind, is hardly to be believed. Writers of Introductions seem not to see it, and take no notice of it. But those who look into the interior of it will soon discover evidences enough in it of a Pauline cast of mind. Referring for a number of details to de Coena, we notice here only two examples. In 1 Corinthians, 11. 23, Paul ascribes to an express revelation from Christ Himself the account of the Institution of the Lord's Supper which he there gives. Now, if we find this account differing in small yet striking particulars from the accounts given by Matthew x of Jesus died before this, or went with John to Ephesus, where she died and was buried, is not agreed. One or otes of his later days have been handed down by tradition, one at least bearing marks of reasonable probability, not necessary to give them here. In the reign of Domitian (A.D. 81-96) he was banished to "the isle that is more" (a small rocky and then almost uninhabited island in the Egean sea), "for the word of God and for the of Jesus Christ" (Revelation, 1. 9). Irenæus and Eusebius say that this took place about the end of Domitian's at he was thrown into a cauldron of boiling oil, and miraculously delivered, is one of those legends which, though y Tertullian and Jerome, is entitled to no credit. His return from exile took place during the brief but tolerant erva; he died at Ephesus in the reign of Trajan (Eusebius, Ecclesiastical History, 3. 23), at an age above 90, to swim; according to others, 160; and even 126, according to others still. The intermediate number is generally as probably the nearest to the truth.

the date of this Gospel, the arguments for its having been composed before the destruction of Jerusalem (though by some superior critics) are of the slenderest nature: such as the expression in ch. 3. 2. "there is at Jerusalem, sep gaba, a pool," &c.; there being no allusion to Peter's martyrdom as having occurred according to the prediction 12—a thing too well known to require mention. That it was composed long after the destruction of Jerusalem, the demise of all the other apostles, is next to certain, though the precise time cannot be determined. Probably saw his banishment, however; and if we date it between the years 90 and 94, we shall probably be pretty near

The readers for whom it was more immediately designed, that they were Gentiles we might naturally presume nesses of the date; but the multitude of explanations of things familiar to every Jew puts this beyond all question. but was ever thrown upon the genuineness and authenticity of this Gospel till about the close of the last century, these embodied in any formal attack upon it till Bretschneider, in 1830, issued his famous treatise ('Probabilia,' conclusions of which he afterwards was candid enough to admit had been satisfactorily disproved. To advert could be as painful as unnecessary; consisting as they mostly do of assertions regarding the Discourses of our Lord in this Gospel which are revolting to every spiritual mind. The Tubingen school did their best, on their peculiar meaning, to galvanize into fresh life this theory of the post-Joannean date of the Fourth Gospel; and some Unittians in this country still cling to it. But to use the striking language of von Oestersee regarding similar speculahe Third Gospel, 'Behold, the feet of them that shall carry it out dead are already at the door' (Acts, 5. 21). Is mind of the least elevation of spiritual discernment that does not see in this Gospel marks of historical truth and ing glory such as none of the other Gospels possess, brightly as they too attest their own verity; and who will dy to say that if not historically true, and true just as it stands, it never could have been by mortal man com-conceived?

e peculiarities of this Gospel we note here only two. The one is its reflective character. While the others are writes, the Fourth Evangelist 'pauses, as it were, at every turn,' as de Costis says ('Four Witnesses,' p. 234), 'at no give a reason, at another to fix the attention, to deduce consequences, or make applications, or to give utterance gangs of praise.' See chs. 2. 20, 21, 22-25; 4. 1, 2; 7. 37-39; 11. 12, 13, 49-53; 21. 12, 19, 22, 23. The other peculiarity spel is its supplementary character. By this, in the present instance, we mean something more than the studi-tith which he omits many most important particulars in our Lord's history, for no conceivable reason but that already familiar as household words to all his readers, through the three preceding Gospels, and his substituting f these an immense quantity of the richest matter not found in the other Gospels. We refer here more particue authors of the additions which distinguish this Gospel; particularly the notices of the different passovers which luring our Lord's public ministry, and the record of His teaching at Jerusalem, without which it is not too much we could have had but a most imperfect conception either of the duration of His ministry or of the plan of it. er features of these additions is quite as noticeable and not less important. 'We find,' to use again the words to v. 228. 229. slightly abridged, 'only six of our Lord's miracles recorded in this Gospel, but these are all of

THE ACTS OF THE APOSTLES.

THIS book is to the Gospels what the fruit is to the tree that bears it. In the Gospels we see the corn of wheat falling into the ground and dying; in the Acts we see it bringing forth much fruit (John, 12. 24). There we see Christ purchasing the Church with His own blood: here we see the Church, so purchased, rising into actual existence; first among the Jews of Palestine, and next among the surrounding Gentiles, until it gains a footing in the great capital of the ancient world—sweeping majestically from Jerusalem to Rome. Nor is this book of less value as an Introduction to the Epistles which follow it, than as a Sequel to the Gospels which precede it. For without this history the Epistles of the New Testament—presupposing, as they do, the historical circumstances of the parties addressed, and deriving from these so much of their freshness, point, and force—would in no respect be what they now are, and would in a number of places be scarcely intelligible.

The genuineness, authenticity, and canonical authority of this book were never called in question within the ancient Church. It stands immediately after the Gospels, in the catalogues of the Homologumena, or universally acknowledged books of the New Testament (see Introduction to our larger Commentary, Vol. V. pp. iv, v). It was rejected, indeed, by certain heretical sects in the second and third centuries—by the Eblonites, the Severians (see Eusebius, Ecclesiastical History, 4. 29), the Marcionites, and the Manicheans: but the totally unorthodox character of their objections (see Introduction above referred to, pp. xiii, xiv) not only deprives them of all weight, but indirectly shows on what solid grounds the Christian Church had all along proceeded in recognising this book.

In our day, however, its authenticity has, like that of all the leading books of the New Testament, been made in Germany the subject of keen and protracted controversy. First, de Wette, while admitting Luke to be the author of the entire work, pronounces the earlier portion of it to have been drawn up from unreliable sources ('Einsleitung,' 3a and 3 C). But the Tubingen school, with Baur at their head, have gone much further. As their fantastic theory of the post-Joannean date of the Gospels could not pretend even to a hearing so long as the authenticity of the Acts of the Apostles remained unshaken, they contend that the earlier portion of this work can be shown to be unworthy of credit, while the latter portion is in flat contradiction to the Epistle to the Galatians—which this school regard as unassailable—and bears internal evidence of being a designed distortion of facts for the purpose of setting up the Catholic form which Paul gave to Christianity in opposition to the narrow Judaism but original form of it which Peter preached, and which after the death of the apostles was held exclusively by the sect of the Eblonites. It is painful to think that one so lately deceased should have spent so many years, and, aided by learned and acute disciples, in different parts of the argument, should have expended so much learning, research, and ingenuity, in attempting to build up a hypothesis, regarding the origination of the leading books of the New Testament, which outrages all the principles of sober criticism and legitimate evidence. As a school, this party at length broke up: its head, after living to find himself sole defender of the theory as a whole, left this

INTRODUCTION TO THE GOSPELS AND ACTS.

B. 25, and the entrance of Porcius Festus upon the procuratorship (ch. 24, 27)—with the intervals specified between occurrences in the apostle's life and others (such as ch. 20, 31; 24, 27; 28, 30; and Galatians, 1, and 2.)—that we can thread way through the difficulties that surround the chronology of the apostle's life, and approximate to certainty. Immense work has been brought to bear upon the subject, but the learned, as might be expected, are greatly divided. Every year been fixed upon as the probable date of the apostle's conversion, from A.D. 31 [Hengel] to A.D. 42 [Eusebius]. But the list of authorities is in favour of dates ranging between 35 and 40, a difference of not more than five years; and the largest number of authorities is in favour of the year 37 or 38. Taking the former of these, to which opinion largely inclines, the following Table will be useful to the student of apostolic History:—

CHRONOLOGICAL TABLE OF THE MIRACLES OF CHRIST.

On the order of some of our Lord's Miracles and Parables, the data being scanty, considerable differences obtain.

MIRACLES.	Where wrought.	Where recorded.
Water made wine,	Cana,	John, 2. 1-11.
Traders cast out of the temple,	Jerusalem,	John, 2. 13-17.
Nobleman's son healed,	Cana,	John, 4. 46-54.
First miraculous draught of fishes,	Sea of Galilee,	Luke, 5. 1-11.
Leper healed,	Capernaum,	Matt. 8. 2-4; Mark, 1. 40-45; Luke, 5. 12-15.
Centurion's servant healed,	Capernaum,	Matt. 8. 6-15; Luke, 7. 1-10.
Widow's son raised to life,	Nain,	Luke, 7. 11-17.
Demoniac healed,	Capernaum,	Mark, 1. 21-28; Luke, 4. 31-37.
Peter's mother-in-law healed,	Capernaum,	Matt. 8. 14, 15; Mark, 1. 29-31; Luke, 4. 38, 39.
Paralytic healed,	Capernaum,	Matt. 9. 2-8; Mark, 2. 1-12; Luke, 5. 17-26.
Impotent man healed,	Jerusalem,	John, 5. 1-16.
Man with withered hand healed,	Galilee,	Matt. 12. 10-14; Mark, 3. 1-6; Luke, 6. 6-11.
Blind and dumb demoniac healed,	Galilee,	Matt. 12. 22-24; Luke, 11. 14.
Tempest stilled,	Sea of Galilee,	Matt. 8. 23-27; Mark, 4. 35-41; Luke, 8. 22-25.
Demoniacs dispossessed,	Gadara,	Matt. 8. 28-34; Mark, 5. 1-20.
Jairus' daughter raised to life,	Capernaum,	Matt. 9. 18-26; Mark, 5. 22-24; Luke, 8. 41-56.
Issue of blood healed,	Near Capernaum,	Matt. 9. 27-31.
Two blind men restored to sight,	Capernaum,	Matt. 9. 32-34. [John, 6. 5-14.]
Dumb demoniac healed,	Capernaum,	Matt. 14. 13-21; Mark, 6. 31-44; Luke, 9. 10-17.
Five thousand miraculously fed,	Decapolis,	Matt. 14. 22-33; Mark, 6. 45-52; John, 6. 15-21.
Jesus walks on the sea,	Sea of Galilee,	Matt. 15. 31-38; Mark, 7. 24-30.
Syropheanician's daughter healed,	Coasts of Tyre and Sidon,	Mark, 7. 31-37.
Deaf and dumb man healed,	Decapolis,	Matt. 16. 28-29; Mark, 8. 1-9.
Four thousand fed,	Decapolis,	Mark, 8. 22-26.
Blind man restored to sight,	Bethsaida,	Matt. 17. 14-21; Mark, 9. 14-29; Luke, 9. 37-43.
Demoniac and lunatic boy healed,	Near Cesarea Philippi,	Matt. 17. 24-27.
Miraculous provision of tribute,	Capernaum,	John, 9. 1-41.
The eyes of one born blind opened,	Jerusalem,	Luke, 18. 10-17.
Woman, of 18 years' infirmity, cured,	[Perea,]	Luke, 14. 1-6.
Tropical man healed,	(Perea,)	Luke, 14. 1-6.
Ten lepers cleansed,	Borders of Samaria,	Luke, 17. 11-19.
Lazarus raised to life,	Bethany,	John, 11. 1-46.

S. MATTHEW.

CHAPTER I.

1-17. GENEALOGY OF CHRIST. (=Luke, 3.

1. The book of the generation—an expression of Jewish meaning, 'Table of the genealogy,' Genesis, 5, 1, the same expression occurs in this

We have here, then, the title, not of this whole of Matthew, but only of the first seventeen of Jesus Christ. For the meaning of these words, see on v. 16, 21. "Jesus," the name to our Lord at His circumcision (Luke, 2, 21), but by which He was familiarly known while on earth. The word "Christ"—though applied to as a proper name by the angel who announced birth to the shepherds (Luke, 2, 11), and once or used in this sense by our Lord Himself (ch. 23, Mark, 9, 41)—only began to be so used by others the very close of His earthly career (ch. 26, 68).

The full form, "Jesus Christ," though once by Himself in His Intercessory Prayer (John, 17, 3), was never used by others till after his ascension, the formation of churches in His name. Its use, in the opening words of this Gospel (and 2, 16) is in the style of the late period when our saint wrote, rather than of the events he was to record. the son of David, the son of Abraham, was the first from whose family it was held that Messiah should spring (Genesis, 22, 18), and was the last. To a Jewish reader, accordingly, these behoved to be the two great starting-points of any true genealogy of the promised Messiah; thus this opening verse, as it stamps the first as one peculiarly Jewish, would at once tend to accustom the writer's people. From the nearest of these two fathers came that familiar name of the seed Messiah, "the son of David" (Luke, 20, 41), which was applied to Jesus, either in devout acknowledgment of His rightful claim to it (ch. 9, 27; 20, 31), or in the way of insinuating inquiry whether such the case (see on John, 4, 29; ch. 12, 23). 2. Abraham begat Isaac; and Isaac begat Jacob; and Jacob begat his brethren. Only the fourth son of Jacob is named, as it was from his loins that Messiah was descended (Genesis, 49, 10). 3. And Judas begat Phares son of Thamar; and Phares begat Erum; and Erum begat Aram; 4. And Aram begat Aminadab; and Aminadab begat Naasson; and Naasson begat Salmon; 5. And Salmon begat Booz of Rachab; and Booz begat Obed of Ruth; and Obed begat Jesse; 6. And Jesse begat David the king; and David begat Solomon of her of Urias. Four names are here introduced: two of them Gentiles by name—Rachab and Ruth; and three of them with a foreign name in the Old Testament—Thamar, Booz, and Bath-sheba. This feature in the present list—herein differing from that given by Luke as well from him who styles himself in his list of Twelve, what none of the other lists do, the publican; as if thereby to hold forth, as a very outcast, the unsearchable riches of that which could not only fetch in "them that are far off," but reach down even to "publicans and sinners," and raise them to "sit with the princes of the kingdom." David is here twice emphatically styled "the king," as not only the first of that royal line from which the throne that was to occupy took its name—the throne of David. The angel Gabriel, in announcing Him virgin-mother, calls it "the throne of David

His father," sinking all the intermediate kings of that line, as having no importance save as links to connect the first and the last king of Israel as father and son. It will be observed that Rachab is here represented as the great-grandmother of David (see Ruth, 4, 20-22; and 1 Chronicles, 2, 11-16)—a thing not beyond possibility indeed, but extremely improbable, there being about four centuries between them. There can hardly be a doubt that one or two intermediate links are omitted. 7. And Solomon begat Roboam; and Roboam begat Abia; and Abia begat Asa; 8. And Asa begat Josaphat; and Josaphat begat Jeram; and Jeram begat Ozias (or Uziah). Three kings are here omitted—Ahasiah, Josiah, and Amaziah (1 Chronicles, 3, 11, 12). Some omissions behoved to be made, to compress the whole into three fourteens (v. 17). The reason why these, rather than other names, are omitted must be sought in religious considerations—either in the connection of those kings with the house of Ahab as Lightfoot, Ebrard, and Alford view it; in their slender right to be regarded as true links in the theocratic chain (as Lange takes it); or in some similar disqualification. 11. And Josias begat Jechonias and his brethren. Jechonias was Josiah's grandson, being the son of Jehoiakim, Josiah's second son (1 Chronicles, 3, 15); but Jehoiakim might well be sunk in such a catalogue, being a mere puppet in the hands of the king of Egypt (2 Chronicles, 36, 4). The "brethren" of Jechonias here evidently mean his uncles—the chief of whom, Mattaniah or Zedekiah, who came to the throne (2 Kings, 24, 17), is, in 2 Chronicles, 36, 10, called "his brother," as well as here, about the time they were carried away to Babylon—lit., 'of their migration.' for the Jews avoided the word 'captivity' as too bitter a recollection, and our Evangelist studiously respects the national feeling. 12. And after they were brought to [after the migration of] Babylon, Jechonias begat Salathiel. So (1 Chronicles, 3, 17. Nor does this contradict Jeremiah, 22, 30, "Thus saith the Lord, Write ye this man [Jechonias, or Jechoniah] childless," for what follows explains in what sense this was meant—"for no man of his seed shall prosper, sitting upon the throne of David." He was to have seed, but no reigning child. Salathiel (or Shealtiel) begat Zorobabel. So Ezra, 3, 2; Nehemiah, 12, 1; Haggai, 1, 1. But it would appear from 1 Chronicles, 3, 19, that Zernubabel was Salathiel's grandson, being the son of Jediaiah, whose name, for some reason unknown, is omitted. 13-15. And Zorobabel begat Abiad, &c. None of these names are found in the Old Testament; but they were doubtless taken from the public or family registers, which the Jews carefully kept, and their accuracy was never challenged. 16. And Jacob begat Joseph, the husband of Mary, of whom was born Jesus. From this it is clear that the genealogy here given is not that of Mary, but of Joseph; nor has this ever been questioned. And yet it is here studiously proclaimed that Joseph was not the natural, but only the legal father of our Lord. His birth of a virgin was known only to a few; but the acknowledged descent of his legal father from David secured that the descent of Jesus Himself from David should never be questioned. See on v. 20, who is called Christ—signifying 'anointed.' It is applied in the Old Testament to the kings (1 Samuel, 24, 6, 10; to the priests (Leviticus, 4, 5, 16, &c.); and to the prophets (1 Kings, 19, 16)—these all being anointed with oil, the symbol of the needful spiritual gifts, to consecrate them to their respective offices; and it was applied, in its most sublime and comprehensive sense, to the promised Deliverer, inasmuch as He was to be consecrated to an office embracing all three by the immeasurable anointing of the Holy Ghost (Isaiah, 61, 1; cf. John, 3, 34) 17. So all the generations from Abraham to David are fourteen generations; and from David until the carrying away (or migration) into Babylon are fourteen generations; and from the carrying away into ('the migration of') Babylon unto Christ are fourteen generations. That is, the whole may be conveniently divided into three fourteens, each embracing one marked era, and each ending with a notable event, in the Israelitish annals. Such artificial aids to memory were familiar to the Jews, and much larger gaps than those here are found in some of the Old Testament genealogies. In Ezra, 7, 1-5, no fewer than six generations of the priesthood are omitted, as will appear by comparing it with 1 Chronicles, 6, 3-15. It will be observed that the last of the three divisions of fourteen appears to contain only thirteen distinct names, including Jesus as the last. LANGE thinks that this was meant as a tacit hint that Mary was to be supplied, as the thirteenth link of this last chain, as it is impossible to conceive that the Evangelist could have made any mistake in the matter. But there is a simpler way of accounting for it. As the Evangelist himself (c. 17) reckons David twice—as the last of the first fourteen and the first of the second—so, if we reckon the second fourteen to end with Josiah, who was coeval with the "carrying away into captivity" (c. 11), and the third to begin with Jehoniah, it will be found that this last division, as well as the other two, embraces fourteen names, including that of our Lord.

Ver. 18-23. BIRTH OF CHRIST. 18. Now the birth of Jesus Christ was on this wise, on (that) when she making itself up to the painful step, yet planning how to do it in the way least offensive—at the last extremity the Lord Himself interposes. behold, the angel of the Lord appeared to him in a dream, saying, Joseph, son of David. This style of address was doubtless advisedly chosen to remind him of what all the families of David's line so early coveted, and thus it would prepare him for the marvellous announcement which was to follow. fear not to take unto thee Mary thy wife; q. d., 'Though a dark cloud now overhangs this relationship, it is unsullied still' for that which is conceived in her is of the Holy Ghost. 21. And she shall bring forth a son. Observe, it is not said, 'she shall bear thee a son,' as was said to Zacharias of his wife Elizabeth (Luke, 1, 13). and thou (as his legal father) shalt call his name JESUS—from the Hebrew meaning 'Jehovah the Saviour'; in Greek Jesus—to the awakened and anxious sinner sweetest and most fragrant of all names, expressing so melodiously and briefly His whole saving office and work! for he shall save. The "He" is here emphatic—'He it is that shall save.' He personally, and by personal acts (as Webster and Wilkinson express it). his people—the lost sheep of the house of Israel, in the first instance: for they were the only people He then had. But, on the breaking down of the middle wall of partition, the saved people embraced the "redeemed unto God by His blood out of every kindred and people and tongue and nation." from their sins—in the most comprehensive sense of salvation from sin (Revelation, 1, 5; Ephesians, 5, 25-27). 22. Now all this was done, that it might be fulfilled which was spoken of the Lord by the prophet (Isaiah, 7, 14), saying, 23. Behold, a virgin—it should be 'the virgin' meaning that particular virgin destined to this unparalleled distinction. shall be with child, and shall bring forth a son, and they shall call his

...of the Jewish era, the birth of Christ be dated four years before the date usually ascribed to it, even if He was born within the year of His death, as it is next to certain that He was some wise man—'Magi' or 'Magians'—probably the learned class who cultivated astrology and the sciences. Balaam's prophecy (Numbers, 24), and perhaps Daniel's ch. 9. 24, &c.), might have been known to them by tradition; but nothing definite was of them, from the east—but whether from Persia, or Mesopotamia is uncertain. to Jerusalem as the Jewish metropolis. 2. Saying, Where is the King of the Jews? From this it would follow they were not themselves Jews. (Cf. the language of the Roman governor, John, 18. 33, and of the soldiers, ch. 27. 29, with the very different language of the Jews themselves, ch. 27. 42, &c.) The historians, STRABO and TACITUS, bear witness to an expectation, prevalent in the East, that of Judea should arise a sovereign of the East, for we have seen his star in the east. Much has been written on the subject of this star; but from all here said it is perhaps safest to regard it as a luminous meteor, which appeared under laws and for a special purpose, and accompanied Him—'to do Him homage,' as the words are; the nature of that homage depending on the circumstances of the case. That not civil but as homage is meant here is plain from the strain of the narrative, and particularly v. 11. Less these simple strangers expected all Jerusalem to be full of its new-born King, and the time, and circumstances of His birth to be familiar to one. Little would they think that the first announcement of His birth would come from them—and still less could they anticipate the startle of transporting effect which it would produce—else they would probably have sought information regarding His birth-place in some other way. But God overruled it to draw forth a noble testimony to the predicted birth-place of Messiah from the highest ecclesiastical authority in the nation. When Herod the king had heard these things troubled—viewing this as a danger to his own perhaps his guilty conscience also suggested—prophecy. 3. And they said unto him, in Bethlehem of Judea—a prompt and involuntary testimony from the highest tribunal; which yet at length condemned Him to die. for thus it is written by the prophet, Micah, 5. 2, 6. And thou, Bethlehem, [in] the land of Juda—the "in" being familiarly left out, as we say, 'London, Middlesex'—art not the least among the princes of Juda: for out of thee shall come a Governor, &c. This quotation, though differing verbally, agrees substantially with the Hebrew and LXX. For says the prophet, "Though thou be little, yet out of thee shall come the Ruler"—this honour more than compensating for its natural insignificance; while our Evangelist, by a lively turn, makes him say, "Thou art not the least: for out of thee shall come a Governor"—this distinction lifting it from the lowest to the highest rank. The "thousands of Juda," in the prophet, mean the subordinate divisions of the tribe: our Evangelist, instead of these, merely names the "princes" or heads of these families, including the districts which they occupied, that shall rule—or 'feed,' as in the margin—my people Israel. In the Old Testament, kings are, by a beautiful figure, styled "shepherds" (Ezekiel, 34, &c.). The classical writers use the same figure. The pastoral rule of Jehovah and Messiah over His people is a representation pervading all Scripture, and rich in import. (See Psalm 13: Isaiah, 40. 11; Ezekiel, 37. 24; John, 10. 11; Revelation, 7. 17.) That this prophecy of Micah referred to the Messiah, was admitted by the ancient Rabbins. The Wise Men, despatched to Bethlehem by Herod to see the Babe, and bring him word, make a Religious Offering to the Infant King, but, divinely warned, return home by another way (v. 7-12). 7. Then Herod, when he had privily called the wise men. Herod has so far succeeded in his murderous design: he has tracked the spot where lies his victim, an unconscious babe. But he has another point to fix—the date of His birth—without which he might still miss his mark. The one he had got from the Sanhedrim: the other he will have from the sages; but secretly, lest his object should be suspected and defeated. So he enquired of them diligently—rather, "precisely"—what time the star appeared—presuming that this would be the best clue to the age of the child. The unsuspecting strangers tell him all. And now he thinks he is succeeding to a wish and tell Herod where Christ should be born, and could hear of these strangers from the far East that the Desire of all nations had actually come: but I do not see you trooping to Bethlehem—I find these devout strangers journeying thither all alone. Yet God ordered this too, lest the news should be blabbed, and reach the tyrant's ears, ere the Babe could be placed beyond his reach. Thus are the very errors and crimes and cold indifference of men all overruled, and, lo, the star, which they saw in the east—implying apparently that it had disappeared in the interval—went before them, and stood over where the young child was. Surely this could hardly be but by a luminous meteor, and not very high. 10. When they saw the star, they rejoiced with exceeding great joy. The language is very strong, expressing exuberant transport. 11. And when they were come into the house—not the stable; for as soon as Bethlehem was emptied of its strangers, they would have no difficulty in finding a dwelling-house, they saw. The received text has "found;" but here our translators rightly depart from it, for it has no authority, the young child with Mary his mother. The blessed Babe is naturally mentioned first, then the mother; but Joseph, though doubtless present, is not noticed, as being but the head of the house, and fell down and worshipped him. Clearly this was no civil homage to a petty Jewish king, whom these star-guided strangers came so far, and enquired so eagerly, and rejoiced with such exceeding joy to pay, but a lofty spiritual homage. The next clause confirms this, and when they had opened their treasures, they presented—rather, "offered"—unto him gifts. This expression, used frequently in the Old Testament of the oblations presented to God, is in the New Testament employed seven times, and always in a religious sense of offerings to God. Beyond doubt, therefore, we are to understand the presentation of these gifts by the Magi as a religious offering, gold, frankincense, and myrrh. Visits were seldom paid to sovereigns without a present (1 Kings, i. 2, &c.); cf. Psalm 72. 10, 11, 15; Isaiah, 60. 3, 6. "Frankincense" was an aromatic used in sacrificial offerings; "myrrh" was used in perfuming ointments. These, with the gold which they presented, seem to show that the offerers were persons in affluent circumstances. That the gold was presented to the infant King in token of His royalty; the frankincense in token of His divinity, and the myrrh, of His sufferings; or that they were designed to express His divine and human natures; or that the prophetic, priestly, and kingly offices of Christ are to be seen in these gifts; or that they were the offerings of three individuals respectively, each of them kings, the very names of whom tradition has handed down—all these are, at the best, precarious suppositions. But that the feelings of these devout givers are to be seen in the richness of their gifts, and that the gold, at least, would be highly serviceable to the parents of the blessed Babe in their unexpected journey to Egypt and stay there—thus much at least admits of no dispute. 12. And being warned of God in a dream that they should not return to Herod, they departed—or "withdrew"—to their own country another way. What a surprise would this vision be to the sages, just as they were preparing to carry the glad news of what they had seen to the pious king! But the Lord knew the bloody old tyrant better than to let him see their face again.

13-25. THE FLIGHT INTO EGYPT—THE MAS-SACRE AT BETHLEHEM—THE RETURN OF JOSEPH AND MARY WITH THE BABE, AFTER HEROD'S DEATH, AND THEIR SETTLEMENT AT NAZARETH. (=Luke, 2. 30.) The Flight into Egypt. (v. 13-15.) 13. And when they were departed, behold, the angel of the Lord appeareth to Joseph in a dream, saying, Arise, and take the young child and his mother. Observe this form of

expression, repeated in the next verse—another indirect hint that Joseph was no more than the Child's guardian. Indeed, personally considered, Joseph has no spiritual significance, and very little place at all, in the Gospel history, and flee into Egypt—which, being near, as ALFORD says, and a Roman province independent of Herod, and much inhabited by Jews, was an easy and convenient refuge. Ah! blessed Saviour, on what a chequered career hast Thou entered here below! At Thy birth there was no room for Thee in the inn; and now all Judea is too hot for Thee. How soon has the sword begun to pierce through the Virgin's soul! (Luke, 2. 35.) How early does she taste the reception which this mysterious Child of hers is to meet with in the world! And whither is He sent? To "the house of bondage?" Well, it once was that. But Egypt was a house of refuge before it was a house of bondage, and now it has but returned to its first use, and be thou there until I bring thee word; for Herod will seek the young child to destroy him. Herod's murderous purpose was formed ere the Magi set out for Bethlehem. 14. When he arose, he took the young child and his mother by night—doubtless the same night—and departed into Egypt: 15. And was there until the death of Herod—which took place not very long after this of a horrible disease; the details of which will be found in JOSEPHUS (Antiquities 17. 6. 1, 5, 7, 8), that it might be fulfilled which was spoken of the Lord by the prophet, saying (Hosea, 11. 1), Out of Egypt have I called my son. Our Evangelist here quotes directly from the Hebrew, warily departing from the LXX., which renders the words, "From Egypt have I recalled his children," meaning Israel's children. The prophet is reminding his people how dear Israel was to God in the days of his youth; how Moses was bidden say to Pharaoh, "Thus saith the Lord, Israel is my son, my first-born: and I say unto thee, Let my son go, that he may serve me; and if thou refuse to let him go, behold, I will slay thy son, even thy first-born" (Exodus, 4. 22, 23); how, when Pharaoh refused, God, having slain all His first-born, "called his own son out of Egypt," by a stroke of high-handed power and love. Viewing the words in this light, even if our Evangelist had not applied them to the recall from Egypt of God's own beloved, Only-begotten Son, the application would have been irresistibly made by all who have learnt to pierce beneath the surface to the deeper relations which Christ bears to His people, and both to God; and who are accustomed to trace the analogy of God's treatment of each respectively. 16. Then Herod, &c. As Deborah sang of the mother of Sisera, "She looked out at a window, and cried through the lattice, Why is his chariot so long in coming? why tarry the wheels of his chariots? Have they not sped!" so Herod wonders that his messengers, with pious zeal, are not hastening with the news that all is ready to receive him as a worshipper. What can be keeping them? Have they missed their way? Has any disaster befallen them? At length his patience is exhausted. He makes his enquiries, and finds they are already far beyond his reach on their way home, when he saw that he was mocked—"was trifled with"—of the wise men. No, Herod, thou art not mocked of the wise men, but of a Higher than they. He that sitteth in the heavens doth laugh at thee; the Lord hath thee in derision. He disappointeth the devices of the crafty, so that their hands cannot perform their enterprise. He taketh the wise in their own craftiness, and the council of the froward is carried headlong. (Psalm 2. 4; Job, 5. 12, 13.) That blessed Babe shall die indeed, but not by thy hand. As He afterwards told that son of thine—as cunning and as unscrupulous as thyself—when the Pharisees warned Him to depart, for Herod would seek to kill Him—"Go ye, that voe. Behold, I cast out devils, and I do day and to-morrow, and the third day I shall be dead. Nevertheless I must walk to-day, and to-morrow, and the day following: for it cannot be that the prophets perish out of Jerusalem" (Luke, 13. Bitter satire! was exceeding wrath. To be fool of is what none like, and proud kings stand. Herod burns with rage, and is like a lion in a net. So he sent forth a band of hired men, and slew all the (male) children that were under two years old and under, according to the commandment which he had diligently—carefully—enquired of the Jews.

In this ferocious step Herod was like hin-crafty as cruel. He takes a large sweep, not a mark. He thinks this will surely embrace all. And so it had, if He had been there. Heaven and earth shall sooner pass than thou shalt have that Babe into thy hands. Herod, thou must be content to want to fill up the cup of thy bitter mortifications, full enough—until thou die not less of a smart than of a loathsome and execrating death.

Why, ask sceptics and sceptical critics, is this massacre, if it really occurred, recorded by Matthew, who is minute enough in detailing the death of Herod? To this the answer is not difficult. We consider how small a town Bethlehem is, and how unlikely there would be many male children from two years old and under: and when we consider the number of fouler atrocities which Herod has recorded of him, it is unreasonable to suppose that he would be silent on anything of his silence on this. 17. Then was it that which was spoken by Jeremy the prophet, Jeremiah, 31. 15— from which the quotation is verbally, 18. In Rama was there a voice of weeping, and great mourning, because of her children, and would not be comforted: they are not. These words, as they relate to Jeremiah, undoubtedly relate to the Baby of Bethlehem. Rachel, the mother of Joseph and Benjamin, was buried in the neighbourhood of Bethlehem, Genesis, 35. 19, where her sepulchre is still to be seen, and is figuratively represented as rising from and uttering a double lament for the loss of her first-born, by a bitter captivity, and now by death. And a foul deed it was. O ye of Bethlehem, methinks I hear you asking: innocent babes should be the ram caught in the net, whilst Isaac escapes. I cannot tell one thing I know, that ye shall, some of you see a day when that Babe of Bethlehem himself the Ram, caught in another sort of a net, and that your babes may escape a worse as they now endure. And if these babes are now in glory, through the dear merit of Jesus, will they not deem it their honour to have their rage exhausted upon themselves their Infant Lord? 19. But when Herod was slain, was it not Herod? Thou thoughtest thyself safe as a bird in the bush; but it was He only that was slain; and thou hast not long enjoyed even a moment of security. See on v. 15. behold, an angel.

Our translators, somewhat capriciously, use the same expression "the angel of the Lord," in Luke, 1. 13; and "an angel of the Lord," as here. The angel appears to have been employed on high occasions—and most likely he to Luke is given the name of "Gabriel," ch. 1. It is said that it should in every instance except the ordered "the angel." appeareth in a dream to Joseph, 20. Saying, Arise, and take the young child and his mother, and go into the land of Israel—not of Judea, for he was afterward expressly told to settle there, nor to Galilee, for he only went thither when he found it unsafe to settle in Judea, but to "the land of Israel," in its most general sense: meaning the Holy Land at large—the particular province being not as yet indicated. So Joseph and the Virgin had, like Abraham, to "go out, not knowing whither they went," till they should receive further direction. For they are dead which sought the young child's life—a common expression in most languages where only one is meant, who here is Herod. But the words are taken from the strikingly analogous case in Exodus, 4. 19, which probably suggested the plural here: and where the command is given to Moses to return to Egypt for the same reason that the Greater than Moses was now ordered to be brought back from it—the death of him who sought his life. Herod died in the seventieth year of his age, and thirty-seventh of his reign. 21. And he arose, and took the young child and his mother, and came into the land of Israel—intending, as is plain from what follows, to return to Bethlehem of Judea, there, no doubt, to rear the Infant King, as at His own royal city, until the time should come when they would expect Him to occupy Jerusalem, "the city of the Great King." 22. But when he heard that Archelaus did reign in Judea in the room of his father Herod. Archelaus succeeded to Judea, Samaria, and Idumea; but Augustus refused him the title of King till it should be seen how he conducted himself: giving him only the title of Ethnarch (Josephus Antiquities, 17. 11, 4). Above this, however, he never rose. The people, indeed, recognised him as his father's successor; and so it is here said that he "reigned in the room of his father Herod." But, after ten years' defiance of the Jewish law and cruel tyranny, the people lodged heavy complaints against him, and the emperor banished him to Vienne in Gaul, reducing Judea again to a Roman province. Then "the sceptre" clean "departed from Judah." he was afraid to go thither—and no wonder, for the reason just mentioned, notwithstanding—or more simply, 'but'—being warned of God in a dream, he turned aside—'withdrew'—into the parts of Galilee, or the Galilean parts. The whole country west of the Jordan was at this time, as is well known, divided into three provinces—GALILEE being the northern, JUDEA the southern, and SAMARIA the central province. The province of Galilee was under the jurisdiction of Herod Antipas, the brother of Archelaus, his father having left him that and Perea, on the east side of the Jordan, as his share of the kingdom, with the title of tetrarch, which Augustus confirmed. Though crafty and licentious, according to Josephus—precisely what the Gospel History shows him to be, see on Mark, 6. 14-30, and on Luke, 13. 31-35.—he was of a less cruel disposition than Archelaus; and Nazareth being a good way off from the seat of government, and considerably secluded, it was safer to settle there. 23. And he came and dwelt in a city called Nazareth—a small town in Lower Galilee, lying in the territory of the tribe of Zebulun, and about equally distant from the Mediterranean sea on the west and the sea of Galilee on the east. N.B.—If, from Luke, 2. 39, one would conclude that the parents of Jesus brought Him straight back to Nazareth after His presentation in the temple—as if there had been no visit of the Magi, no flight to Egypt, no stay there, and no purpose on returning to settle again at Bethlehem—one might, from our Evangelist's way of speaking here, equally conclude that the parents of our Lord had never been at Nazareth until now. Did we know exactly the sources from which the matter of each of the Gospels was drawn up, or the mode in which these were used, this apparent discrepancy would probably disappear at once. In neither case is there any inaccuracy. At the same time it is difficult, with these facts before us, to conceive that either of these two Evangelists wrote his Gospel with the other's before him—though many think this a precarious inference. that it might be fulfilled which was spoken by the prophets, He shall be called a Nazarene—better, perhaps, 'Nazarene.' The best explanation of the origin of this name appears to be that which traces it to the word wetzer in Isaiah, 11. 1—the small 'twig,' 'sprout,' or 'sucker,' which the prophet there says, "shall come forth from the stem (or rather 'stump') of Jesse, the branch which should fructify from his roots." The little town of Nazareth—mentioned neither in the Old Testament nor in JOSEPHUS—was probably so called from its insignificance—a weak twig in contrast to a stately tree; and a special contempt seemed to rest upon it—"Can any good thing come out of Nazareth?" (John, 1. 46)—over and above the general contempt in which all Galilee was held, from the number of Gentiles that settled in the upper territories of it, and, in the estimation of the Jews, debased it. Thus, in the providential arrangement by which our Lord was brought up at the insignificant and opprobrious town called Nazareth, there was involved, first, a local humiliation; next, an allusion to Isaiah's prediction of His lowly, twig-like upspringing from the branchless, dried-up stump of Jesse; and yet further, a standing memorial of that humiliation which "the prophets," in a number of the most striking predictions, had attached to the Messiah.

CHAPTER III.

VER. 1-12. PREACHING AND MINISTRY OF JOHN. (=Mark, 1. 1-8; Luke, 3. 1-18.) For the proper introduction to this section, we must go to Luke, 3. 1. 2. Here, as BENGEL well observes, the curtain of the New Testament is, as it were, drawn up, and the greatest of all epochs of the Church commences. Even our Lord's own age is determined by it (c. 23). No such elaborate chronological precision is to be found elsewhere in the New Testament, and it comes fitly from him who claims it as the peculiar recommendation of his Gospel, that 'he had traced down all things with precision from the very first' (ch. 1. 3). Here evidently commences his proper narrative. Ver. 1. "Now in the fifteenth year of the reign of Tiberius Cæsar"—not the fifteenth from his full accession on the death of Augustus, but from the period when he was associated with him in the government of the empire, three years earlier, about the end of the year of Rome 779, or about four years before the usual reckoning. "Pontius Pilate being governor of Judæa." His proper title was Procurator, but with more than the usual powers of that office. After holding it for about ten years, he was summoned to Rome to answer to charges brought against him; but ere he arrived Tiberius died (A. D. 36), and soon after miserable Pilate committed suicide. "and Herod being tetrarch of Galilee (see on Mark, 6. 14), and his brother Philip"—a very different and very superior Philip to the one whose name was Herod Philip, and whose wife, Herodias, went to live with Herod Antipas (see on Mark, 6. 17)—"tetrarch of Ituræa"—lying to the North East of Palestine, and so called from Itur or Jetur, Ishmael's son (1 Chronicles, 1. 31), and anciently belonging to the half-tribe of Manasseh. "and of the region of Trachonitis"—lying farther to the North East, between Ituræa and Damascus; a rocky district infested by robbers, and committed by Augustus to Herod the Great to keep in order. "and Lysanias the tetrarch of Abilene"—still more to the North East; so called, says ROBINSON, from Abila, eighteen miles from Damascus. Ver. 2. "Annas and Caiaphas being the high priests." The former, though deposed, retained much of his influence, and, probably, as Sagan or deputy, exercised much of the power of the high priesthood along with Caiaphas his son-in-law (John, 18. 13; Acts, 4. 6). In David's time both Zadok and Abiathar acted as high priests (2 Samuel, 16. 36), and it seems to have been the fixed practice to have two (2 Kings, 25. 18). "the word of God came unto John the son of Zacharias in the wilderness." Such a way of speaking is never once used when speaking of Jesus, because He was himself The Living Word; whereas to all merely creature-messengers of God, the word they spake was a foreign element. See on John, 3. 31. We are now prepared for the opening words of Matthew. 1. In those days—of Christ's secluded life at Nazareth, where the last chapter left Him, came John the Baptist, preaching—about six months before his Master, in the wilderness of Judæa—the desert valley of the Jordan, thinly peopled and bare in pasture, a little North of Jerusalem. 2. And saying, Repent ye. Though the word strictly denotes a change of mind, it has respect here, and wherever it is used in connection with salvation, primarily to that cess of sin which leads the sinner to flee from the wrath to come, to look for relief only from above, and eagerly to fall in with the provided remedy, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand. This sublime phrase, used in none of the other Gospels, occurs in this peculiarly Jewish Gospel nearly thirty times; and being suggested by Daniel's grand vision of the Son of Man coming in the clouds of heaven to the Ancient of days, to receive His Investiture in a world-wide kingdom (Daniel, 7. 13, 14), it was fitted at once both to meet the national expectations and to turn them into the right channel. A kingdom for which repentance was the proper preparation behoved to be essentially spiritual. Deliverance from sin, the great blessing of Christ's kingdom (ch. 1. 21), can be valued by those only to whom sin is a burden (ch. 9. 12). John's great work, accordingly, was to awaken this feeling, and hold out the hope of a speedy and precious remedy. 3. For this is he that was spoken of by the prophet Esaias, saying (ch. 11. 3), The voice of one crying in the wilderness (see on Luke, 3. 2)—the scene of his ministry corresponding to its rough nature. Prepare ye the way of the Lord, make his paths straight. This prediction is quoted in all the four Gospels, showing that it was regarded as a great outstanding one, and the predicted forerunner as the connecting link between the old and the new economies. Like the great ones of the earth, the Prince of peace was to have His immediate approach proclaimed and His way prepared; and the call here—taking it generally—is a call to put out of the way whatever would obstruct His progress and hinder His complete triumph, whether those hindrances were public or personal, outward or inward. In Luke (3. 5, 6, the quotation is thus continued:—"Every valley shall be filled, and every mountain and hill shall be brought low; and the crooked shall be made straight, and the rough ways shall be made smooth; and all flesh shall see the salvation of God." Levelling and smoothing are here the obvious figures whose sense is conveyed in the first words of the proclamation—"Prepare ye the way of the Lord." The idea is, that every obstruction shall be so removed as to reveal to the whole world the Salvation of God in Him whose name is the "Saviour." (Cf. Psalm 98. 3; Isaiah, 11. 10; 49. 6; 62. 10; Luke, 2. 31, 32; Acts, 13. 47.) 4. And the same John had his raiment of camel's hair—that is, woven of it—and a leathern girdle about his loins—the prophetic dress of Elijah (2 Kings, 1. 8; and see Zechariah, 13. 4), and his meat was locusts—the great well-known eastern locust, a food of the poor (Leviticus, 11. 22), and wild honey—made by wild bees (1 Samuel, 14. 25, 26). This dress and diet, with the shrill cry in the wilderness, would recall the stern days of Elijah. 5. Then went out to him Jerusalem, and all Judæa, and all the region round about Jordan. From the metropolitan centre to the extremities of the Judean province the cry of this great preacher of repentance and herald of the approaching Messiah brought trooping penitents and eager expectants. 6. And were baptized of him in Jordan, confessing—probably confessing aloud—their sins. This baptism was at once a public seal of their felt need of deliverance from sin, of their expectation of the coming Deliverer, and of their readiness to welcome Him when He appeared. The baptism itself startled, and was intended to startle them. They were familiar enough with the baptism of proselytes from heathenism; but this baptism of Jews themselves was quite new and strange to them. 7. But when he saw many of the Pharisees and Sadducees come to his baptism, he said unto them—astonished at such a spectacle—O generation of vipers—'Viper-brood,' expressing the deadly influence of both sects alike upon the community. Mutually and entirely antagonistic as were their religious principles and spirit, the stern prophet charges both alike with being the poisoners of the nation's religious principles. In ch. 12, 24, and 23, 35, this strong language of the Baptist is anew applied by the faithful and true Witness to the Pharisees specifically—the only party that had read enough actively to diffuse this poison. who hath warned you—'given you the hint,' as the idea is—to flee from the wrath to come!—'What can have brought you hither? John more than suspected it was not so much their own spiritual anxieties as the popularity of his movement that had drawn them thither. What an expression is this, "The wrath to come!" God's "wrath," in Scripture, is His righteous displeasure against sin, and consequently against all in whose skirts sin is found, arising out of the essential and eternal opposition of His nature to all moral evil. This is called "the coming wrath," not as being wholly future—for as a merited sentence it lies on the sinner already, and its effects, both inward and outward, are to some extent experienced even now—but because the impenitent sinner will not, until "the judgment of the great day," be concluded under it, will not have sentence publicly and irrevocably passed upon him, will not have it discharged upon him and experience its effects without mixture and without hope. In this view of it, it is a wrath wholly to come—as is implied in the noticeably different form of the expression employed by the apostle in 1 Thessalonians, 1, 10. Not that even true penitents came to John's baptism with all these views of "the wrath to come." But what he says is, that this was the real import of the step itself. In this view of it, how striking is the word he employs to express that step—fleeing from it—as of one who, beholding a tide of fiery wrath rolling rapidly towards him, sees in instant flight his only escape! 8. Bring forth therefore fruits—the true reading clearly is 'fruit'—meet for repentance—that is, such fruit as befits a true penitent. John, not being gifted with a knowledge of the human heart, like a true minister of righteousness and lover of souls, here directs them how to evidence and carry out their repentance, supposing it genuine; and in the following verses warns them of their danger in case it were not. 9. And think not to say within yourselves, We have Abraham to our father—that pillow on which the nation so fatally reposed, that rock on which at length it split. For I say unto you, that God is able of these stones to raise up children unto Abraham—q. d. 'Flatter not yourselves with the fond delusion that God stands in need of you, to make good his promise of a seed to Abraham; for I tell you that, though you were all to perish, God is able to raise up a seed to Abraham out of those stones as He was to take Abraham himself out of the rock whence he was hewn, out of the hole of the pit whence he was digged' (Isaiah, 51, 1).

Though the stern speaker may have pointed as he spake to the pebbles of the bare clay hills that lay around (so STANLEY'S Sinai and Palestine), it was clearly the calling of the Genites—at that time stone-dead in their sins, and quite as unconscious of it—into the room of unbelieving and disinherited Israel that he meant thus to indicate. (See ch. 21, 43; Romans, 11, 20, 30.) 10. And now also—'And even already'—the ax is laid unto—'lieth at'—the root of the trees—as it were ready to strike; an expressive figure of impending judgment, only to be averted in the way next described, therefore every tree which bringeth not forth good fruit is hewn down, and cast into the fire. Language so personal and individual as this can scarcely be understood of any national judgment like the approaching destruction of Jerusalem, with the breaking up of the Jewish polity and the extrusion of the chosen people from their peculiar privileges which followed it; though this would serve as the dark shadow, cast before, of a more terrible retribution to come. The "fire," which in another verse is called "unquenchable," can be no other than that future "torment" of the impenitent, which "smoke ascendeth up for ever and ever," and whose by the Judge Himself is styled "everlasting punishment" (Matthew, 25, 46). What a strength, too, of just indignation is in that word "cast" or "flung into the fire"! The Third Gospel here adds the following important particulars, Luke, 3, 10-16: Ver. 10. "And the people—rather, 'the multitudes'—"asked him, saying, What shall we do then?"—that is, to show the sincerity of our repentance. Ver. 11. "He answereth and saith unto them, He that hath two coats, let him impart to him that hath none; and he that hath meat"—'provisions,' 'victuals'—"let him do likewise." This is directed against the reigning avarice and selfishness. (Cf. the corresponding precepts of the Sermon on the Mount, ch. 5, 40-42.) Ver. 12. "Then came also the publicans to be baptized, and said unto him, Master," or 'Teacher,' "what shall we do?"—in what special way is the genuineness of our repentance to be manifested? Ver. 13. "And he said unto them, Exact no more than that which is appointed you." This is directed against that extortion which made the publicans a by-word. (See on ch. 5, 46; and on Luke, 15, 1.) Ver. 14. "And the soldiers"—rather, 'And soldiers'—the word means 'soldiers on active duty'—"likewise demanded (or asked) of him, saying, And what shall we do? And he said unto them, Do violence to," or 'Intimidate,' "no man." The word signifies to 'shake thoroughly,' and refers probably to the extorting of money or other property. "neither accuse any falsely"—by acting as informers vexatiously on frivolous or false pretences—"and be content with your wages," or 'rations.' We may take this, say WEBSTER & WILKINSON, as a warning against mutiny, which the officers attempted to suppress by largesses and donations. And thus the "fruits" which would evidence their repentance were just resistance to the reigning sins—particularly of the class to which the penitent belonged—and the manifestation of an opposite spirit. Ver. 15. "And as the people were in expectation"—in a state of excitement, looking for something new—"and all men mused in their hearts of John, whether he were the Christ, or not"—rather, 'whether he himself might be the Christ.' The structure of this clause implies that they could hardly think it, but yet could not help asking themselves whether it might not be; showing both how successful he had been in awakening the expectation of Messiah's immediate appearing, and the high estimation, and even reverence, which his own character commanded. Ver. 16. "John answered"—either to that deputation from Jerusalem, of which we read in John, 1, 19, &c., or on some other occasion, to remove impressions derogatory to his blessed Master, which he knew to be taking hold of the popular mind—"saying unto them all"—in solemn protestation: (We now return to the First Gospel.) 11. I indeed baptize you with water unto repentance (see on v. 6); but he that cometh after me is mightier than I. In Mark and Luke this is more emphatic—"But there cometh the Mightier than I," whose shoes, or 'sandals,' I am not worthy to bear. The sandals were tied and untied, and borne about by the meanest servants, he shall baptize you—the emphatic "He;" 'He it is,' to the exclusion of all others 'that shall baptize you,' with the Holy Ghost. 'So far from entertaining such a thought as laying claim to the honours of Messiahship, the meanest services I can render to that "Mightier than I that is coming after me" are too high an honour for me; I am but the servant, but the Master is coming; I administer but the outward symbol of purification; His it is, as His sole prerogative, to dispense the inward reality.' Beautiful spirit, distinguishing this servant of Christ throughout! and with fire. To take this as a distinct baptism from that of the Spirit—a baptism of the impenitent with hell-fire—is exceedingly unnatural. Yet this was the view of ORIGEN among the Fathers; and among moderns, of NEANDER, MEYER, DE WETTE, and LANGE. Nor is it much better to refer it to the fire of the great day, by which the earth and the works that are therein shall be burned up. Clearly, as we think, it is but the fiery character of the Spirit's operations upon the soul—searching, consuming, refining, sublimating—as nearly all good interpreters understand the words. And thus, in two successive clauses, the two most familiar emblems—scour and fan—are employed to set forth the same purifying operations of the Holy Ghost upon the soul. 12. Whose [winnowing] fan is in his hand—ready for use. This is no other than the preaching of the gospel, even now beginning, the effect of which would be to separate the solid from the spiritually worthless, as wheat, by the winnowing fan, from the chaff. (Cf. the similar representation in Malachi, 3. 1-3.) and he will thoroughly purge his [threshing] floor—that is, the visible church, and gather his wheat—His true-hearted saints; so called for their solid worth (cf. Amos, 9. 9; Luke, 22. 31), into the garner—"the kingdom of their Father," as this "garner" or "barn" is beautifully explained by our Lord in the parable of the Wheat and the Tares (ch. 13. 30, 43), but he will burn up the chaff—empty, worthless professors of religion, void of all solid religious principle and character (see Psalm 1. 4), with unquenchable fire. Singular is the strength of this apparent contradiction of figures;—to be burnt up, but with a fire that is unquenchable; the one expressing the utter destruction of all that constitutes one's true life, the other the confessed consciousness of existence in that awful condition. Luke adds the following important particulars, 3. 18-20: Ver. 18. "And many other things in his exhortation preached he unto the people," showing that we have here but an abstract of his teaching. Besides what we read in John, 1. 29, 33, 34; 3. 27-36; the incidental allusion to his having taught his disciples to pray (Luke, 11. 1)—of which not a word is said elsewhere—shows how varied his teaching was. Ver. 19. "But Herod the tetrarch, being reproved by him for Herodias his brother Philip's wife, and for all the evils which Herod had done." In this last clause we have an important fact, here only mentioned, showing how thorough-going was the fidelity of the Baptist to his royal hearer, and how strong must have been the workings of conscience in that slave of passion when, notwithstanding such plainness, he "did many things, and heard John gladly" (Mark, 6. 20). Ver. 20. "Added yet this above all, that he shut up John in prison." This imprisonment of John, however, did not take place for some time after this; and it is here recorded merely because the Evangelist did not intend to recur to his history till he had occasion to relate the message which he sent to Christ from his prison at Macherus (Luke, 7. 18, &c.).

13-17. BAPTISM OF CHRIST, AND DESCENT OF THE SPIRIT UPON HIM IMMEDIATELY THEREAFTER. (= Mark, 1. 9-11; Luke, 3. 21, 22; John, 1. 31-34.) Baptism of Christ (r. 13-16). 13. Then cometh Jesus from Galilee to Jordan unto John, to be baptized of him. Moses rashly anticipated the Divine call to deliver his people, and for this was fain to flee the house of bondage, and wait in obscurity for forty years more (Exodus, 2. 11, &c.). Not so this Greater than Moses. All but thirty years had He now spent in privacy at Nazareth, gradually ripening for His public work, and calmly awaiting the time appointed of the Father. Now it had arrived; and this movement from Galilee to Jordan is the step, doubtless, of deepest interest to all heaven since that first one which brought Him into the world. Luke (3. 21) has this important addition—"Now when all the people were baptized, it came to pass, that Jesus being baptized," &c.—implying that Jesus waited till all other applicants for baptism that day had been disposed of, ere He stepped forward, that He might not seem to be merely one of the crowd. Thus, as He rode into Jerusalem upon an ass "whereon yet never man sat" (Luke, 19. 30), and lay in a sepulchre "wherein was never man yet laid" (John, 19. 41); so in His baptism too He would be "separate from sinners." 14. But John forbade him—rather, 'was [in the act of] hindering him,' or 'attempting to hinder him'—saying, I have need to be baptized of thee, and comest thou to me! (How John came to recognise Him, when he says he knew Him not, see on John, 1. 31-34.) The emphasis of this most remarkable speech lies all in the pronoun: 'What! shall the Master come for baptism to the servant—the sinless Saviour to a sinner?' That thus much is in the Baptist's words will be clearly seen if it be observed that he evidently regarded Jesus as fitness needing no purification, but rather qualified to impart it to those who did. And do not all his other testimonies to Christ fully bear out this sense of the word? But it were a pity if, in the glory of this testimony to Christ, we should miss the beautiful spirit in which it was borne—"Lord, must I baptize Thee? Can I bring myself to do such a thing?"—reminding us of Peter's exclamation at the supper-table, "Lord, dost Thou wash my feet?" while it has nothing of the false humility and presumption which dictated Peter's next speech, "Thou shalt never wash my feet" (John, 13. 6, 8). 15. And Jesus answering said unto him, Suffer it to be so now—'Let it pass for the present,' &c. 'Thou recollectest, and no wonder, for the seeming incongruity is startling; but in the present case do as thou art bidden,' for thus it becometh us—"us," not in the sense of 'me and thee,' or 'men in general,' but as in John, 3. 11, to fulfil all righteousness. If this be rendered, with SCHLEIERKER, 'every ordinance,' or with CAMPBELL, 'every institution,' the meaning is obvious enough; and the same sense is brought out by "all righteousness," or compliance with everything enjoined, baptism included. Indeed, if this be the meaning, our version perhaps best brings out the force of the opening word "Thus." But we incline to think that our Lord meant more than thus. The import of Circumcision and of Baptism seems to be radically the same. And if our remarks on the circumcision of our Lord (on Luke, 2. 21-24) are well founded, He would seem to have said, 'Thus do I impledge myself to the whole righteousness of the Law—thus symbolically do enter on and fold it all.' Let the thoughtful reader give it in the direct form, "Thou art"—my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased. The verb is put in the aorist to express absolute complacency, once and for ever felt towards Him. The English here, at least to modern ears, is scarcely strong enough. 'I delight' comes the nearest, perhaps, to that ineffable complacency which is manifestly intended; and this is the rather to be preferred, as it would immediately carry the thoughts back to that august Messianic prophecy to which the voice from heaven plainly alluded (Isaiah, 42. 1, "Behold my Servant, whom I uphold; mine Elect, IN WHOM MY SOUL DELIGHTETH." Nor are the words which follow to be overlooked, "I have put my Spirit upon Him; He shall bring forth judgment to the Gentiles." (The LXX. pervert this, as they do most of the Messianic predictions, interpolating the word "Jacob," and applying it to the Jews.) Was this voice heard by the by-standers? From Matthew's form of it, one might suppose it so designed; but it would appear that it was not, and probably John only heard and saw anything peculiar about that great baptism. Accordingly, the words "Hear ye Him" are not added, as at the Transjuga--tion.

Ver 1-11. TEMPTATION OF CHRIST. (=Mark, 1.
12, 13; Luke, 4. 1-13.) 1. Then—an indefinite note of sequence. But Mark's word (1. 12) fixes what we should have presumed was meant, that it was "im-mediately" after His baptism; and with this agrees the statement of Luke (4. 1). was Jesus led up—i.e., from the low Jordan valley to some more elevated spot, of the Spirit—that blessed Spirit immediately before spoken of as descending upon Him at His baptism, and abiding upon Him. Luke, connecting these two scenes, as if the one were but the sequel of the other, says, "Jesus, being full of the Holy Ghost, returned from Jordan, and was led." &c. Mark's expression has a startling sharpness about it—"Immediately the Spirit driveth Him," 'putteth,' or 'hurrieth, Him forth,' or 'impelleth Him.' (See the same word in Mark, 1. 43; 5. 40; Matthew, 9. 23; 13. 52; John, 10. 4.) The thought thus strongly expressed is the mighty constraining impulse of the Spirit under which He went; while Matthew's more gentle expression, "was led up," intimates how purely voluntary on His own part this action was. into the wilderness—probably the wild Judean desert. The particular spot which tradi-tion has fixed upon has hence got the name of Quarantana or Quarantaria, from the forty days,— 'an almost perpendicular wall of rock twelve or fifteen hundred feet above the plain.' [ROBINSON'S Palestine.] The supposition of those who incline to place the Temptation amongst the mountains of Moab is, we think, very improbable. to be tempted—The Greek word (πειρασμος) means simply to try or make proof of; and when ascribed to God in His dealings with men, it means, and can mean no more than this. Thus, Genesis, 22. 1, "It came to pass that God did tempt Abraham," or put his faith to a severe proof. (See Deuteronomy, 8. 2.) But for the most part in Scripture the word is used in a bad sense, and means to entice, solicit, or provoke to sin. Hence the name here given to the wicked one—"the tempter" (v. 3). Accordingly, "to be tempted" here is to be understood both ways. The Spirit conducted Him into the wilderness simply to have His faith tried; but as the agent in this trial was to be the wicked one, whose whole object would be to seduce Him from His allegiance to God, it was a temptation in the bad sense of the term. The unworthy inference which some would draw from this is energetically repelled by an apostle (James, 1. 13-17). of the devil. The word signifies a slanderer—one who casts imputations upon another. Hence that other name given him (Revelation, 12. 10), "The accuser of the brethren, who accuseth them before our God day and night." Mark (1. 13) says, "He was forty days tempted of Satan," a word signifying an adversary, one who lies in wait for, or sets himself in opposition to another. These and other names of the same fallen spirit point to different features in his character or operations. What was the high design of this? First, as we judge, to give our Lord a taste of what lay before Him in the work He had undertaken; next, to make trial of the glorious furniture for it which He had just received; further, to give Him encouragement, by the victory now to be won, to go forward spoiling principalities and powers, until at length He should make a show of them openly, triumphing over them in His Cross; that the tempter, too, might get a taste, at the very outset, of the new kind of material in Man which he would find he had here to deal with; finally, that He might acquire experimental ability "to succour them that are tempted" (Hebrews, 2. 18). The temptation evidently embraced two stages: the one continuing throughout the forty days' fast; the other, at the conclusion of that period. FIRST STAGE: 2. And when he had fasted forty days and forty nights, Luke says, "When they were quite ended," he was afterward an hungered—evidently implying that the sensation of hunger was unfelt during all the forty days; coming on only at their close. So it was apparently with Moses (Exodus, 34. 28) and Elijah (1 Kings, 19. 8) for the same period. A supernatural power of endurance was of course imparted to the body, but this probably operated through a natural law—the absorption of the Redeemer's spirit in the dread conflict with the tempter. (See on Acts, 9. 9.) Had we only this Gospel, we should suppose the temptation did not begin till after this. But it is clear, from Mark's statement that "He was in the wilderness forty days tempted of Satan," and Luke's "being forty days tempted of the devil," that there was a forty days' temptation before the three specific temptations afterwards recorded. And this is what we have called the First Stage. What the precise nature and object of the forty days' temptation was is not recorded. But two things seem plain enough. First, the tempter had utterly failed of his object, else it had not been renewed; and the terms in which he opens his second attack imply as much. But further, the tempter's whole object during the forty days evidently was to get Him to distrust the heavenly testimony borne to Him at His baptism as THE SON OF GOD—to persuade Him to regard it as but a splendid illusion—and, generally, to dislodge from His breast the consciousness of His Sonship. With what plausibility the events of His previous history from the beginning would be urged upon Him in support of this temptation it is easy to imagine. And it makes much in support of this view of the forty days' temptation, that the particulars of it are not recorded; for how the details of such a purely internal struggle could be recorded it is hard to see. If this be correct, how naturally does the SECOND STAGE of the temptation open! In Mark's brief notice of the temptation there is one expressive particular not given either by Matthew or by Luke—that "He was with the wild beasts," no doubt to add terror to solitude, and aggravate the horrors of the whole scene. 3. And when the tempter came to him, Evidently we have here a new scene. he said, If thou be the Son of God, command that these stones be made bread—rather, 'loaves,' answering to 'stones' in the plural; whereas Luke, having said, "Command this stone," in the singular, adds, "that it be made bread," in the singular. The sensation of hunger, unfelt during all the forty days, seems now to have come on in all its keenness—no doubt to open a door to the tempter, of which he is not slow to avail himself: q. d., 'Thou still clingest to that vainglorious confidence, that thou art the Son of God, carried away by those illusory scenes at the Jordan. Thou wast born in a stable—but thou art the Son of God! hurried off to Egypt for fear of Herod's wrath—but thou art the Son of God! a carpenter's roof supplied thee with a home, and in the obscurity of a despicable town of Galilee thou hast spent thirty years—yet still thou art the Son of God; and a voice from heaven, it seems, proclaimed it in thine ears at the Jordan! Be it so; but after that, surely thy days of obscurity and trial should have an end. Why linger for weeks in this desert, wandering among the wild beasts and crazy rocks, unhonoured, unattended, unpitied, ready to starve for want of the necessaries of life? Is this befitting "the Son of God?" At the bidding of "the Son of God" sure those stones shall all be turned into loaves, and in a moment present an abundant repast?' 4. But he answered and said, It is written (Deuteronomy, 8. 3), Man shall not live by bread alone—more emphatically, as in the Greek, 'Not by bread alone shall man live'—but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God. Of all passages in Old Testament scripture, none could have been pitched upon more apposite, perhaps not one so apposite, to our Lord's purpose. "The Lord led thee (said Moses to Israel, at the close of their journeyings; these forty years in the wilderness, to humble thee, and to prove thee, to know what was in thine heart, whether thou wouldest keep his commandments, or no. And he humbled thee, and suffered thee to hunger, and fed thee with manna, which thou knewest not, neither did thy fathers know; that he might make thee know that man doth not live by bread only," &c. 'Now, if Israel spent, not forty days, but forty years in a waste, howling wilderness, where there were no means of human subsistence, not starving, but divinely provided for, on purpose to prove to every age that human support depends not upon bread, but upon God's unswerving word of promise and pledge of all needful providential care, am I, distrusting this word of God, and despairing of relief, to take the law into my own hand? True, the Son of God is able enough to turn stones into bread; but what the Son of God is able to do is not the present question, but what is Man's duty under want of the necessaries of life. And as Israel's condition in the wilderness did not justify their unbelieving murmurings and frequent desperation, so neither would mine warrant the exercise of the power of the Son of God in snatching despairingly at unwarranted relief. As man, therefore, I will await divine supply, nothing doubting that at the fitting time it will arrive.' The second temptation in this Gospel is in Luke's the third. That Matthew's order is the right one will appear, we think, pretty clearly in the sequel. 5. Then the devil taketh him up—rather, 'conducteth him'—into the holy city—so called (as in Isaiah, 48. 2; Nehemiah, 11. 1) from its being "the city of the Great King," the seat of the temple, the metropolis of all Jewish worship, and setteth him on a pinnacle—rather, 'the pinnacle'—of the temple—a certain well-known projection. Whether this refer to the highest summit of the temple, which bristled with golden spikes (JOSEPHUS Antiquities, 8. 6. 6); or whether it refer to another peak, on Herod's royal portico, overhanging the ravine of Kedron, at the valley of Hinnom—an immense tower built on the very edge of this precipice, from the top of which dizzy height Josephus says one could not look to the bottom (Antiquities, 15. 11. 8)—is not certain; but the latter is probably meant. 6. And saith unto him, If thou the Son of God. As this temptation starts with the same point as the first—our Lord's determination not to be disputed out of His Sonship—it seems to us clear that the one came directly after the other; and a the remaining temptation shows that the hope of arriving that point was abandoned, and all was staked upon a desperate venture, we think that remaining temptation is thus shown to be the last; as will appear still more when we come to it. cast thyself down "from hence," Luke, 4. 9: for it is written (Psalm 91, 1, 12). "But what is this I see?" exclaims stately HENRICH HALL, "Satan himself with a Bible under his arm and a text in his mouth!" Doubtless the tempter, having felt the power of God's word in the former temptation, was eager to try the effect of it now his own mouth (2 Corinthians, 11. 14). He shall give his angels charge concerning thee; and in—rather, on—their hands they shall bear thee up, lest at any time thou dash thy foot against a stone. The quotation is precisely as it stands in the Hebrew and LXX., save that after the first clause the words, "to keep thee in all thy ways," is here omitted. Not a few good expositors have thought that this omission was intentional, to conceal the fact that this would not have been one of "His ways," i.e., of duty. But as our Lord's reply makes no allusion to this, but seizes on the great principle involved in the promise quoted; so when we look at the promise itself, it is plain that the sense of it is precisely the same whether the clause in question be inserted or not. 7. Jesus said unto him, It is written again (Deuteronomy, 6. 16—q.d., True, it is so written, and on that promise I implicitly rely; but in using it there is another scripture which must not be forgotten. Thou shalt not tempt the Lord thy God. Preservation in danger is divinely pledged: shall I then create danger, either to put the promised security sceptically to the proof, or wantonly demand a display of it? That were to "tempt the Lord my God," which, being expressly forbidden, would forfeit the right to expect preservation.' 8. Again, the devil taketh him up—conducteth him, as before—into, or 'unto,' an exceeding high mountain, and sheweth him all the kingdoms of the world, and the glory of them. Luke (4. 5) adds the important clause, "in a moment of time;" a clause which seems to furnish a key to the true meaning. That a scene was presented to our Lord's natural eye seems plainly expressed. But to limit this to the most extensive scene which the natural eye could take in, is to give a sense to the expression, "all the kingdoms of the world," quite violent. It remains, then, to gather from the expression, "in a moment of time"—which manifestly is intended to intimate some supernatural operation—that it was permitted to the tempter to extend preternaturally for a moment our Lord's range of vision, and throw a "glory" or glitter over the scene of vision; a thing not inconsistent with the analogy of other scriptural statements regarding the permitted operations of the wicked one. In this case, the "exceeding height" of the "mountain" from which this sight was beheld would favour the effect intended to be produced. 9. And saith unto him, All these things will I give thee—"and the glory of them," adds Luke. But Matthew having already said that this was "showed Him," did not need to repeat it here. Luke (4. 6) adds these other very important clauses, here omitted—"for that is," or 'has been,' "delivered unto me, and to whomsoever I will I give it." Was this wholly false? That were not like Satan's usual policy, which is to insinuate his lies under cover of some truth. What truth, then, is there here? We answer, Is not Satan thrice called by our Lord Himself, "the prince of this world?" John, 12. 31; 14. 30; 16. 11; does not the apostle call him "the god of this world?" (2 Corinthians, 4. 4.)

and still further, is it not said that Christ came to destroy by His death "him that hath the power of death, that is, the devil?" (Hebrews, 2. 14.) No doubt these passages only express men's voluntary subjection to the rule of the wicked one while they live, and his power to surround death to them, when it comes, with all the terrors of the wages of sin. But as this is a real and terrible away, so all Scripture represents men as righteously sold under it. In this sense he speaks what is not devoid of truth, when he says, "All this is delivered unto me." But how does he deliver this "to whomsoever he will?" As employing whomsoever he pleases of his willing subjects in keeping men under his power. In this case his offer to our Lord was that of a deputed supremacy commensurate with his own, though as his gift and for his ends, if thou wilt fall down and worship me. This was the sole, but monstrous condition. No Scripture, it will be observed, is quoted now, because none could be found to support so blasphemous a claim. In fact, he has ceased now to present his temptations under the mask of piety, and stands out unblushingly as the rival of God Himself in his claims on the homage of men. Despairing of success as an angel of light, he throws off all disguise, and with a splendid bribe solicits divine honour. This again shows that we are now at the last of the temptations, and that Matthew's order is the true one. 10. Then saith Jesus unto him, Get thee hence, Satan. Since the tempter has now thrown off the mask, and stands forth in his true character, our Lord no longer deals with him as a pretended friend and pious counsellor, but calls him by his right name—His knowledge of which from the outset He had carefully concealed till now—and orders him off. This is the final and conclusive evidence, as we think, that Matthew's must be the right order of the temptations. For who can well conceive of the tempter's returning to the assault after this, in the pious character again, and hoping still to dislodge the consciousness of His Sonship; while our Lord must in that case be supposed to quote Scripture to one He had called the Devil to his face—thus throwing His pearls before swine? for it is written (Deuteronomy, 6. 13): Thus does our Lord part with Satan on the rock of Scripture, Thou shalt worship. In the Hebrew and LXX. it is, "Thou shalt fear;" but as the sense is the same, so "worship" is here used to show emphatically that what the tempter claimed was precisely what God had forbidden. The Lord thy God, and him only shalt thou serve. The word "serve" in the second clause, is one never used by the LXX. of any but religious service; and in this sense exclusively it is used in the New Testament, as we find it here. Once more the word "only," in the second clause—not expressed in the Hebrew and LXX.—is here added to bring out emphatically the negative and prohibitory feature of the command. [See Galatians, 3. 10 for a similar supplement of the word "all" in a quotation from Deuteronomy, 27. 26.] 11. Then the devil leaveth him, Luke says, "And when the devil had exhausted"—or, 'quite ended,' as in Luke, 4. 2—"every [mode of] temptation, he departed from him till a season." The definite "season" here indicated is expressly referred to by our Lord in John, 14. 30, and Luke, 22. 52, 53. And, behold, angels came and ministered unto him—or supplied Him with food, as the same expression means in Mark, 1. 31, and Luke, 8. 3. Thus did angels to Elijah (1 Kings, 19. 5-8). Excellent critics think that they ministered, not food only, but supernatural support and cheer also. But this would be the natural effect rather than the direct object of the visit, which was plainly what we have expressed. And after having refused to claim the illegitimate ministrations of angels in His behalf, O with what deep joy would He accept their services when sent, unasked, at the close of all this Temptation, direct from Him whom He had so gloriously honoured? What "angels' food" would this repast be to Him; and as He partook of it, might not a Voice from heaven be heard again, by any who could read the Father's mind, "Said I not well, This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased?"

12-25. CHRIST BEGINS HIS GALILEAN MINISTRY.—CALLING OF PETER AND ANDREW, JAMES AND JOHN—HIS FIRST GALILEAN CIRCUIT. (=Mark, 1. 14-20, 26-39; Luke, 4. 14, 15.) There is here a notable gap in the History, which but for the fourth Gospel we should never have discovered. From the former Gospels we should have been apt to draw three inferences, which from the fourth one we know to be erroneous; First, that our Lord awaited the close of John's ministry, by his arrest and imprisonment, before beginning His own; next, that there was but a brief interval between the baptism of our Lord and the imprisonment of John; and further, that our Lord not only opened His work in Galilee, but never ministered out of it, and never visited Jerusalem at all nor kept a Passover till He went thither to become "our Passover, sacrificed for us." The fourth Gospel alone gives the true succession of events; not only recording those important openings of our Lord's public work which preceded the Baptist's imprisonment—extending to the end of the third chapter—but so specifying the Passovers which occurred during our Lord's ministry as to enable us to line off, with a large measure of certainty, the events of the first three Gospels according to the successive Passovers which they embraced. EUSEBIUS, the ecclesiastical historian, who, early in the fourth century, gave much attention to this subject, in noticing these features of the Evangelical Records, says (3. 24) that John wrote his Gospel at the entreaty of those who knew the important materials he possessed, and filled up what is wanting in the first three Gospels. Why it was reserved for the fourth Gospel, published at so late a period, to supply such important particulars in the Life of Christ, it is not easy to conjecture with any probability. It may be, that though not unacquainted with the general facts, they were not furnished with reliable details. But one thing may be affirmed with tolerable certainty, that as our Lord's teaching at Jerusalem was of a depth and grandeur scarcely so well adapted to the prevailing character of the first three Gospels, but altogether congenial to the fourth; and as the bare mention of the successive Passovers, without any account of the transactions and discourses they gave rise to, would have served little purpose in the first three Gospels, there may have been no way of preserving the unity and consistency of each Gospel, so as to furnish by means of them all the precious information we get from them, save by the plan on which they are actually constructed.

Entry into Galilee (v. 12-17). 12. Now when Jesus had heard that John was cast into prison—more simply, "was delivered up;" as recorded in ch. 14. 3-6; Mark, 6. 17-30; Luke, 3. 19, 20—he departed—rather, "withdrew"—into Galilee—as recorded, in its proper place, in John, 4. 1-3. 13. And leaving Nazareth. The prevalent opinion is, that this refers to a first visit to Nazareth after His baptism, whose details are given by Luke (4. 16, &c.); a second visit being that detailed by our Evangelist (ch. 13. 54-58), and by Mark (ch. 6. 1-6). But to us there seem all but insuperable difficulties in the supposition of two visits to Nazareth after His baptism; and on the grounds stated on Luke, 4. 16, &c., we think that the one only visit to Nazareth is that recorded by Matthew (13.), Mark (6.), and Luke (4.). But how, in that case, are we to take the word "leaving Nazareth" here? We answer, just as the same word is used in Acts, 21. 3. "Now when we had sighted Cyprus, and left it on the left, we sailed unto Syria," &c.—i.e., without entering Cyprus at all, but merely "sighting" it, as the nautical phrase is, they steered South East of it, leaving it on the North West. So here, what we understand the Evangelist to say is, that Jesus, on His return to Galilee, did not, as might have been expected, make Nazareth the place of His stated residence, but "leaving (or passing by) Nazareth," he came and dwelt in Capernaum, which is upon the sea coast—"maritime Capernaum," on the North West shore of the sea of Galilee; but the precise spot is unknown. (See on ch. 11. 23.) Our Lord seems to have chosen it for several reasons. Four or five of the Twelve lived there; it had a considerable and mixed population, securing some freedom from that intense bigotry which even to this day characterizes all places where Jews in large numbers dwell nearly alone; it was central, so that not only on the approach of the annual festivals did large numbers pass through it or near it, but on any occasion multitudes could easily be collected about it; and for crossing and recrossing the lake, which our Lord had so often occasion to do, no place could be more convenient. But one other high reason for the choice of Capernaum remains to be mentioned, the only one specified by our Evangelist. In the borders of Zabulon and Naphthaliim—the one lying to the West of the sea of Galilee, the other to the North of it; but the precise boundaries cannot now be traced out. 14. That it might be fulfilled which was spoken by Esaias the prophet (ch. 9. 1, 2, or, as in Hebrew, ch. 8. 23, and 9. 1), saying, 15. The land of Zabulon, and the land of Naphthaliim, [by] the way of the sea—the coast skirting the sea of Galilee westward—beyond Jordan—a phrase commonly meaning eastward of Jordan; but here and in several places it means westward of the Jordan. The word seems to have got the general meaning of "the other side;" the nature of the case determining which side that was. Galilee of the Gentiles—so called from its position, which made it "the frontier" between the Holy Land and the external world. While Ephraim and Judah, as STANLEY says, were separated from the world by the Jordan valley on one side and the hostile Philistines on another, the northern tribes were in the direct highway of all the invaders from the North, in unbroken communication with the promiscuous races who have always occupied the heights of Lebanon, and in close and peaceful alliance with the most commercial nation of the ancient world—the Phœnicians. Twenty of the cities of Galilee were actually annexed by Solomon to the adjacent kingdom of Tyre, and formed with their territory, the "boundary" or "offscouring" ("Gebul" or "Cabul") of the two dominions—at a later time still known by the general name of "the boundaries" ("coasts" or "borders") of Tyre and Sidon." In the first great transportation of the Jewish population, Naphthaliim and Galilee suffered the same fate as the trans-Jordanic tribes before Ephraim or Judah had been molested (2 Kings, 16. 29). In the time of the Christian era this original disadvantage of their position was still felt; the speech of the Galileans "bewrayed them" by its uncouth pronunciation (Matthew, 23. 73; and their distance from the seats of government and civilization at Jerusalem and Caesarea gave them their character for turbulence or independence, according as it was viewed by their friends or their enemies. 16. The people which sat in darkness saw great light; and to them which sat in the region and shadow of death light is sprung up. The prophetic strain to which these words belong commences with Isaiah, 7., to which ch. 6. is introductory, and goes down to the end of ch. 12., which hymns the

Here, Andrew and Peter are called together; there, Andrew having been called, with an unnamed disciple, who was clearly the beloved disciple (see on John, 1. 40), goes and fetches Peter his brother to Christ, who then calls him. 4. Here, John is called along with James his brother; there, John is called along with Andrew, after having at their own request had an interview with Jesus: no mention being made of James, whose call, if it then took place, would not likely have been passed over by his own brother. Thus far nearly all are agreed. But on the next question opinion is divided—Was this the same calling as that recorded in Luke, 6. 1-11? Many able critics think so. But the following considerations are to us decisive against it. First, Here, the four are called separately, in pairs: in Luke, all together. Next, in Luke, after a glorious miracle: here, the one pair are casting their net, the other are mending theirs. Further, Here, our Lord had made no public appearance in Galilee, and so had gathered none around Him; He is walking solitarily by the shores of the lake when He accosts the two pairs of fisher- men: in Luke, "the multitude are lying upon Him, and hearing the word of God, as He stands by the lake of Gennesaret"—a state of things implying a some- what advanced stage of His early ministry, and some popular enthusiasm. Regarding these successive callings, see on Luke, 6. 1.

First Galilean Circuit (v. 23-25). 23. And Jesus went about all Galilee, teaching in their synagogues. These were houses of local worship. It cannot be proved that they existed before the Babylonish captivity; but as they began to be erected soon after it, probably the idea was suggested by the religious inconveniences to which the captives had been subjected. In our Lord's time, the rule was to have one wherever ten learned men, or professed students of the law re- sided; and they extended to Syria, Asia Minor, Greece, and most places of the dispersion. The larger towns had several, and in Jerusalem the number ap- proached 500. In point of officers and mode of wor- ship, the Christian congregations were modelled after the synagogue, and preaching the gospel—"proclaiming the glad tidings" of the kingdom, and healing all manner of sickness—"every disease"—and all manner of disease—"every complaint." The word means any incipient malady causing 'softness' among the people. 24. And his fame went throughout all Syria—reaching first to that part of it adjacent to Galilee, called Syrophenicia (Mark, 7. 31), and thence extending far and wide, and they brought unto him all sick people—"all that were ailing" or 'unwell.' (those) that were taken—for this is a distinct class, not an explanation of the "unwell" class, as our translators understood it: with divers diseases and torments—i.e., acute disorders; and those which were possessed with devils—"that were demonized" or 'possessed with demons,' and those which were lunatic—"moon-struck"—and those that had the palsy—"paralytics," a word not naturalized when our version was made—and he healed them. These heal- ings were at once His credentials and illustrations of "the glad tidings" which He proclaimed. After read- ing this account of our Lord's first preaching tour, can we wonder at what follows? 25. And there followed him great multitudes of people from Galilee, and from Deca- polis—a region lying to the East of the Jordan, so called as containing ten cities, founded and chiefly inhabited by Greek settlers, and from Jerusalem, and from beyond Jordan—meaning from there, but all the adja- cent regions. But the more immediate object for which this is here mentioned is, to give the reader some idea both of the vast concourse and of the varied complexion of eager attendants upon the great Preacher, to whom the astonishing Discourses of the next three chapters was addressed. On the importance which our Lord Himself attached to this first preaching circuit, and the preparation which He made for it, see on Mark, I. 35-36.

CHAPTERS V.—VII.

SERMON ON THE MOUNT.

That this is the same Discourse with that in Luke, 6. 17-49—only reported more fully by Matthew, and less fully, as well as with considerable variation, by Luke—is the opinion of many very able critics (of the Greek commentators; of CALVIN, GROTIUS, MALDONATUS—who stands almost alone among Romish commentators; and of most moderns, as THOLUCK, MEYER, DE WETTE, TISCHENDORF, STIER, WIESLER, ROBINSON). The prevailing opinion of these critics is, that Luke's is the original form of the Discourse, to which Matthew has added a number of sayings, uttered on other occasions, in order to give at one view the great outlines of our Lord's ethical teaching. But that they are two distinct Discourses—the one delivered about the close of His first missionary tour, and the other after a second such tour and the solemn choice of the Twelve—is the judgment of others who have given much attention to such matters (of most Romish commentators, including ERASMUS; and among the moderns, of LANGE, GRESWELL, BIRKS, WEBSTER & WILKINSON). The question is left undecided by ALFORD. AUGUSTIN'S opinion—that they were both delivered on one occasion, Matthew's on the mountain, and to the disciples; Luke's in the plain, and to the promiscuous multitude—is so clumsy and artificial as hardly to deserve notice. To us the weight of argument appears to lie with those who think them two separate Discourses. It seems hard to conceive that Matthew should have put this Discourse before his own calling, if it was not uttered till long after, and was spoken in his own hearing as one of the newly-chosen Twelve. Add to this, that Matthew introduces his Discourse amidst very definite markings of time, which fix it to our Lord's first preaching tour; while that of Luke, which is expressly said to have been delivered immediately after the choice of the Twelve, could not have been spoken till long after the time noted by Matthew. It is hard, too, to see how either Discourse can well be regarded as the expansion or contraction of the other. And as it is beyond dispute that our Lord repeated some of His weightier sayings in different forms, and with varied applications, it ought not to surprise us that, after the lapse of perhaps a year—when, having spent a whole night on the hill in prayer to God, and set the Twelve apart, He found Himself surrounded by crowds of people, few of whom probably had heard the Sermon on the Mount, and fewer still remembered much of it—He should go over again its principal points, with just as much sameness as to show their enduring gravity, but at the same time with that difference which shows His exhaustless fertility as the great Prophet of the Church.

CHAPTER V.

Ver. 1-16. THE BEATITUDES, AND THEIR BEARING UPON THE WORLD. 1. And seeing the multitudes—those mentioned in ch. 4. 25—he went up into a mountain—one of the dozen mountains which ROBINSON says there are in the vicinity of the sea of Galilee, any one of them answering about equally well to the occasion. So charming is the whole landscape that the descriptions of it, from JOSEPHUS downwards (J. W., 4. 10, 8), are apt to be thought a little coloured, and when he was set—'had sat' or 'seated Himself'—his disciples came unto him—already a large circle, more or less attracted and subdued by His preaching and miracles, in addition to the smaller band of devoted adherents.

Though the latter only answered to the subjects of His kingdom, described in this Discourse, there were drawn from time to time into this inner circle souls from the outer one, who, by the power of His matchless word, were constrained to forsake their all for the Lord Jesus. 2. And he opened his mouth—a solemn way of arousing the reader's attention, and preparing him for something weighty (Job, 3. 1; Acts, 8. 35; 10. 34)—and taught them, saying, 3. Blessed, &c. Of the two words which our translators render "blessed," the one here used points more to what is inward, and so might be rendered "happy," in a lofty sense; while the other denotes rather what comes to us from without (as Matthew, 25. 34). But the distinction is not always nicely carried out. One Hebrew word expresses both. On these precious Beatitudes, observe that though eight in number, there are here but seven distinct features of character. The eighth one—the "persecuted for righteousness' sake"—denotes merely the possessors of the seven preceding features, on account of which it is that they are persecuted (2 Timothy, 3. 12). Accordingly, instead of any distinct promise to this class, we have merely a repetition of the first promise. This has been noticed by several critics, who by the sevenfold character thus set forth have rightly observed that a complete character is meant to be depicted, and by the sevenfold blessedness attached to it, a perfect blessedness is intended. Observe, again, that the language in which these beatitudes are couched is purposely fetched from the Old Testament, to show that the new kingdom is but the old in a new form; while the characters described are but the varied forms of that spirituality which was the essence of real religion all along, but had well-nigh disappeared under corrupt teaching. Further, the things here promised, far from being mere arbitrary rewards, will be found in each case to grow out of the characters to which they are attached, and in their completed form are but the appropriate coronation of them. Once more, as "the kingdom of heaven," which is the first and the last thing here promised, has two stages—a present and a future, an initial and a consummate stage—so the fulfilment of each of these promises has two stages—a present and a future, a partial and a perfect stage. 3. Blessed are the poor in spirit. All familiar with Old Testament phraseology know how frequently God's true people are styled "the poor"—the 'oppressed,' 'afflicted,' 'miserable'—"the needy," or both together (as in Psalm 40. 17; Isaiah, 41. 17). The explanation of this lies in the fact that it is generally "the poor of this world" who are "rich in faith" (James, 2. 5; cf. 2 Corinthians, 6. 10, and Revelation, 2. 9); while it is often "the ungodly" who "prosper in the world" (Psalm 73. 12). Accordingly, in Luke (6. 20, 21), it seems to be this class—the literally "poor" and "hungry"—that are specially addressed. But since God's people are in so many places styled "the poor" and "the needy," with no evident reference to their temporal circumstances (as in Psalm 68. 10; 69. 29-33; 132. 15; Isaiah, 61. 1; 66. 2), it is plainly a frame of mind which those terms are meant to express. Accordingly, our translators sometimes render such words "the humble" (Psalm 10. 12, 17), "the meek" (Psalm 22. 26), "the lowly" (Proverbs, 3. 24), as having no reference to outward circumstances. But here the explanatory words, "in spirit," fix the sense to 'those who in their deepest consciousness realize their entire need' (cf. the Greek of Luke, 10. 21; John, 11. 33; 12. 21; Acts, 20. 22; Romans, 12. 11; 1 Corinthians, 4. 3; Philippians, 3.). This self-emptying conviction, that 'before God we are void of everything,' lies at the foundation of all spiritual excellence, according to the teaching of Scripture. Without it we are inaccessible to the riches of Christ;

th it we are in the fitting state for receiving all ritual supplies (Revelation, 3. 17, 18; Matthew, 9.
 13). for theirs is the kingdom of heaven. See on ch.
 2. The poor in spirit not only shall have—their ready have—the kingdom. The very sense of their poverty is begun riches. While others "walk in a in shadow"—"in a shadow," an image—in an unreal world, taking a false view of themselves and all around them—the poor in spirit are rich in the knowledge of their real case. Having courage to look this in the face, and own it guilelessly, they feel strong in the assurance that "unto the upright there iseth light in the darkness" (Psalm 112. 4); and soon breaks forth as the morning. God wants nothing from us as the price of His saving gifts; we have but to feel our universal destitution, and cast ourselves on His compassion (Job, 33. 27, 28; 1 John, 1. 9).
 The poor in spirit are enriched with the fulness of spirit, which is the kingdom in substance; and when we shall say to them from His great white throne, Come, ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you." He will invite them merely the full enjoyment of an already possessed inheritance. 4. Blessed are they that mourn; for they shall be comforted. This "mourning" must not be taken only for that feeling which is wrong from men under pressure of the ills of life, nor yet strictly for sorrow on account of committed sins. Evidently it is an entire feeling which the sense of our spiritual poverty begets; and so the second beatitude is but the complement of the first. The one is the intellectual, the other the emotional aspect of the same thing. It is poverty of spirit that says, "I am undone;" and it is the mourning which this causes that makes it break forth in the form of a lamentation—"Woe is me, for I am undone." Hence this class are termed "mourners in Zion," or, as we might express it, religious mourners, in sharp contrast with all other sorts of mourners, 61. 1-3; 66. 2). Religion, according to the Bible, is neither a set of intellectual convictions nor a bundle of emotional feelings, but a compound of both, the former giving birth to the latter. Thus closely do the first two beatitudes cohere. The mourners shall be comforted." Even now they get beauty for their faces, the oil of joy for mourning, the garment of praise for the spirit of heaviness. Sowing in tears, they reap even here in joy. Still all present comfort, even the best, is partial, interrupted, short-lived.
 In the days of our mourning shall soon be ended, and then God shall wipe away all tears from our eyes.
 Men, in the fullest sense, shall the mourners be comforted." 5. Blessed are the meek; for they shall inherit the earth. This promise to the meek is but a repetition of Psalm 37. 11; only the word which our angelist renders "the meek," after the LXX., is the same which we have found so often translated the poor," showing how closely allied these two sorts of character are. It is impossible, indeed, to be "the poor in spirit" and "the mourners" in spirit should not at the same time be "meek;" that to say, persons of a lowly and gentle carriage.
 In fitting, at least, it is that they should be so, may be seen by the following touching appeal: "Put them mind to be subject to principalities and powers, obey magistrates, to be ready to every good work, speak evil of no man, to be no brawlers, but gentle, meek, and lowly in spirit, as the Lord Jesus Christ, who, being in the form of God, did not count the equality with God a thing to be grasped, but emptied himself, and took the form of a servant, being made in the likeness of men; and being found in the fashion of a man, he humbled himself, and became obedient unto death, yea, unto the death of the cross. Wherefore God also hath highly exalted him, and given him a name which is above every name: that at the name of Jesus every knee should bow, of those in heaven, and of those on earth, and of those under the earth; and that every tongue should confess that the Lord Jesus Christ is the Son of God. And he shall sit on the throne of his Father, and shall reign with him for ever and ever. Amen."
 "My soul," says the sweet Psalmist, "breaketh for and ye shall find rest unto your souls" (Matthew, 11.

 29); and the apostle besought one of the churches by "the meekness and gentleness of Christ" (2 Corinthians, 10. 1). In what esteem this is held by Him who saith not as man saith, we may learn from 1 Peter, 3. 4, where the true adorning is said to be that of "a meek and quiet spirit, which in the sight of God is of great price." Towards men this disposition is the opposite of high-mindedness, and a quarrelsome and revengeful spirit; it "rather takes wrong, and suffers itself to be defrauded" (1 Corinthians, 6.
 7); it "avenges not itself, but rather gives place unto wrath" (Romans, 12. 19); like the meek One, "when reviled, it reviles not again; when it suffers, it threatens not; but commits itself to Him that judgeth righteously" (1 Peter, 2. 19-22). "The earth" which the meek are to inherit might be rendered "the land" — bringing out the more immediate reference to Canaan as the promised land, the secure possession of which was to the Old Testament saints the evidence and manifestation of God's favour resting on them, and the ideal of all true and abiding blessedness.
 Even in the Psalm from which these words are taken the promise to the meek is not held forth as an arbitrary reward, but as having a kind of natural fulfilment. When they delight themselves in the Lord, He gives them the desires of their heart; when they commit their way to Him, He brings it to pass; bringing forth their righteousness as the light, and their judgment as the noon-day: The little that they have, even when despoiled of their rights, is better than the riches of many wicked, &c. (Psalm 37). All things, in short, are theirs—in the possession of that favour which is life, and of those rights which belong to them as the children of God—whether the world, or life, or death, or things present, or things to come; all are theirs (1 Corinthians, 3. 21, 22); and at length, overcoming, they "inherit all things" (Revelation, 21. 7). Thus are the meek the only rightful occupants of a foot of ground or a crust of bread here, and heirs of all coming things. 6. Blessed are they which do hunger and thirst after righteousness: for they shall be filled — "shall be saturated." From this verse, says TROLUCK, "the reference to the Old Testament background ceases." Surprising! On the contrary, none of these beatitudes is more manifestly dug out of the rich mine of the Old Testament. Indeed, how could any one who found in the Old Testament "the poor in spirit," and "the mourners in Zion," doubt that he would also find those same characters also craving that righteousness which they feel and mourn their want of? But what is the precise meaning of "righteousness" here? Lutheran expositors, and some of our own, seem to have a hankering after that more restricted sense of the term in which it is used with reference to the sinner's justification before God, (See Jeremiah, 23. 6; Isaiah, 45. 24; Romans, 4. 6; 2 Corinthians, 5. 21.) But, in so comprehensive a saying as this, it is clearly to be taken—as in v. 10 also—in a much wider sense, as denoting that spiritual and entire conformity to the law of God, under the want of which the saints groan, and the possession of which constitutes the only true sainthood. The Old Testament dwells much on this righteousness, as that which alone God regards with approbation (Psalm 11.
 7, 23. 3; 106. 3; Proverbs, 12. 25; 16. 31; Isaiah, 64. 5, &c.).
 As hunger and thirst are the keenest of our appetites, our Lord, by employing this figure here, plainly means "those whose deepest cravings are after spiritual blessings." And in the Old Testament we find this craving variously expressed:—"Hearken unto me, ye that follow after righteousness, ye that seek the Lord" (Isaiah, 51. 1); "I have waited for thy salvation, O Lord," exclaimed dying Jacob (Genesis, 49. 18);
 "My soul," says the sweet Psalmist, "breaketh for the longing that it hath unto thy judgments at all times" (Psalm 119. 50); and in similar breathings does he give vent to his deepest longings in that and other Psalms. Well, our Lord just takes up here this blessed frame of mind, representing it as the surest pledge of the coveted supplies, as it is the best preparative, and indeed itself the beginning of them. "They shall be saturated," He says; they shall not only have what they so highly value and long to possess, but they shall have their fill of it. Not here, however. Even in the Old Testament this was well understood. "Deliver me," says the Psalmist, in language which, beyond all doubt, stretches beyond the present scene, "from men of the world, which have their portion in this life: As for me, I shall behold thy face in righteousness: I shall be satisfied, when I awake, with thy likeness" (Psalm 17. 13-16). The foregoing beatitudes—the first four—represent the saints rather as conscious of their need of salvation, and acting suitably to that character, than as possessed of it. The next three are of a different kind—representing the saints as having now found salvation, and conducting themselves accordingly. 7. Blessed are the merciful: for they shall obtain mercy. Beautiful is the connection between this and the preceding beatitude. The one has a natural tendency to beget the other. As for the words, they seem directly fetched from Psalm 18. 26. "With the merciful thou wilt show thyself merciful." Not that our mercifulness comes absolutely first. On the contrary, our Lord Himself expressly teaches us that God's method is to awaken in us compassion towards our fellow-men by His own exercise of it, in so stupendous a way and measure, towards ourselves. In the parable of the unmerciful debtor, the servant to whom his lord forgave ten thousand talents was naturally expected to exercise the small measure of the same compassion required for forgiving his fellow-servant's debt of a hundred pence; and it is only when, instead of this, he relentlessly imprisoned him till he should pay it up, that his lord's indignation was roused, and he who was designed for a vessel of mercy is treated as a vessel of wrath (ch. 18. 23-35; and see ch. 5. 23, 24; 6. 15; James, 2. 13). "According to the view given in Scripture," says TRINCH most justly, 'the Christian stands in a middle point, between a mercy received and a mercy yet needed. Sometimes the first is urged upon him as an argument for showing mercy—"forgiving one another, as Christ forgave you" (Colossians, 3. 13; Ephesians, 4. 32); sometimes the last—"Blessed are the merciful: for they shall obtain mercy;" "Forgive, and ye shall be forgiven" (Luke, 6. 37; James, 5. 9). And thus, while he is ever to look back on the mercy received as the source and motive of the mercy which he shows, he also looks forward to the mercy which he yet needs, and which he is assured that the merciful—according to what EXPOSITORS beautifully calls the bestima talis (the gracious requital: of the kingdom of God—shall receive, as a new provocation to its abundant exercise.' The forestates and beginnings of this judicial recompense are richly experienced here below: its perfection is reserved for that day when, from His great white throne, the King shall say, "Come, ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world: for I was an hungry, and thirsty, and a stranger, and naked, and sick, and in prison, and ye ministered unto me." Yes, thus he acted towards us while on earth, even laying down His life for us; and He will not, He cannot disown, in the merciful, the image of Himself. 8. Blessed are the pure in heart: for they shall see God. Here, too, we are on Old Testament ground. There the difference between outward and inward purity, and the acceptableness of the latter only in the sight of God, is everywhere taught. Nor is the 'vision of God' strange to the Old Testament; and though it was an understood thing that this was not possible in the present life (Exodus, 33. 20; and cf. Job, 19. 28, 27; Isaiah, 6. 5), yet spiritually it was known and felt to be the privilege of the saints even here (Genesis, 6. 24; 9. 9; 17. 1; 48. 15; Psalm 27. 4; 34. 9; 63. 2; Isaiah, 33. 3, 11, &c.). But, O with what grand simplicity, brevity, and power is this great fundamental truth here expressed! And in what striking contrast would such teaching appear to that which was then current, in which exclusive attention was paid to ceremonial purification and external morality? This heart-purity begins in a "heart sprinkled from an evil conscience," or a "conscience purged from dead works" (Hebrews, 10. 22; 9. 14; and see Acts, 15. 9); and this also is taught in the Old Testament (Psalm 51. 2; cf. Romans, 4. 5-8; and Isaiah, 4. 5-8). The conscience thus purged—the heart thus sprinkled—there is light within wherewith to see God. "If we say that we have fellowship with Him, and walk in darkness, we lie, and do not the truth: but if we walk in the light, as He is in the light, we have fellowship one with the other"—He with us and we with Him—"and the blood of Jesus Christ His Son cleanseth us"—"us who have this fellowship, and who, without such continual cleansing, would soon lose it again—"from all sin" (1 John, 1. 6, 7). "Whosoever sinneth hath not seen Him, neither known Him" (1 John, 3. 6): "He that doeth evil hath not seen God" (3 John, 11). The inward vision thus clarified, and the whole inner man in sympathy with God, each looks upon the other with complacency and joy, and we are "changed into the same image from glory to glory." But the full and beatific vision of God is reserved for that time to which the Psalmist stretches his views—"As for me, I shall behold Thy face in righteousness: I shall be satisfied, when I awake, with Thy likeness" (Psalm 17. 16). Then shall His servants serve Him: and they shall see His face; and His name shall be in their foreheads (Revelation, 22. 3, 4). They shall see Him as He is (1 John, 3. 2). But, says the apostle, expressing the converse of this beatitude—"Follow holiness, without which no man shall see the Lord" (Hebrews, 12. 14). 9. Blessed are the peacemakers—who not only study peace, but diffuse it—for they shall be called the children—shall be called sons—of God. Of all these beatitudes this is the only one which could hardly be expected to find its definite ground in the Old Testament; for that most glorious character of God, the likeness of which appears in the peacemakers, had yet to be revealed. His glorious name, indeed—as "The Lord, the Lord God, merciful and gracious, long-suffering, and abundant in goodness and truth, forgiving iniquity and transgression and sin"—had been proclaimed in a very imposing manner (Exodus, 34. 6), and manifested in action with affecting frequency and variety in the long course of the ancient economy. And we have undeniable evidence that the saints of that economy felt its transforming and ennobling influence on their own character. But it was not till Christ "made peace by the blood of the cross" that God could manifest Himself as "the God of peace, that brought again from the dead our Lord Jesus, that great Shepherd of the sheep, through the blood of the everlasting covenant" (Hebrews, 12. 20)—could reveal Himself as "in Christ reconciling the world unto Himself, not imputing their trespasses unto them," and hold Himself forth in the astonishing attitude of beseeching men to be "reconciled to Himself" (2 Corinthians, 5. 19, 20). When this reconciliation actually takes place, and one has "peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ"—even "the peace of God which passeth all understanding"—the peace-receivers be-ground in the Old Testament, is evident including words where the encouragement to endure such persecutions consists in its continuation of what was experienced by the servant servants of God. But how, it may be asked, could such beautiful features of character be ascribed? To this the following answers are given: "Every one that doeth evil hateth the light, because his deeds are evil, and his deeds are evil." "The world cannot hate you; it hateth, because I testify of it, that the works are evil." "If ye were of the world, the world would love you: because ye are not of the world, therefore the world hateth you." "There is yet one man whom I have chosen you out of the world, therefore the world hateth you." "There is yet one man whom I have chosen you out of the world, therefore the world hateth you: he is Ahab the son of Zebulun; for he is the Lord's anointed: but I hate him; for he never did good unto me, but always evil" (John, 3. 19; 2 Chronicles, 18. 7). But more particularly the characters here described are all in the spirit of the world, inasmuch that the object of this Discourse as breathed that spirit has been startled, and had their whole system and action rudely dashed. Poverty of heart, counter to the pride of men's heart; a partition, in the view of one's universal deities, God, is ill relished by the callous, unfeeling, self-satisfied world; a meek and lowly disposition, regarded as pusillanimity against the proud, resentful spirit of that craving after spiritual blessings is too unpleasantly the lust of the flesh, the eye, and the pride of life; so does a merciful, hard-heartedness of the world; purity of life, and a life of prayer, with painted hypocrisy; and a life of prayer cannot easily be endured by the common, ungodly world. Thus does "righteousness" become "persecuted." But blessed are they that of this, dare to be righteous, for theirs is the reward of heaven. As this was the reward proposed to the poor in spirit—the leading one of these virtues—of course it is the proper portion proposed to be persecuted for exemplifying them. 11. When men shall revile you—or abuse you, in opposition to backbiting. (See Mark, intimating that such characters were in existence, and that already they were before Him. Accordingly, from characters He comes to persons possessing them, saying, "Blessed are ye when men shall revile you," etc. And now, continuing this mode of direct personal address, He startles these humble, unknown men by pronouncing them the exalted benefactors of their whole species. 13. Ye are the salt of the earth—to preserve it from corruption, to season its insipidity, to freshen and sweeten it. The value of salt for these purposes is abundantly referred to by classical writers as well as in Scripture; and hence its symbolical significance in the religious offerings as well of those without as of those within the pale of revealed religion. In Scripture, mankind, under the unrestrained workings of their own evil nature, are represented as entirely corrupt. Thus, before the flood (Genesis, 4. 11, 12; after the flood (Genesis, 8. 21); in the days of David (Psalm 14. 2, 3); in the days of Isaiah (Isaiah, 1. 5, 6); and in the days of Paul (Ephesians, 2. 1-3; see also Job, 14. 4; 15. 15, 16; John, 3. 6; compared with Romans, 8. 3; Titus, 3. 2, 3). The remedy for this, says our Lord here, is the active presence of His disciples among their fellows. The character and principles of Christians, brought into close contact with it, are designed to arrest the festering corruption of humanity and season its insipidity. But how, it may be asked, are Christians to do this office for their fellow-men, if their righteousness only exasperate them, and recoil, in every form of persecution, upon themselves? The answer is, That is but the first and partial effect of their Christianity upon the world: though the great proportion would dislike and reject the truth, a small but noble band would receive and hold it fast; and in the struggle that would ensue, one and another even of the opposing party would come over to His ranks, and at length the Gospel would carry all before it. but if the salt have lost its savour—'become unsavoury' or 'insipid,' losing its saline or salting property. The meaning is, If that Christianity on which the health of the world depends, does in any age, region, or individual, exist only in name, or if it contain not those saving elements for want of which the world languishes, wherewith shall it be salted?—how shall the salting qualities be restored to it? (Cf. Mark, 9.

not. If a man lose his grace, how shall that grace be restored to him? but, since living Christianity is the only "salt of the earth," if men lose that, what else can supply its place? What follows is the appalling answer to this question. It is thenceforth good for nothing, but to be cast out—a figurative expression of indignant exclusion from the kingdom of God (cf. ch. 8. 12; 22. 13; John, 6. 37; 9. 34), and to be trodden under foot of men—expressive of contempt and scorn. It is not the mere want of a certain character, but the want of it in those whose profession and appearance were fitted to beget expectation of finding it. 14. Ye are the light of the world—This being the distinctive title which our Lord appropriates to Himself (John, 8. 12; 9. 5; and see John, 1. 4, 9; 3. 19; 12. 36, 36)—a title expressly said to be unsuitable even to the highest of all the prophets (John, 1. 9)—it must be applied here by our Lord to His disciples only as they shine with His light upon the world, in virtue of His Spirit dwelling in them, and the same mind being in them which was also in Christ Jesus. Nor are Christians anywhere else so called. Nay, as if to avoid the august title which the Master has appropriated to Himself, Christians are said to "shine"—not as "lights," as our translators render it, but—"as luminaries in the world" (Philippians, 2. 15); and the Baptist is said to have been "the burning and shining"—not "light," as in our translation, but—"lamp" of his day (John, 8. 35). Let it be observed, too, that while the two figures of salt and sunlight both express the same function of Christians—their blessed influence on their fellow-men—they each set this forth under a different aspect. Salt operates internally, in the mass with which it comes in contact; the sunlight operates externally, irradiating all that it reaches. Hence Christians are warily styled "the salt of the earth"—with reference to the masses of mankind with whom they are expected to mix; but "the light of the world"—with reference to the vast and variegated surface which feels its fructifying and gladdening radiance. The same distinction is observable in the second pair of those seven parables which our Lord spoke from the Galilean lake—that of the "mustard seed," which grew to be a great overshadowing tree, answering to the sunlight which invests the world, and that of the "leaven," which a woman took and, like the salt, hid in three measures of meal, till the whole was leavened (ch. 13. 31-33). A city that is set on an hill cannot be hid—nor can it be supposed to have been so built except to be seen by many eyes. 15. Neither do men light a candle—or 'lamp'—and put it under a bushel—a dry measure—but on a candlestick—rather, 'under the bushel, but on the lamp-stand.' The article is inserted in both cases to express the familiarity of every one with those household utensils, and it giveth light—'shineth'—unto all that are in the house. 16. Let your light so shine before men, that they may see your good works, and glorify your Father which is in heaven. As nobody lights a lamp only to cover it up, but places it so conspicuously as to give light to all who need light, so Christians, being the light of the world, instead of hiding their light, are so to hold it forth before men that they may see what a life the disciples of Christ lead, and seeing this, may glorify their Father for so redeeming, transforming, and ennobling earth's sinful children, and opening to themselves the way to like redemption and transformation.

17-48. IDENTITY OF THESE PRINCIPLES WITH THOSE OF THE ANCIENT ECONOMY, IN CONTRAST WITH THE REIGNING TRADITIONAL TEACHING. Exposition of Principles (v. 17-20). 17. Think not that I am come—'that I came'—to destroy the Law, or the Prophets—i. e., 'the authority and principles of the Old Testament.' (On the phrase, see ch. 7. 12; 22. 40; Luke, 16. 16; Acts, 13. 15.) This general way of taking the phrase is much better than understanding "the Law" and "the Prophets" separately, and enquiring, as many good critics do, in what sense our Lord could be supposed to meditate the subversion of each. To the various classes of His hearers, who might view such supposed abrogation of the Law and the Prophets with very different feelings, our Lord's announcement would, in effect, be such as this—'Ye who "tremble at the word of the Lord," fear not that I am going to sweep the foundation from under your feet: Ye restless and revolutionary spirits, hope not that I am going to head any revolutionary movement: And ye who hypocritically affect great reverence for the Law and the Prophets, pretend not to find anything in my teaching derogatory to God's living oracles.' I am not come to destroy, but to fulfil. 'Not to subvert, abrogate, or annul, but to establish the Law and the Prophets—to unfold them, to embody them in living form, and to enshrine them in the reverence, affection, and character of men, am I come.' 18. For verily I say unto you. Here, for the first time, does that august expression occur in our Lord's recorded teaching, with which we have grown so familiar as hardly to reflect on its full import. It is the expression, manifestly, of supreme legislative authority; and as the subject in connection with which it is uttered is the Moral Law, no higher claim to an authority strictly divine could be advanced. For when we observe how jealously Jehovah asserts it as His exclusive prerogative to give law to men (Leviticus, 18. 1-5; 19. 37; 23. 1-4, 13-16, &c.), such language as this of our Lord will appear totally unsuitable, and indeed abhorrent, from any creature-lips. When the Baptist's words—"I say unto you" (ch. 3. 9)—are compared with those of his Master here, the difference of the two cases will be at once apparent. Till heaven and earth pass. Though even the Old Testament announces the ultimate "perdition of the heavens and the earth," in contrast with the immutability of Jehovah (Psalm 102. 24-27), the prevalent representation of the heavens and the earth in Scripture, when employed as a popular figure, is that of their stability (Psalm 119. 89-91; Ecclesiastes, 1. 4; Jeremiah, 33. 25, 26). It is the enduring stability, then, of the great truths and principles, moral and spiritual, of the Old Testament Revelation which our Lord thus expresses. one jot—the smallest of the Hebrew letters—or one tittle—one of those little strokes by which alone some of the Hebrew letters are distinguished from others like them—shall in no wise pass from the law, till all be fulfilled. The meaning is, that 'not so much as the smallest loss of authority or vitality shall ever come over the law.' The expression, "till all be fulfilled," is much the same in meaning as 'it shall be had in undiminished and enduring honour, from its greatest to its least requirements.' Again, this general way of viewing our Lord's words here seems far preferable to that derisive understanding of them which would require us to determine the different kinds of "fulfilment" which the moral and the ceremonial parts of it were to have. 19. Whosoever therefore shall break—rather, 'dissolve,' 'annul,' or 'make invalid'—one of these least commandments—an expression equivalent to 'one of the least of these commandments'—and shall teach men so—referring to the Pharisees and their teaching, as is plain from the next verse, but of course embracing all similar schools and teaching in the Christian Church—he shall be called the least in the kingdom of heaven. As the thing spoken of is not the practical breaking, or disobeying, of the law, but annulling or enervating its obligation by a vicious system of interpretation, and teaching others to do the same; so the thing threatened is not exclusion from heaven, and still less the lowest place in it, but a degraded and contemptuous position in the present stage of the kingdom of God. In other words, 'they shall be re-duced by the retributive providence that overtakes them, to the same condition of dishonour to which, by their system and their teaching, they have brought down those eternal principles of God's law.' but whoever shall do and teach them—whose principles and teaching go to exalt the authority and honour of God's law, in its lowest as well as highest requirements—the same shall be called great in the kingdom of heaven—'shall, by that providence which watches over the honour of God's moral administration, be raised to the same position of authority and honour to which they exalt the law.' 20. For I say unto you, That except your righteousness shall exceed the righteousness of the scribes and Pharisees. The superiority to the Pharisaic righteousness here required is plainly in kind, not degree; for all Scripture teaches that entrance into God's kingdom, whether in its present or future stage, depends, not on the degree of our excellence in anything, but solely on our having the character itself which God demands. Our righteousness, then—if it is to contrast with the outward and formal righteousness of the scribes and Pharisees—must be inward, vital, spiritual. Some, indeed, of the scribes and Pharisees themselves might have the very righteousness here demanded; but our Lord is speaking, not of persons, but of the system they represented and taught. ye shall in no case enter into the kingdom of heaven. If this refer, as in the preceding verse, rather to the earthly stage of this kingdom, the meaning is, that without a righteousness exceeding that of the Pharisees, we cannot be members of it at all, save in name. This was no new doctrine (Romans, 2: 25, 26; 9: 6; Philippians, 3: 3). But our Lord's teaching here stretches beyond the present scene, to that everlasting stage of the kingdom, where without "purity of heart" none "shall see God."

The spirituality of the true righteousness, in contrast with that of the Scribes and Pharisees, illustrated from the Sixth Commandment (v. 21-26). 21. Ye have heard that it was said by them of old time—or, as in the margin, "to them of old time." Which of these translations is the right one has been much controverted. Either of them is grammatically defensible, though the latter—"to the ancients"—is more consistent with New Testament usage (see the Greek of Romans, 9: 12, 26; Revelation, 6: 11; 9: 4); and most critics decide in favour of it. But it is not a question of Greek only. Nearly all who would translate "to the ancients" take the speaker of the words quoted to be Moses in the law; "the ancients" to be the people to whom Moses gave the law; and the intention of our Lord here to be to contrast His own teaching, more or less, with that of Moses; either as opposed to it—as some go the length of affirming—or at least as modifying, enlarging, elevating it. But who can reasonably imagine such a thing, just after the most solemn and emphatic proclamation of the perpetuity of the law, and the honour and glory in which it was to be held under the new economy? To us it seems as plain as possible that our Lord's one object is to contrast the traditional perversions of the law with the true sense of it as expounded by Himself. A few of those who assent to this still think that "to the ancients" is the only legitimate translation of the words; understanding that our Lord is reporting what had been said to the ancients, not by Moses, but by the perverters of his law. We do not object to this; but we incline to think with BEZA, and after him with FRITZSCHE, OLBRACHEN, STEIGER, and BLOOMFIELD, that "by the ancients" must have been what our Lord meant here, referring to the corrupt teachers rather than the perverted people. Thou shalt not kill:—q. d., "This being all that the law requires, whosoever has imbrued his hands in his brother's blood, but he only, is guilty of a breach of this commandment; and whosoever shall kill shall be in danger of—'liable to'—the judgment—i. e., of the sentence of those inferior courts of judicature which were established in all the principal towns, in compliance with Deuteronomy, 16: 16. Thus was this commandment reduced, from a holy law of the heart-searching God, to a mere criminal statute, taking cognizance only of outward actions, such as that which we read in Exodus, 21: 12; Leviticus, 24: 17, 22. But I say unto you. Mark the authoritative tone in which—as Himself the Lawgiver and Judge—Christ now gives the true sense, and explains the deep reach, of the commandment. That whosoever is angry with his brother without a cause shall be in danger of the judgment; and whosoever shall say to his brother, Raca! shall be in danger of the council; but whosoever shall say, Thou fool! shall be in danger of hell fire. It is unreasonable to deny, as ALEXANDER does, that three degrees of punishment are here meant to be expressed, and to say that it is but a threefold expression of one and the same thing. But Romish expositors greatly err in taking the first two—"the judgment" and "the council"—to refer to degrees of temporal punishment with which lesser sins were to be visited under the Gospel, and only the last—"hell fire"—to refer to the future life. All three clearly refer to divine retribution, and that alone, for branches of this commandment; though this is expressed by an allusion to Jewish tribunals. The "judgment," as already explained, was the lowest of these; the "council," or 'Sanhedrim'—which sat at Jerusalem—was the highest; while the word used for "hell fire" contains an allusion to the "valley of the son of Hinnom" (Joshua, 18: 16). In this valley the Jews, when steeped in idolatry, went the length of burning their children to Moloch "on the high places of Tophet"—in consequence of which good Josiah defiled it, to prevent the repetition of such abominations (2 Kings, 23: 10); and from that time forward, if we may believe the Jewish writers, a fire was kept burning in it to consume the carrion, and all kinds of impurities, that collected about the capital. Certain it is, that while the final punishment of the wicked is described in the Old Testament by allusions to this valley of Tophet or Hinnom (Isaiah, 30: 33; 66: 24), our Lord Himself describes the same by merely quoting these terrible descriptions of the evangelical prophet (Mark, 9: 43-48). What precise degrees of unholiness towards our brother are indicated by the words "Raca" and "fool" it would be as useless as it is vain to enquire. Every age and every country has its modes of expressing such things; and, no doubt, our Lord seized on the then current phraseology of unholiness and contempt, merely to express and condemn the different degrees of such feeling when brought out in words, as He had immediately before condemned the feeling itself. In fact, so little are we to make of mere words, apart from the feeling which they express, that as anger is expressly said to have been borne by our Lord towards His enemies, though mixed with "grief for the hardness of their hearts" (Mark, 3: 5), and as the apostle teaches us that there is an anger which is not sinful (Ephesians, 4: 26); so in the Epistle of James (2: 20) we find the words, "O vain" or 'empty' man; and our Lord Himself applies the very word "fools" twice in one breath to the blind guides of the people (ch. 23: 17, 19)—although, in both cases, it is to false reasoners rather than persons that such words are applied. The spirit, then, of the whole statement may be thus given—"For ages ye have been taught that the sixth commandment, for example, is broken only by the murderer, to pass sentence upon whom is the proper business of the recognised tribunals; but I say unto you that it is broken even by causeless anger, which is but hatred in the bud, as hatred is incipient murder: 1 John, 3. 15; and if by the feelings, much more by those words in which all ill feeling, from the slightest to the most envenomed, are wont to be cast upon a brother: and just as there are gradations in human courts of judicature, and in the sentences which they pronounce according to the degrees of criminality, so will the judicial treatment of all the breakers of this commandment at the divine tribunal be according to their real criminality before the heart-searching Judge.' O what holy teaching is this! 23. Therefore—to apply the foregoing, and show its paramount importance—if thou bring thy gift to the altar, and there rememberest that thy brother hath aught—of just complaint against thee; 24. Leave there thy gift before the altar, and go thy way; first be reconciled to thy brother. The meaning evidently is—not, 'dismiss from thine own breast all ill-feeling,' but 'set thy brother to dismiss from his mind all grudge against thee.' and then come and offer thy gift. 'The picture,' says THEOLUCK, 'is drawn from life. It transports us to the moment when the Israelite, having brought his sacrifice to the court of the Israelites, awaited the instant when the priest would approach to receive it at his hands. He waits with his gift at the rails which separate the place where he stands from the court of the priests, into which his offering will presently be taken, there to be slain by the priest, and by him presented upon the altar of sacrifice.' It is at this solemn moment, when about to cast himself upon divine mercy, and seek in his offering a seal of divine forgiveness, that the offerer is supposed, all at once, to remember that some brother has a just cause of complaint against him through breach of this commandment in one or other of the ways just indicated. What then? Is he to say, As soon as I have offered this gift I will go straight to my brother, and make it up with him? Nay: but before another step is taken—even before the offering is presented!—this reconciliation is to be sought, though the gift have to be left unoffered before the altar. The converse of the truth here taught is very strikingly expressed in Mark, 11. 25, 26. "And when ye stand praying (in the very act), forgive, if ye have aught of just complaint: against any; that your Father also which is in heaven may forgive you your trespasses. But if ye do not forgive, neither will your Father which is in heaven forgive you." Hence the beautiful practice of the early Church, to see that all differences amongst brethren and sisters in Christ were made up, in the spirit of love, before going to the Holy Communion; and the Church of England has a rubrical direction to this effect in her Communion service. Certainly, if this be the highest act of worship on earth, such reconciliation—though obligatory on all other occasions of worship—must be peculiarly so then. 25. Agree with thine adversary—thine opponent in a matter cognizable by law, quickly, while thou art in the way with him—"to the magistrate," as in Luke, 12. 58; lest at any time—here, rather, 'lest at all,' or simply 'lest' the adversary deliver thee to the judge, and the judge—having pronounced thee in the wrong, deliver thee to the officer—the official whose business it is to see the sentence carried into effect, and thou be cast into prison. 26. Verily I say unto thee, Thou shalt by no means come out thence, till thou hast paid the uttermost farthing—a fractional Roman coin, to which our "farthing" answers sufficiently well. That our Lord meant here merely to give a piece of prudential advice to his hearers, to keep out of the hands of the law and its officials by settling all disputes with one another privately, is not for a moment to be supposed, though there are critics of a school low enough to suggest this. The concluding words—"Verily I say unto thee, Thou shalt by no means come out." &c.—manifestly show that though the language is drawn from human disputes and legal procedure, He is dealing with a higher than any human quarrel, a higher than any human tribunal, a higher than any human and temporal sentence. In this view of the words—in which nearly all critics worthy of the name agree—the spirit of them may be thus expressed:—"In expounding the sixth commandment, I have spoken of offences between man and man; reminding you that the offender has another party to deal with besides him whom he has wronged on earth, and assuring you that all worship offered to the Searcher of hearts by one who knows that a brother has just cause of complaint against him, and yet takes no steps to remove it, is vain: But I cannot pass from this subject without reminding you of One whose cause of complaint against you is far more deadly than any that man can have against man; and since with that Adversary you are already on the way to judgment, it will be your wisdom to make up the quarrel without delay, lest sentence of condemnation be pronounced upon you, and then will execution straightway follow, from the effects of which you shall never escape as long as any remnant of the offence remains unexpiated." It will be observed that as the principle on which we are to "agree" with this "Adversary" is not here specified, and the precise nature of the retribution that is to light upon the despisers of this warning is not to be gathered from the mere use of the word "prison," so, the remedilessness of the punishment is not in so many words expressed, and still less is its actual execution taught. The language on all these points is designedly general; but it may safely be said that the unexpiated denotation of future punishment—elsewhere so clearly and awfully expressed by our Lord Himself, as in v. 29 and 30, and Mark, 9. 43, 44—is the only doctrine with which His language here quite naturally and fully accords. (Cf. ch. 18. 30, 34.)

The same subject illustrated from the Seventh Commandment (v. 27-32). 27. Ye have heard that it was said. The words "by," or "to them of old time," in this verse are insufficiently supported, and probably were not in the original text. Thou shalt not commit adultery. Interpreting this seventh, as they did the sixth commandment, the traditional perverters of the law restricted the breach of it to acts of criminal intercourse between, or with, married persons exclusively. Our Lord now dissipates such delusions. 28. But I say unto you, That whosoever looketh on a woman to lust after her—with the intent to do so, as the same expression is used in ch. 6. 1; or, with the full consent of his will, to feed thereby his unholily desires, hath committed adultery with her already in his heart. We are not to suppose, from the word here used—"adultery"—that our Lord means to restrict the breach of this commandment to married persons, or to criminal intercourse with such. The expressions, "whosoever looketh," and "looketh upon a woman," seem clearly to extend the range of this commandment to all forms of impurity, and the counsels which follow—as they most certainly were intended for all, whether married or unmarried—seem to confirm this. As in dealing with the sixth commandment our Lord first expounds it, and then in the four following verses applies His exposition, so here, He first expounds the seventh commandment, and then in the four following verses applies His exposition. 29. And if thy right eye—the reader and the dearer of the two, offend thee—be a 'trap-spring,' or, as in the New Testament, be 'an occasion of stumbling' to thee, pluck it out, and cast it from thee—implying a certain indignant promptitude, heedless of what-means that we are to strike at the root of evil dispositions, as well as cut off the occasions that tend to stimulate them. For it is probable that one of thy members should perish, and not whole body should be cast into hell. He who he warning to "cast from him," with in-romptitude, an offending member, will find body "cast," with a retributive prompt-ndignation, "into hell." Sharp language n the lips of Love incarnate! 30. And if hand—the organ of action, to which the eye send thee, cut it off, and cast it from thee: for able, &c. See on v. 20. The repetition, in terms, of such stern truths and awful lessons aracteristic of our Lord's manner of teach-ark, a 43-48. 31. It hath been said. This form was perhaps intentional, to mark a from the commandments of the Decalogue enactment on the subject of Divorce, quoted itonomy, 24. 1. The law of Divorce—ac- its strictness or laxity—has so intimate a pon purity in the married life, that nothing more natural than to pass from the seventh ment to the loose views on that subject ent. Whosoever shall put away his wife, let her a writing of divorcement—a legal check kless and tyrannical separation. The one s ground of divorce allowed by the enact- ; quoted was "some uncleanness"—in other nuzual infidelity. But while one school of ers (that of Shammai) explained this quite as prohibiting divorce in every case save adultery, another school (that of Hillel) the expression so far as to include every- he wife offensive or disagreeable to the hus- ew of the law too well fitted to minister to and depraved inclination not to find ex- vour. And, indeed, to this day the Jews ces on the most frivolous pretexts. It was his that our Lord uttered what follows: 32. unto you, That whosoever shall put away his ag for the cause of fornication, causeth her to nitery—i. e., drives her into it, in case she gain; and whosoever shall marry her that is for anything short of conjugal infidelity,

But so narrow was the circle of them that a man might swear, says LIGHTFOOT, a hundred thousand times and yet not be guilty of vainswearing. Hardly anything was regarded as an oath if only the name of God were not in it; just as among ourselves, as TRKNEH well remarks, a certain lingering reverence for the name of God leads to cutting off portions of His name, or uttering sounds nearly resembling it, or substituting the name of some heathen deity, in profane exclamations or asseverations. Against all this our Lord now speaks decisively; teaching His audience that every oath carries an appeal to God, whether named or not. neither by heaven; for it is God's throne: 35. Nor by the earth; for it is his footstool (quoting Isaiah, 66. 1); neither by Jerusalem; for it is the city of the great King (quoting Psalm 48. 2. 36. Neither shalt thou swear by thy head, because thou canst not make one hair white or black. In the other oaths specified, God's name had been uttered, because it was instantly suggested by the mention of His "throne," His "footstool," His "city." But in swearing by our own head and the like, the objection lies in their being 'beyond our control,' and therefore profanely assumed to have a stability which they have not. 37. But let your communication—'your word,' in ordinary intercourse, be, Yes, yes; Nay, nay:—'Let a simple Yes and No suffice, in affirming the truth or the untruth of anything.' (See James, 5. 12, and 2 Corinthians, 1. 17, 18.) for whatsoever is more than these cometh of evil—not 'of the evil One,' though an equally correct rendering of the words, and one which some expositors prefer. It is true that all evil in our world is originally of the devil, that it forms a kingdom at the head of which he sits, and that, in every manifestation of it he has an active part. But any reference to this here seems unnatural, and the allusion to this passage in the Epistle of James (5. 12) seems to show that this is not the sense of it—'Let your yea be yea; and your nay, nay; lest ye fall into condemnation.' The untruthfulness of our corrupt nature shows itself not only in the tendency to deviate from the strict truth, but in the disposition to suspect others of doing the same; and as this is not diminished, but rather aggravated, by the simple Yes and No come soon to be more relied on than the most solemn asseverations of others. Thus does the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, like a tree cast into the bitter waters of human corruption, heal and sweeten them.

Some Subject—Retaliation (v. 38-42). We have here the converse of the preceding lessons. They were negative; these are positive. 38. Ye have heard that it hath been said (Exodus, 21. 23-25; Leviticus, 24. 19, 20; Deuteronomy, 19. 21). An eye for an eye, and a tooth for a tooth—i.e., whatever penalty was regarded as a proper equivalent for these. This law of retribution—designed to take vengeance out of the hands of private persons, and commit it to the magistrate—was abused in the opposite way to the commandments of the Decalogue. While they were reduced to the level of civil enactments, this judicial regulation was held to be a warrant for taking redress into their own hands, contrary to the injunctions of the Old Testament itself (Proverbs, 20. 22; 24. 29). 39. But I say unto you, That ye resist not evil; but whosoever shall smite thee on thy right cheek, turn to him the other also. Our Lord's own meek, yet dignified bearing, when smitten rudely on the cheek (John, 18. 22, 23), and not literally presenting the other, is the best comment on these words. It is the preparedness, after one indignity, not to invite but to submit meekly to another, without retaliation, which this strong language is meant to convey. 40. And if any man will sue thee at the law, and take away thy coat—the inner garment; in pledge for a debt (Exodus, 22. 26, 27)—let him have thy cloak also—the outer and more costly garment. This overcoat was not allowed to be retained over-night as a pledge from the poor, because they used it for a bed-covering. 41. And whosoever shall compel thee to go a mile, go with him twain—an allusion, probably, to the practice of the Romans and some eastern nations, who, when Government dispatches had to be forwarded, obliged the people not only to furnish horses and carriages, but to give personal attendance, often at great inconvenience, when required. But the thing here demanded is a readiness to submit to unreasonable demands of whatever kind, rather than raise quarrels, with all the evils resulting from them. What follows is a beautiful extension of this precept. 42. Give to him that asketh thee. The sense of unreasonable asking is here implied (cf. Luke, 6. 30). and from him that would borrow of thee turn not thou away. Though the word signifies classically 'to have money lent to one on security,' or 'with interest,' yet as this was not the original sense of the word, and as usury was forbidden among the Jews (Exodus, 22. 25. &c.), it is doubtless simple borrowing which our Lord here means, as indeed the whole strain of the exhortation implies. This shows that such counsels as "Owe no man anything" (Romans, 13. 8) are not to be taken absolutely; else the Scripture commendations of the righteous for "lending" to his necessitous brother (Psalm 37. 26; 112. 5; Luke, 6. 37) would have no application. Turn not thou away—a graphic expression of unfeeling refusal to relieve a brother in extremity.

Same Subject—Love to Enemies (v. 43-48). 43. Ye have heard that it hath been said (Leviticus, 19. 18). Thou shalt love thy neighbour. To this the corrupt teachers added, and hate thine enemy—as if the one were a legitimate inference from the other, instead of being a detestable gloss, as BENGEL indignantly calls it. LIGHTFOOT quotes some of the cursed maxims inculcated by those traditionists regarding the proper treatment of all Gentiles. No wonder that the Romans charged the Jews with hatred of the human race. 44. But I say unto you, Love your enemies. The word here used denotes moral love, as distinguished from the other word, which expresses personal affection. Usually, the former denotes 'complacency in the character of the person loved'; but here it denotes the benignant, compassionate outpouring of desire for another's good. bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them which despitefully use you, and persecute you. The best commentary on these matchless counsels is the bright example of Him who gave them. (See 1 Peter, 2. 21-24; and cf. Romans, 12. 20, 21; 1 Corinthians, 4. 12; 1 Peter, 3. 9.) But though such precepts were never before expressed—perhaps not even conceived—with such breadth, precision, and sharpness as here, our Lord is here only the incomparable Interpreter of a law in force from the beginning; and this is the only satisfactory view of the entire strain of this Discourse. 45. That ye may be like the children—that ye may be sons—of your Father which is in heaven. The meaning is, 'that ye may show yourselves to be such by resembling Him' (cf. v. 9 and Ephesians, 5. 1). for he maketh his sun—your Father's sun.' Well might BENGEL exclaim, 'Magnificent appellation!—to rise on the evil and on the good, and sendeth rain on the just and on the unjust—rather [without the article] on evil and good, and on just and unjust.' When we find God's own procedure held up for imitation in the law, and much more in the prophets (Leviticus, 19. 2; 20. 28; and cf. 1 Peter, 1. 15, 16), we may see that the principle of this surprising verse was nothing new; but the form of it certainly is that of One who spake as never man spake. 46. For if ye love them which love you, what reward have ye? do not even the publicans the same? The publicans, as collectors of taxes due to the Roman government, were even on this account obnoxious to the Jews, who sat uneasy under a foreign yoke, and disliked whatever brought this unpleasantly before them. But the extortion practised by this class made them hateful to the community, who in their current speech ranked them with "harlots." Nor does our Lord scruple to speak of them as others did, which we may be sure He never would if it had been calumnious. The meaning, then, is, 'In loving those who love you, there is no evidence of superior principle: the worst of men will do this: even a publican will go that length.' 47. And if ye salute your brethren only—of the same nation and religion with yourselves—what do ye more [than others]?—what do ye uncommon? or 'extraordinary?' i.e., wherein do ye excel? do not even the publicans so! The true reading here appears to be, 'Do not even the heathens the same?' Cf. ch. 18. 17, where the excommunicated person is said to be "as an heathen man and a publican." 48. Be ye therefore—rather, 'Ye shall therefore be,' or 'Ye are therefore to be,' as My disciples and in My kingdom—perfect, or 'complete.' Manifestly our Lord here speaks, not of degrees of excellence, but of the kind of excellence which was to distinguish His disciples and characterize His kingdom. When therefore He adds, even as your Father which is in heaven is perfect, He refers to that full-orbed glorious completeness which is in the great Divine Model, "their Father which is in heaven."

CHAPTER VI.

SERMON ON THE MOUNT—continued. Ver. 1-18. FURTHER ILLUSTRATION OF THE RIGHTEOUSNESS OF THE KINGDOM—ITS ORIENTATIONS. General Caution against Ostentation in Religious Duties (v. 1). 1. Take heed that ye do not your aims. But the true reading seems clearly to be 'your righteousness.' The external authority for both readings is pretty nearly equal; but internal evidence is decidedly in favour of 'righteousness.' The subject of the second verse being 'almsgiving,' that word—so like the other in Greek—might easily be substituted for it by the copyist: whereas the opposite would not be so likely. But it is still more in favour of "righteousness," that

d the first verse. It then becomes a general r this whole Section of the Discourse, unostentatiousness in all deeds of righteousness, Prayer, and Fasting being, in selected examples of this righteousness, if we read "Do not your alms," &c., we will have no reference but to that one "righteousness," in this case, we are to that same righteousness of the kingdom whose leading features—in opposition to perversions of it—it is the great object of use to open up; that righteousness of Lord says, "Except your righteousness (the righteousness of the scribes and Phari in no case enter into the kingdom of 1. 5. 20). To "do" this righteousness, was a well understood expression. Thus, he that doeth righteousness at all times" 31. It refers to the actings of righteousness—the outgoings of the gracious nature our Lord afterwards said to His disciples, my Father glorified, that ye bear much ill ye be my disciples" (John, 15. 8). before of them—"with the view" or 'intention held of them.'" See the same expression True, He had required them to let their ne before men that they might see their and glorify their Father which is in 5. 16. But this is quite consistent with a display of our righteousness for self. In fact, the doing of the former necesses our not doing the latter, otherwise ye id of your Father which is in heaven. When lone to God—as primarily enjoining and ing of it—He will take care that it be duly but when done purely for ostentation, own it, nor is His judgment of it even God accepts only what is done to Himch for the general principle. Now follow rations of it.

2. Therefore, when thou dost do not sound a trumpet before thee. The word "Him- to be an unauthorized addition to the sense no doubt suggested. See 1. 5. 25; Romans, 2. 16; 1 Corinthians, 4. 5. 2. 6). 5. And when thou prayest, thou shalt ing to the preferable reading, 'when ye if' not be as the hypocrites are: for they love ling in the synagogues and in the corners of see on v. 2), that they may be seen of men. unto you. They have, &c. The standing prayer was the ancient practice, alike in and in the early Christian Church, as is to be learned. But of course this con- sture opened the way for the ostentations, when thou prayest, enter into thy closet—a 'place of retirement'—and when thou hast shut thy door, pray to thy Father which is in secret; and thy Father which seeth in secret shall reward thee openly. Of course it is not the simple publicity of prayer which is here condemned. It may be offered in any circumstances, however open, if not prompted by the spirit of ostentation, but dictated by the great ends of prayer itself. It is the retiring character of true prayer which is here taught.

Supplementary Directions, and Model-Prayer (v. 7-15), 7. But when ye pray, use not vain repetitions. 'Babble not' would be a better rendering, both for the form of the word—which in both languages is intended to imitate the sound—and for the sense, which expresses not so much the repetition of the same words as a senseless multiplication of them; as appears from what follows, as the heathen do: for they think that they shall be heard for their much speaking. This method of heathen devotion is still observed by Hindu and Mohammedan devotees. With the Jews, says Lorr-root, it was a maxim, that 'Every one who multiplies prayer is heard.' In the Church of Rome, not only is it carried to a shameless extent, but, as TROLUCK justly observes, the very Prayer which our Lord gave as an antidote to vain repetitions is the most abused to this superstitious end; the number of times it is repeated counting for so much more merit. Is not this just that characteristic feature of heathen devotion which our Lord here condemns? But praying much, and using at times the same words, is not here condemned, and has the example of our Lord Himself in its favour. 8. Be not ye therefore like unto them: for your Father knoweth what things ye have need of before ye ask him—and so needs not to be informed of our wants, any more than to be roused to attend to them by our incessant speaking. What a view of God is here given, in sharp contrast with the gods of the heathen! But let it be carefully noted that it is not as the general Father of Mankind that our Lord says, "Your Father" knoweth what ye need before ye ask it; for it is not men, as such, that He is addressing in this Discourse, but His own disciples—the poor in spirit, the mourners, the meek, hungry and thirsty souls, the merciful, the pure in heart, the peacemakers, who allow themselves to have all manner of evil said against them for the Son of Man's sake—in short, the new-born children of God, who, making their Father's interests their own, are here assured that their Father, in return, makes their interests His, and needs neither to be told nor to be reminded of their wants. Yet He will have His children pray to Him, and links all His promised supplies to their petitions for them; thus encouraging us to draw near and keep near to Him, to talk and walk with Him, to open our every case to Him, and assure ourselves that thus asking we shall receive—thus seeking we shall find—thus knocking it shall be opened to us. 9. After this manner—more simply, 'Thus,' therefore pray ye. The "ye" is emphatic here, in contrast with the heathen prayers. That this matchless prayer was given not only as a model, but as a form, might be concluded from its very nature. Did it consist only of hints or directions for prayer, it could only be used as a directory; but seeing it is an actual prayer—designed, indeed, to show how much real prayer could be compressed into the fewest words, but still, as a prayer, only the more incomparable for that—it is strange that there should be a doubt whether we ought to pray that very prayer. Surely the words with which it is introduced, in the second utterance and varied form of it which we have in Luke, 11. 2, ought to set this at rest: "When ye pray, say, Our Father." Nevertheless, since the second form of it varies considerably from the first, and since no example of its actual use, or express quotation of its phraseology, occurs in the sequel of the New Testament, we are to guard against a superstitious use of it. How early this began to appear in the Church-services, and to what an extent it was afterwards carried, is known to every one versed in Church History. Nor has the spirit which bred this abuse quite departed from some branches of the Protestant Church, though the opposite and equally condemnable extreme is to be found in other branches of it.

Model-Prayer (v 9-13). According to the Latin fathers and the Lutheran Church, the petitions of the Lord's Prayer are seven in number: according to the Greek fathers, the Reformed Church, and the Westminster divines, they are only six; the two last being regarded—we think, less correctly—as one. The first three petitions have to do exclusively with God: "Thy name be hallowed"—"Thy kingdom come"—"Thy will be done." And they occur in a descending scale—from Himself down to the manifestation of Himself in His kingdom; and from His kingdom to the entire subjection of its subjects, or the complete doing of His will. The remaining four petitions have to do with OURSELVES: "Give us our bread"—"Forgive us our debts"—"Lead us not into temptation"—"Deliver us from evil." But these latter petitions occur in an ascending scale—from the bodily wants of every day up to our final deliverance from all evil.

Invocation: Our Father which art in heaven. In the former clause we express His nearness to us; in the latter, His distance from us. (See Ecclesiastes, 5: 2; Isaiah, 66: 1.) Holy, loving familiarity suggests the one; awful reverence the other. In calling Him "Father" we express a relationship we have all known and felt surrounding us even from our infancy; but in calling Him our Father "who art in heaven," we contrast Him with the fathers we all have here below, and so raise our souls to that "heaven" where He dwells, and that Majesty and Glory which are there as in their proper home. These first words of the Lord's Prayer—this Invocation with which it opens—what a brightness and warmth does it throw over the whole prayer, and into what a serene region does it introduce the praying believer, the child of God, as he thus approaches Him! It is true that the paternal relationship of God to His people is by no means strange to the Old Testament. (See Deuteronomy, 32: 6; Psalm 103: 13; Isaiah, 63: 16; Jeremiah, 3: 4, 19; Malachi, 1: 6; 2: 10.) But these are only glimpses—the "back parts" (Exodus, 33: 23), if we may so say, in comparison with the "open face" of our Father revealed in Jesus. (See on 2 Corinthians, 3: 18.) Nor is it too much to say, that the view which our Lord gives, throughout this His very first lengthened discourse, of "our Father in heaven," beggars all that was ever taught, even in God's own Word, or conceived before by His saints, on this subject.

First Petition: Hallowed be—i.e., 'be held in reverence'—regarded and treated as holy, thy name, God's name means 'Himself as revealed and manifested.' Everywhere in Scripture God defines and marks off the faith and love and reverence and obedience He will have from men by the disclosures which He makes to them of what He is; both to shut out false conceptions of Him, and to make all their devotion take the shape and hue of His own teaching. Too much attention cannot be paid to this.

Second Petition: 10. Thy kingdom come. The kingdom of God is that moral and spiritual kingdom which the God of grace is setting up in this fallen world, whose subjects consist of as many as have been brought into hearty subjection to His gracious sceptre, and of which His Son Jesus is the glorious Head. In the inward reality of it, this kingdom existed ever since there were men who "walked with God" (Genesis, 5: 24), and "waited for His salvation" (Genesis, 49: 18); who were "continually with Him, hidden by His right hand" (Psalm 73: 23), and who, even in the valley of the shadow of death, feared no evil, when He was with them (Psalm 23: 4). When Messiah Himself appeared, it was, as a visible kingdom, "at hand." His death laid the deep foundations of it—His ascension on high, "loading captivity captive and receiving gifts for men, yea, for the rebellious, that the Lord God might dwell among them," and the Pentecostal effusion of the Spirit, by which those gifts for men descended upon the rebellious, and the Lord God was beheld, in the persons of thousands upon thousands, "dwelling" among men—was a glorious "coming" of this kingdom. But it is still to come, and this petition, "Thy kingdom come," must not cease to ascend so long as one subject of it remains to be brought in. But does not this prayer stretch further forward—to "the glory to be revealed," or that stage of the kingdom called "the everlasting kingdom of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ?" (2 Peter, 1: 11.) Not directly, perhaps, since the petition that follows this—"Thy will be done in earth, as it is in heaven"—would then bring us back to this present state of imperfection. Still, the mind refuses to be so bounded by stages and degrees, and in the act of praying "Thy kingdom come," it irresistibly stretches the wings of its faith, and longing, and joyous expectation out to the final and glorious consummation of the kingdom of God.

Third Petition: Thy will be done in earth, as it is in heaven—or, as the same words are rendered in Luke, 'as in heaven, so upon earth—as cheerfully, as contentedly, as perfectly.' But some will ask, Will this ever be? We answer, If the "new heavens and new earth" are to be just our present material system purified by fire and transfigured, of course it will. But we incline to think that the aspiration which we are taught in this beautiful petition to breathe forth has no direct reference to any such organic fulfilment, and is only the spontaneous and resistless longing of the renewed soul—put into words—to see the whole inhabited earth in entire conformity to the will of God. It asks not if ever it shall be—or if ever it can be—in order to pray this prayer. It has always its holy yearnings breathed forth, and this is just the bold yet simple expression of them. Nor is the Old Testament without prayers which come very near to this (Psalm 7: 9; 67: 72: 19; &c.).

Fourth Petition: 11. Give us this day our daily bread. The compound word here rendered "daily" occurs nowhere else, either in classical or sacred Greek, and so must be interpreted by the analogy of its component parts. But on this critics are divided. To those who would understand it to mean, "Give us this day the bread of to-morrow"—as if the sense thus slid into that of Luke, "Give us day by day" (as BENGEL, MEYER, &c.)—it may be answered that the sense thus brought out is scarcely intelligible, if not something less; that the expression "bread of to-morrow" is not at all the same as bread "from day to day," and that, so understood, it would seem to contradict v. 34. The great majority of the best critics (taking the word to be compounded of ousia, 'substance,' or 'being' understood by it the 'staff of life,' 'the bread of subsistence,' and so the sense will be, 'Give us this day the bread which this day's necessities require.' In this case, the rendering of our authorized version (after the Vulgate, LUTHER, and some of the best modern critics)—"our daily bread"—is, in sense, accurate enough. (See Proverbs, 30: 8.) Among commentators, there was early shown an inclination to understand this as a prayer for the heavenly bread, or spiritual nourishment; and in this een followed by many superior expositors, to our own times. But as this is quite so it deprives the Christian of one of his privileges—to cast his bodily wants, in prayer, by one simple petition, upon his Father. No doubt the spiritual mind 'the meat that perisheth,' naturally rise to "that meat which endureth to ever." But let it be enough that the petition wants irresistibly suggests a higher petition not rob ourselves—out of a morbid—of our one petition in this prayer for provision which the immediate sequel verse shows that our heavenly Father has in heart. In limiting our petitions, how-vision for the day, what a spirit of childlence does the Lord both demand and oriant view of sin this—as an offence od. This idea of sin had indeed come up es up once and again in our Lord's subse-quing—as in the parable of the Creditor Unmerciful debtor (ch. 18, 23, &c.), bodying it in this brief Model of accept-and as the first of three petitions more ing upon sin, our Lord teaches us, in the atic manner conceivable, to regard this as the primary and fundamental one, to this is the "forgiveness" which it disseeks—not the removal from our own stain of sin, nor yet the removal of our God's anger, or of unworthy suspicions of offences given and received between us. After what has been said on ch. 5, 7, be thought that our Lord here teaches ercise of forgiveness towards our offender absolutely precedes and is the proper od's forgiveness of us. His whole teach-on this, that immediately after the close of forgiveness will be exactly what our Sixth Petition: 13. And lead us not into temptation.

 He who honestly seeks, and has the assurance of, forgiveness for past sin, will strive to avoid committing it for the future. But conscious that "when we would do good evil is present with us," we are taught to offer this sixth petition, which comes naturally close upon the preceding, and flows, indeed, instinctively from it in the hearts of all earnest Christians.
 There is some difficulty in the form of the petition, as it is certain that God does bring His people—as He did Abraham, and Christ Himself—into circumstances both fitted and designed to try them, or test the strength of their faith. Some meet this by regarding the petition as simply an humble expression of self-distrust and instinctive shrinking from danger; but this seems too weak. Others take it as a prayer against yielding to temptation, and so equivalent to a prayer for 'support and deliverance when we are tempted,' but this seems to go beyond the precise thing intended. We incline to take it as a prayer against being driven or sucked, of our own will, into temptation, to which the word here used seems to lend some countenance—"Introduce us not."
 This view, while it does not put into our mouths a prayer against being tempted—which is more than the Divine procedure would seem to warrant—does not, on the other hand, change the sense of the petition into one for support under temptation, which the words will hardly bear; but it gives us a subject for prayer, in regard to temptation, most desirable, and of all others most needful. It was precisely this which Peter needed to ask, but did not ask, when—of his own accord, and in spite of difficulties—he pressed for entrance into the palace-hall of the high priest, and where, once sucked into the scene and atmosphere of temptation, he fell so foully. And if so, does it not seem pretty clear that this was exactly what our Lord meant His disciples to pray against when He said in the garden—"Watch and pray, that ye enter not into temptation!" (ch. 26, 41.)

Seventh Petition: But deliver us from evil. We can see no good reason for regarding this as but the second half of the sixth petition. With far better ground might the second and third petitions be regarded as one. The "but" connecting the two petitions is an insufficient reason for regarding them as one, though enough to show that the one thought naturally follows close upon the other. As the expression "from evil" may be equally well rendered 'from the evil one,' a number of superior critics think the devil is intended, especially from its following close upon the subject of "temptation." But the comprehensive character of these brief petitions, and the place which this one occupies, as that on which all our desires die away, seems to us against so contracted a view of it. Nor can there be a reasonable doubt that the apostle, in some of the last sentences which he penned before he was brought forth to suffer for his Lord, alludes to this very petition in the language of calm assurance—"And the Lord shall deliver me from every evil work (cf. the Greek of the two passages), and will preserve me unto his heavenly kingdom" (2 Timothy, 4, 18). This final petition, then, is only rightly grasped when regarded as a prayer for deliverance from all evil of whatever kind —not only from sin, but from all its consequences—fully and finally. Fitly, then, are our prayers ended with this. For what can we desire which this does not carry with it? For this is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory, for ever. Amen.—If any reliance is to be placed on external evidence, this doxology, we think, can hardly be considered part of the original text. It is wanting in all the most ancient MSS.; it is wanting in the Old Latin version and in the Vulgate: the former mounting up to about the middle of the second century, and the latter being a revision of it in the fourth century by JEROME, a most reverential and conservative as well as able and impartial critic. As might be expected from this, it is passed by in silence by the earliest Latin fathers; but even the Greek commentators, when expounding this Prayer, pass by the doxology. On the other hand, it is found in a majority of MSS., though not the oldest: it is found in all the Syriac versions, even the Peshito—dating probably as early as the second century—although this version wants the "Amen," which the doxology, if genuine, could hardly have wanted: it is found in the Sahidic or Thebic version made for the Christians of Upper Egypt, possibly as early as the Old Latin; and it is found in perhaps most of the later versions. On a review of the evidence, the strong probability, we think, is that it was no part of the original text. 14. For if ye forgive men, &c.: 15. But if ye forgive not, &c. See on v. 12.

Fasting (v. 16-18). Having concluded His supplementary directions on the subject of Prayer with this divine Pattern, our Lord now returns to the subject of Unostentatiousness in our deeds of righteousness, in order to give one more illustration of it, in the matter of Fasting. 16. Moreover, when ye fast—referring, probably, to private and voluntary fasting, which was to be regulated by each individual for himself; though in spirit it would apply to any fast. be not, as the hypocrites, of a sad countenance: for they disfigure their faces—id., 'make unseem'; very well rendered "disfigure." They went about with a slovenly appearance, and ashes sprinkled on their head, that they may appear unto men to fast. It was not the deed, but reputation for the deed which they sought; and with this view those hypocrites multiplied their fasts. And are the exhausting fasts of the Church of Rome, and of Romanizing Protestants, free from this taint? Verily I say unto you. They have their reward. 17. But thou, when thou fastest, anoint thine head, and wash thy face—as the Jews did, except when mourning (Daniel, 10. 3); so that the meaning is, 'Appear as usual—appear so as to attract no notice. 18. That thou appear not unto men to fast, but unto thy Father which is in secret: and thy Father, which seeth in secret, shall reward thee openly! The "openly" seems evidently a later addition to the text of this verse from v. 4, 7, though of course the idea is implied.

19-24. CONCLUDING ILLUSTRATIONS OF THE RIGHTROUSNESS OF THE KINGDOM—HEAVENLY-MINDEDNESS AND FILIAL CONFIDENCE. 19. Lay not up for ourselves—of hoard not—treasures upon earth, where moth—a clothes-moth. Eastern treasures, consisting partly in costly dresses stored up (Job, 27. 16), were liable to be consumed by moths (Job, 13. 28; Isaiah, 60. 9; 61. 8). In James, 5. 2 there is an evident reference to our Lord's words here, and rust—any 'eating into' or 'consuming'; here, probably, 'wear-and-tear.' doth corrupt—'cause to disappear.' By this reference to moth and rust our Lord would teach how perishable are such earthly treasures, and where thieves break through and steal. Treasures these, how perishable! 20. But lay up for yourselves treasures in heaven—The language in Luke (12. 33) is very bold—"Sell that ye have, and give alms; provide yourselves bags which wax not old, a treasure in the heavens that faileth not," &c. where neither moth nor rust doth corrupt, and where thieves do not break through nor steal. Treasures these, imperishable and unassailable! (Cf. Colossians, 3. 2.) 21. For where your treasure is—that which ye value most, there will your heart be also. 1. Thy treasure—thy heart! is probably the true reading here: 'your,' in Luke, 12. 34, from which it seems to have come in here.] Obvious though this maxim be, by what multitudes who progress to bow to the teaching of Christ is it practically disregarded! 'What a man loves,' says LUTHER, quoted by THOLUCK, 'that is his God. For he carries it in his heart, he goes about with it night and day, he sleeps and wakes with it; be it what it may—wealth or pelf, pleasure or renown.' But because "laying up" is not in itself sinful, nay, in some cases enjoined (2 Corinthians, 12. 14), and honest industry and sagacious enterprise are usually rewarded with prosperity, many flatter themselves that all is right between them and God while their closest attention, anxiety, zeal, and time are exhausted upon these earthly pursuits. To put this right, our Lord adds what follows, in which there is profound practical wisdom. 22. The light—rather, 'The lamp'—of the body is the eye: if therefore thine eye be single—'simple,' 'clear.' As applied to the outward eye, this means general soundness; particularly, not looking two ways. Here, as also in classical Greek, it is used figuratively to denote the simplicity of the mind's eye, singleness of purpose, looking right at its object, as opposed to having two ends in view. (See Proverbs, 4. 25-27.) thy whole body shall be full of light—'illuminated.' As with the bodily vision, the man who looks with a good, sound eye walks in light, seeing every object clear; so a simple and persistent purpose to serve and please God in everything will make the whole character consistent and bright. 23. But if thine eye be evil—'distempered,' or, as we should say, 'If we have got a bad eye, thy whole body shall be full of darkness—'darkened.' As a vitiated eye, or an eye that looks not straight and full at its object, sees nothing as it is, so a mind and heart divided between heaven and earth is all dark. If therefore the light that is in thee be darkness, how great is that darkness! As the conscience is the regulative faculty, and a man's inward purpose, scope, aim in life, determines his character—if these be not simple and heavenward, but distorted and double, what must all the other faculties and principles of our nature be which take their direction and character from these, and what must the whole man and the whole life be, but a mass of darkness? In Luke (11. 36) the converse of this statement very strikingly expresses what pure, beautiful, broad perceptions the clarity of the inward eye imparts: "If thy whole body therefore be full of light, having no part dark, the whole shall be full of light, as when the bright shining of a candle doth give thee light." But now for the application of this. 24. No man can serve. The word means to 'belong wholly and be entirely under command to,' two masters: for either he will hate the one, and love the other; or else he will hold to the one, and despise the other. Even if the two masters be of one character and have but one object, the servant must take law from one or other: though he may do what is agreeable to both, he cannot, in the nature of the thing, be servant to more than one. Much less if, as in the present case, their interests are quite different, and even conflicting. In this case, if our affections be in the service of the one—if we "love the one"—we must of necessity "hate the other." If we determine resolutely to "hold to the one," we must at the same time disregard, and, if he insist on his claims upon us, even "despise the other." Ye cannot serve God and mammon. The word "mammon"—better written with one m—is a foreign one, whose precise derivation cannot certainly be determined, though the most probable one gives it the sense of 'what one trusts in.' Here, there can be no doubt it is used for riches, considered as an idol-master, or god of the heart. The service of this god and the true God together is here, with a kind of indignant curtness, pronounced impossible. But since the teaching of the preceding verses might seem to endanger our falling short of

to His disciples ch. 8: 26; 14: 31; 16: 8), can hardly be regarded as rebuking any actual manifestations of unbelief at that early period, and before such an audience.
It is His way of gently chiding the spirit of unbelief, so natural even to the best, who are surrounded by a world of sense, and of kindling a generous desire to shake it off. 31. Therefore take no thought ('solicitude'), saying, What shall we eat? or, What shall we drink? or, Wherewithal shall we be clothed? 32. (For after all these things do the Gentiles seek)—rather, 'pursue.' Knowing nothing definitely beyond the present life to kindle their aspirations and engage their supreme attention, the heathen naturally pursue present objects as their chief, their only good. To what an elevation above these does Jesus here lift His disciples! for your heavenly Father knoweth that ye have need of all these things. How precious this word!
Food and raiment are pronounced needful to God's children; and He who could say, "No man knoweth the Father but the Son, and he to whomsoever the Son will reveal Him" (ch. 11. 27), says with an authority which none but Himself could claim, "Your heavenly Father knoweth that ye have need of all these things." Will not that suffice you, O ye needy ones of the household of faith? 33. But seek ye first the kingdom of God, and his righteousness; and all these things shall be added unto you. This is the great summing up. Strictly speaking, it has to do only with the subject of the present Section—the right state of the heart with reference to heavenly and earthly things; but being couched in the form of a brief general directory, it is so comprehensive in its grasp as to embrace the whole subject of this Discourse.
And, as if to make this the more evident, the two key-notes of this great Sermon seem purposely struck in it—"the KINGDOM" and "the RIGHTEOUSNESS" of the kingdom—as the grand objects, in the supreme pursuit of which all things needful for the present life will be added to us. The precise sense of every word in this golden verse should be carefully weighed.
"The kingdom of God" is the primary subject of the Sermon on the Mount—that kingdom which the God of heaven is erecting in this fallen world, within which are all the spiritually recovered and inwardly subject portion of the family of Adam, under Mes-shall have these as their proper and primary portion; the rest being their gracious reward for not seeking them. (See an illustration of the principle of this in 2 Chronicles, 1. 11, 12.) What follows is but a reduction of this great general direction into a practical and ready form for daily use. 34. Take therefore no thought ('anxious care') for the morrow; for the morrow shall take thought for the things of itself or, according to other authorities, 'for itself')—shall have its own causes of anxiety. Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof. An admirable practical maxim, and better rendered in our version than in almost any other, not excepting the preceding English ones. Every day brings its own cares; and to anticipate is only to double them.

VER. 1-12. MISCELLANEOUS SUPPLEMENTARY COUNSELS. That these verses are entirely supplementary is the simplest and most natural view of them. All attempts to make out any evident connection with the immediately preceding context are, in our judgment, forced. But, though supplementary, these counsels are far from being of subordinate importance. On the contrary, they involve some of the most delicate and vital duties of the Christian life. In the vivid form in which they are here presented, perhaps they could not have been introduced with the same effect under any of the foregoing heads; but they spring out of the same great principles, and are but other forms and manifestations of the same evangelical "righteousness."

Censorious Judgment (v. 1-5). 1. Judge not, that ye be not judged. To "judge" here does not exactly mean to pronounce condemnatory judgment, nor does it refer to simple judging at all, whether favourable or the reverse. The context makes it clear that the thing here condemned is that disposition to look unfavourably on the character and actions of others, which leads invariably to the pronouncing of rash, unjust, and unlovely judgments upon them. No doubt it is the judgments so pronounced which are here spoken of; but what our Lord aims at is the spirit out of which they spring. Provided we eschew this unlovely spirit, we are not only warranted to sit in judgment upon a brother's character and actions, but, in the exercise of a necessary discrimination, are often constrained to do so for our own guidance. It is the violation of the law of love involved in the exercise of a censorious disposition which alone is here condemned. And the argument against it—"that ye be not judged"—confirms this: 'that your own character and actions be not pronounced upon with the like severity; i.e., at the great day. 2. For with what judgment ye judge, ye shall be judged: and with what measure ye mete—whatever standard of judgment ye apply to others, it shall be measured to you again. This proverbial maxim is used by our Lord in other connections—as in Mark, 4. 24, and with a slightly different application in Luke, 6. 38—as a great principle in the divine administration. 'Tender judgment of others will be judicially returned upon ourselves, in the day when God shall judge the secrets of men by Jesus Christ. But, as in many other cases under the divine administration, such harsh judgment gets self-punished even here. For people shrink from contact with those who systematically deal out harsh judgment upon others—naturally concluding that they themselves may be the next victims—and feel impelled in self-defence, when exposed to it, to roll back upon the assaillant his own censures. 3. And why beholdest thou the mote—'splinter; here very well rendered "mote," denoting any small fault. that is in thy brother's eye, but considerest not the beam that is in thine own eye!—denoting the much greater fault which we overlook in ourselves. 4. Or how wilt thou say to thy brother, Let me pull out the mote out of thine eye; and, behold, a beam is in thine own eye! 5. Thou hypocrite—"Hypocrite!" first cast out the beam out of thine own eye; and then shalt thou see clearly to cast out the mote out of thy brother's eye. Our Lord uses a most hyperbolic, but not unfamiliar figure, to express the monstrous inconsistency of this conduct. The "hypocrisy" which, not without indignation, He charges it with, consists in the pretence of a zealous and compassionate charity, which cannot possibly be real in one who suffers worse faults to lie uncorrected in himself. He only is fit to be a reprover of others who jealously and severely judges himself. Such persons will not only be slow to undertake the office of censor on their neighbours, but, when constrained in faithfulness to deal with them, will make it evident that they do it with reluctance and not satisfaction, with moderation and not exaggeration, with love and not harshness.

Prostitution of Holy Things (v. 6). The opposite extreme to that of censoriousness is here condemned—want of discrimination of character. 6. Give not that which is holy unto the dogs—savage or snarling haters of truth and righteousness. neither cast ye your pearls before swine—the impure or coarse, who are incapable of appreciating the priceless jewels of Christianity. In the East dogs are wilder and more gregarious, and, feeding on carrion and garbage, are coarser and fiercer than the same animals in the West. Dogs and swine, besides being ceremonially unclean, were peculiarly repulsive to the Jews, and indeed to the ancients generally. lest they trample them under their feet—as swine do—and turn again and rend you—as dogs do. Religion is brought into contempt, and its professors insulted, when it is forced upon those who cannot value it and will not have it. But while the indiscriminately zealous have need of this caution, let us be on our guard against too readily setting our neighbours down as dogs and swine, and excusing ourselves from endeavouring to do them good on this poor plea.

Prayer (v. 7-11). Enough, one might think, had been said on this subject in ch. 6. 5-15. But the difficulty of the foregoing duties seems to have recalled the subject, and this gives it quite a new turn. 'How shall we ever be able to carry out such precepts as these, of tender, holy, yet discriminating love? might the humble disciple enquire. 'Go to God with it,' is our Lord's reply; but He expresses this with a fulness which leaves nothing to be desired, urging now not only confidence, but importunity in prayer. 7. Ask, and it shall be given you; seek, and ye shall find; knock, and it shall be opened unto you. Though there seems evidently a climax here, expressive of more and more importunity, yet each of these terms used presents what we desire of God in a different light. We ask for what we wish; we seek for what we miss; we knock for that from which we feel ourselves shut out. Answering to this threefold representation is the triple assurance of success to our believing efforts. 'But ah! might some humble disciple say, 'I cannot persuade myself that I have any interest with God.' To meet this, our Lord repeats the triple assurance He had just given, but in such a form as to silence every such complaint. 8. For every one that asketh receiveth; and he that seeketh findeth; and to him that knocketh it shall be opened. Of course, it is presumed that he asks aright—i.e., in faith—and with an honest purpose to make use of what he receives. "If any of you lack wisdom, let him ask of God. But let him ask in faith, nothing wavering (undecided whether to be altogether on the Lord's side). For he that wavereth is like a wave of the sea driven with the wind and tossed. For let not that man think that he shall receive any thing of the Lord" (James, 1. 5-7).

...of all fathers have towards His pleading in the corresponding passage in Luke 13. Instead of "good things," our Lord says that ask Him. At this early stage of His mission and before such an audience, He seems to have a sharp doctrinal teaching as was more in His plan at the later stage indicated in His addressing His own disciples excluve (v. 12). 12. Therefore—to say all in one words whatever ye would that men should do even so—the same thing and in the same way: for this is the Law and the Prophets, the substance of all relative duty; all Scriptural, 'Incomparable summary! How 'the royal law!' (James, 2:8; cf. Romans, 13:8) a true that similar maxims are found in the writings of the cultivated Greeks and not naturally enough in the Rabbinical as so expressed as it is here—in immediate with, and as the sum of such duties as had been joined, and such principles as had been set—it is to be found nowhere else. And immediately upon this fact is, that never did come down thus to teach did men and widely exemplify it in their practice. The sense of the maxim is best referred to use. It is not, of course, what—in our suspicious, grasping moods—we should wish to do to us, that we are to hold ourself to do to them; but only what—in the an impartial judgment, and putting ourself in their place—we consider it reasonable that to do us, that we are to do to them.

CONCLUSION AND EFFECT OF THE SERMON NEXT. We have here the application of preceding Discourses. Conclusion of the Sermon on the Mount (v. 13-17). "The righteousness cometh," so simply described, both in principle and detail, would be seen to involve self-sacrifice. Multitudes would never face this. To be faced, else the consequences will be would divide all within the sound of these and leaves it with us. As to the other way, the disadvantage of it lies in its narrowness and solitude. Its very first step involves a revolution in our whole purposes and plans for life, and a surrender of all that is dear to natural inclination, while all that follows is but a repetition of the first great act of self-sacrifice. No wonder, then, that few find and few are found in it. But it has one advantage—it "leadeth unto life." Some critics take "the gate" here, not for the first, but the last step in religion; since gates seldom open into roads, but roads usually terminate in a gate, leading straight to a mansion. But as this would make our Lord's words to have a very inverted and unnatural form as they stand, it is better, with the majority of critics, to view them as we have done. But since such teaching would be as unpopular as the way itself, our Lord next forewarns His hearers that preachers of smooth things—the true heirs and representatives of the false prophets of old—would be rife enough in the new kingdom. 15. Beware—'But beware' of false prophets—i.e., of teachers coming as authorized expounders of the mind of God and guides to heaven. (See Acts, 20: 29, 30; 2 Peter, 2: 1, 2.) which come to you in sheep's clothing—with a bland, gentle, plausible exterior; persuading you that the gate is not strait nor the way narrow, and that to teach so is liberal and bigoted—precisely what the old prophets did (Ezekiel, 13: 1-10, 23). but inwardly they are ravening wolves—bent on devouring the flock for their own ends (2 Corinthians, 11: 2, 3, 13-15). 16. Ye shall know them by their fruits—not their doctrines—as many of the elder interpreters and some later ones explain it—for that corresponds to the tree itself; but the practical effect of their teaching, which is the proper fruit of the tree. Do men gather grapes of thorns—any kind of prickly plant, or figs of thistles—a three-pronged variety. The general sense is obvious—Every tree bears its own fruit. 17. Even so every good tree bringeth forth good fruit; but a corrupt tree bringeth forth evil fruit. 18. A good tree cannot bring forth evil fruit, neither can a corrupt tree bring forth good fruit. Obvious as is the truth here expressed in different forms—that the heart determines and is the only proper interpreter of the actions of our life—no one who

I am" (John, 13. 13.) shall enter into the kingdom of heaven; but he that doeth the will of my Father which is in heaven—that will which it had been the great object of this Discourse to set forth. Yet our Lord says warily, not 'the will of your Father,' but "of My Father," thus claiming a relationship to His Father with which His disciples might not intermeddle, and which He never lets down. And He so speaks here, to give authority to His asseverations. But now He rises higher still—not formally announcing Himself as the Judge, but intimating what men will say to Him, and He to them, when He sits as their final judge. 22. Many will say to me in that day—What day? It is emphatically unnamed. But it is the day to which He had just referred, when men shall "enter" or not enter "into the kingdom of heaven." (See a similar way of speaking of "that day" in 2 Timothy, 1. 12; 4. 8.) Lord, Lord. The reiteration denotes surprise. 'What, Lord? How is this? Are we to be disowned? have we not prophesied—or 'publicly taught.' As one of the special gifts of the Spirit in the early Church, it has the sense of 'inspired and authoritative teaching,' and is ranked next to the apostleship. (See 1 Corinthians, 12. 28; Ephesians, 4. 11.) In this sense it is used here, as appears from what follows. in thy name!—or, 'to thy name,' and so in the two following clauses—'having reference to Thy name as the sole power in which we did it,' and in thy name have cast out devils! and in thy name done many wonderful works!—or 'miracles.' These are selected as three examples of the highest services rendered to the Christian cause, and through the power of Christ's own name, invoked for that purpose; Himself, too, responding to the call. And the threefold repetition of the question, each time in the same form, expresses in the liveliest manner the astonishment of the speakers at the view now taken of them. 23. And then will I profess unto them—'or, 'openly proclaim'—tearing off the mask—I never knew you. What they claimed—intimacy with Christ—is just what He repudiates, and with a certain scornful dignity. 'Our acquaintance was not broken off—there never was any,' depart from me (cf. ch. 23. 41). The connection here gives these words an awful significance. They claimed intimacy with Christ, and in the corresponding passage, Luke, 13. 26, are represented as having gone out and in with Him on familiar terms. 'So much the worse for you,' He replies: 'I bore with that long enough; but now—be gone! ye that work iniquity—not 'that wrought iniquity,' for they are represented as fresh from the scenes and acts of it as they stand before the Judge. (See on the almost identical, but even more vivid and awful, description of the scene in Luke, 13. 24-27.) That the apostle alludes to these very words in 2 Timothy, 2. 19, there can hardly be any doubt—"Nevertheless the foundation of God standeth sure, having this seal, The Lord knoweth them that are His. And, Let every one that nameth the name of Christ depart from iniquity." 24. Therefore—to bring this Discourse to a close, whosoever heareth these sayings of mine, and doeth them. See James, 1. 22, which seems a plain allusion to these words; also Luke, 11. 28; Romans, 2. 13; 1 John, 3. 7. I will liken him unto a wise man—a shrewd, prudent, provident man, which built his house upon a rock—the rock of true discipleship, or genuine subjection to Christ. 25. And the rain—from above—descended, and the floods—from below—came, and the winds—sweeping across—blew, and—thus from every direction—beat upon that house; and it fell not: for it was founded upon a rock. See 1 John, 2. 17. 26. And every one that heareth these sayings of mine—in the attitude of discipleship, and doeth them not, shall be likened unto a foolish man, which built his house upon the sand—denoting a loose foundation—that of an empty profession and mere external services. 27.

And the rain descended, and the floods came, and the winds blew, and beat upon—or 'struck against' that house; and it fell; and great was the fall of it—terrible the ruin! How lively must this imagery have been to an audience accustomed to the fierceness of an Eastern tempest, and the suddenness and completeness with which it sweeps everything unsteady before it!

Effect of the Sermon on the Mount (v. 28, 29). 29. And it came to pass, when Jesus had ended these sayings, the people were astonished at his doctrine—rather, 'His teaching,' for the reference is to the manner of it quite as much as to the matter, or rather more so. 29. For he taught them as [one] having authority. The word "one," which our translators have here inserted, only weakens the statement, and not as the scribes. The consciousness of divine authority, as Lawgiver, Expounder, and Judge, so beamed through His teaching, that the scribes' teaching could not but appear drivelling in such a light.

CHAPTER VIII.

Ver. 1-4. HEALING OF A LEPER. (=Mark, 1. 40-44; Luke, 5. 12-16.) The time of this miracle seems too definitely fixed here to admit of our placing it where it stands in Mark and Luke, in whose Gospels no such precise note of time is given. 1. [And] When he was come down from the mountain, great multitudes followed him. 2. And, behold, there came a leper—"a man full of leprosy," says Luke, 5. 12. Much has been written on this disease of leprosy, but certain points remain still doubtful. All that needs be said here is, that it was a cutaneous disease, of a loathsome, diffusive, and, there is reason to believe, when thoroughly pronounced, incurable character; that though in its distinctive features it is still found in several countries—as Arabia, Egypt, and South Africa—it prevailed, in the form of what is called white leprosy, to an unusual extent, and from a very early period, among the Hebrews; and that it thus furnished to the whole nation a familiar and affecting symbol of SIN, considered as (1) loathsome, (2) spreading, (3) incurable. And while the ceremonial ordinances for detection and cleansing prescribed in this case by the law of Moses (Leviticus, 13. 14) held forth a coming remedy "for sin and for uncleanness" (Psalm 51. 7; 2 Kings, 5. 1, 7, 10, 13, 14, the numerous cases of leprosy with which our Lord came in contact, and the glorious cures of them which He wrought, were a fitting manifestation of the work which He came to accomplish. In this view, it deserves to be noticed that the first of our Lord's miracles of healing recorded by Matthew is this cure of a leper, and worshipped him—in what sense we shall presently see. Mark says (1. 40), he came, "beseeching and kneeling to Him," and Luke says (5. 12), "he fell on his face," saying, Lord, if thou wilt, thou canst make me clean. As this is the only cure of leprosy recorded by all the three first Evangelists, it was probably the first case of the kind; and if so, this leper's faith in the power of Christ must have been formed in him by what he had heard of His other cures. And how striking a faith is it! He does not say he believed Him able, but with a brevity expressive of a confidence that knew no doubt, he says simply, "Thou canst." But of Christ's willingness to heal him he was not so sure. It needed more knowledge of Jesus than he could be supposed to have to assure him of that. But one thing he was sure of, that He had but to "will" it. This shows with what "worship" of Christ this leper fell on his face before Him. Clear theological knowledge of the Person of Christ was not then possessed even by those who were most with Him and nearest to Him. Much less could full insight into all that we know of the Only begotten of the Father be expected of this leper. But he who at that moment felt and owned that to heal an incurable disease needed but the fiat of the al to the man's previous confession of that l by assuring him of the one thing of which doubt, and for which he waited—His need!

He makes a claim as divine as the cure mediately followed it. And immediately his s cleansed. Mark, more emphatic, says id as soon as He had spoken, immediately departed from him, and he was cleansed" sly as instantaneously. What a contrast ern pretended cures! & And Jesus ("straitly m, and forthwith sent him away," Mark, with unto him. See thou tell no man. A hard this would seem to a grateful heart, whose usage, in such a case, is, "Come, hear, all ar God, and I will declare what He hath y soul" (Psalm 65, 16). We shall presently son for it, but go thy way, show thyself to nd offer the gift that Moses commanded (Levi-ALING OF THE CENTURION'S SERVANT.

1-10. This incident belongs to a later the exposition, see on Luke, 7, 1-10.
SALING OF PETER'S MOTHER-IN-LAW, tached themselves to Jesus, it would appear, from his calling Him "Teacher," that this one was a "disciple" in that looser sense of the word in which it is applied to the crowds who flocked after Him, with more or less conviction that His claims were well founded. But from the answer which he received we are led to infer that there was more of transient emotion—of temporary impulse—than of intelligent principle in the speech. The preaching of Christ had riveted and charmed him; his heart had swelled; his enthusiasm had been kindled; and in this state of mind he will go anywhere with Him, and feels impelled to tell Him so. "Wilt thou?" replies the Lord Jesus, "Knowest thou Whom thou art pledging thyself to follow, and whither haply He may lead thee?

No warm home, no downy pillow has He for thee: He has them not for Himself. The foxes are not without their holes, nor do the birds of the air want their nests; but the Son of man has to depend on the hospitality of others, and borrow the pillow whereon He lays His head.' How affecting is this reply! And yet He rejects not this man's offer, nor refuses him the liberty to follow Him. Only He will have him know what he is doing, and 'count the cost.' He will have him weigh well the real nature and the strength of his attachment, whether it be such as will abide in the day of trial. If so, he will be right welcome, for Christ puts none away. But it seems too plain that in this case that had not been done. And so we have called this The Rash or Precipitate Disciple.

II. The Procrastinating or Entangled Disciple (v.
21, 22). As this is more fully given in Luke, we must take both together. "And He said unto another of his disciples, Follow me. But he said, 'Lord, suffer me first to go and bury my father. But Jesus said unto him, Follow me; and let the dead bury their dead—or, as more definitely in Luke, "Let the dead bury their dead; but go thou and preach the kingdom of God." This disciple did not, like the former, volunteer his services, but is called by the Lord Jesus, not only to follow, but to preach Him. And he is quite willing; only he is not ready just yet. "Lord, I will; but"— "There is a difficulty in the way just now; but that once removed, I am Thine.' What now is this diffiduty might call me.' This view of the case will explain the curt reply. "Let the dead bury their dead; but go thou and preach the kingdom of God." Like all the other paradoxical sayings of our Lord, the key to it is the different senses—a higher and a lower—in which the same word "dead" is used: 'There are two kingdoms of God in existence upon earth: the kingdom of nature, and the kingdom of grace: To the one kingdom all the children of this world, even the most ungodly, are fully alive; to the other, only the children of light: The reigning irreligion consists not in indifference to the common humanities of social life, but to things spiritual and eternal: Fear not, therefore, that your father will in your absence be neglected, and that when he breathes his last there will not be relatives and friends ready enough to do to him the last offices of kindness. Your wish to discharge these yourself is natural, and to be allowed to do it a privilege not lightly to be foregone. But the Kingdom of God lies now all neglected and needy: Its more exalted character few discern; to its paramount claims few are alive; and to "preach" it fewer still are qualified and called: But thou art: The Lord therefore hath need of thee: Leave, then, those claims of nature, high though they be, to those who are dead to the still higher claims of the kingdom of grace, which God is now erecting upon earth—Let the dead bury their dead: but go thou and preach the Kingdom of God.' And so have we here the genuine, but Procrastinating or Entangled Disciple. The next case is recorded only by Luke:

III. The Irresolute or Wavering Disciple (Luke, i. 61, 62). 61. "And another also said, Lord, I will follow thee; but let me first go bid them farewell which are at home at my house. 62. And Jesus said unto him, No man, having put his hand to the plough, and looking back, is fit for the kingdom of God." But for the very different replies given, we should hardly have discerned the difference between this and the second case: the one man called, indeed, and the other volunteering, as did the first; but both seemingly alike willing, and only having a difficulty in their way just at that moment. But, by help of what is said respectively to each, we perceive the great difference between the two cases. From the warning given against "looking back," it is evident that this man's discipleship was not yet thorough, his separation from the world not entire. It is not a case of going back, but of looking back; and as there is here a manifest reference to the case of "Lot's wife" (Genesis, 19. 26; and see on Luke, 17. 32), we see that it is not actual return to the world that we have here to deal with, but a reluctance to break with it. The figure of putting one's hand to the plough and looking back is an exceedingly vivid one, and to an agricultural people most impressive. As ploughing requires an eye intent on the furrow to be made, and is marred the instant one turns about, so will they come short of salvation who prosecute the work of God with a distracted attention, a divided heart. The reference may be chiefly to ministers; but the application at least is general. As the image seems plainly to have been suggested by the case of Elijah and Elisha, a difficulty may be raised, requiring a moment's attention. When Elijah cast his mantle about Elisha—which the youth quite understood to mean appointing him his successor, he was ploughing with twelve yoke of oxen, the last pair held by himself. Leaving his oxen, he ran after the prophet, and said, "Let me, I pray thee, kiss my father and my mother, and [then] I will follow thee." Was this said in the same spirit with the same speech uttered by our disciple? Let us see. "And Elijah said unto him, Go back again: for what have I done to thee." Commentators take this to mean that Elijah had really done nothing to hinder him from going on with all his ordinary duties. But to us it seems clear that Elijah's intention was to try what manner of spirit the youth was of:—'Kiss thy father and mother? And why not? By all means, go home and stay with them; for what have I done to thee? I did but throw a mantle about thee; but what of that?' If this was his meaning, Elisha thoroughly apprehended and nobly met it. "He returned back from him, and took a yoke of oxen, and slew them, and boiled their flesh with the instruments of the oxen [the wood of his ploughing implements], and gave unto the people, and they did eat; then he arose, and went after Elijah, and ministered unto him" (1 Kings, 19. 19-21). We know not if even his father and mother had time to be called to this hasty feast. But this much is plain, that, though in affluent circumstances, he gave up his lower calling, with all its prospects, for the higher, and at that time perilous office to which he was called. What now is the bearing of these two cases? Did Elisha do wrong in bidding them farewell with whom he was associated in his earthly calling? Or, if not, would this disciple have done wrong if he had done the same thing, and in the same spirit, with Elisha? Clearly not. Elisha's doing it proved that he could with safety do it; and our Lord's warning is not against bidding them farewell which were at home at his house, but against the probable fatal consequences of that step; lest the embraces of earthly relationship should prove too strong for him, and he should never return to follow Christ. Accordingly, we have called this the Irresolute or Wavering Disciple.

25-27. JESUS, CROSSING THE SEA OF GALILEE, MIRACULOUSLY STILLS A TEMPEST. (=Mark, 4. 35-41; Luke, 8. 22-23.) For the exposition, see on Mark, 4. 35-41.

28-34. JESUS HEALS THE GEROZENE DEMONIAC. (=Mark, 5. 1-20; Luke, 8. 26-30.) For the exposition, see on Mark, 5. 1-20.

CHAPTER IX.

VER. 1-8. HEALING OF A PARALYTIC. (=Mark, 2. 1-12; Luke, 5. 17-26.) This incident appears to follow next in order of time to the cure of the leper, ch. 8. 1-4. For the exposition, see on Mark, 2. 1-12.

9-13. MATTHEW'S CALL AND FEART. (=Mark, 2. 14-17; Luke, 5. 27-32.) The Call of Matthew (v. 9. 9. And as Jesus passed forth from thence—i. e., from the scene of the paralytic's cure in Capernaum, towards the shore of the sea of Galilee, on which that town lay. Mark, as usual, pictures the scene more in detail, thus (2. 13. 1. "And He went forth again by the sea-side; and all the multitude resorted unto Him, and He taught them"—or, "kept teaching them," "And as he passed by" he saw a man, named Matthew—the writer of this precious Gospel, who here, with singular modesty and brevity, relates the story of his own calling. In Mark and Luke he is called Levi, which seems to have been his family name. In their lists of the twelve apostles, however, Mark and Luke give him the name of Matthew, which seems to have been the name by which he was known as a disciple. While he himself sinks his family name, he is careful not to sink his occupation, the obnoxious associations with which he would place over against the grace that called him from it, and made him an apostle. (See on ch. 10. 3.) Mark alone tells us (2. 14) that he was "the son of Alphaeus"—the same, probably, with the father of James the less. From this and other considerations it is pretty certain that he must at least have heard of our Lord before this meeting. Unnecessary doubts, even from an early period, have been raised about the identity of Levi and Matthew. No English jury, with the evidence before them which we have in the Gospels, would testate in giving in a unanimous verdict of identity. sitting at the receipt of custom—as a publican, which Luke 9. 7. calls him. It means the place of receipt, the toll-house or booth in which the collector sat. Being in this case by the sea-side, it might be the ferry-tax, for the transit of persons and goods across the lake, which he collected. (See on ch. 5. 46.) and he waits unto him. Follow me. With such words these, from the lips of Him who never employed them without giving them restless efficacy in the hearts of those they were spoken to. And he "left all" (Luke. 9. 59. and followed him.

The Feast is, 19. 10. And it came to pass, as Jesus sat at meat in the house. The modesty of our Evangelist signally appears here. Luke says (v. 29) that "Levi made Him a great feast," or 'reception,' while Matthew merely says, "He sat at meat;" and Mark and Luke say that it was in Levi's "own house," while Matthew merely says, "He sat at meat in the house." Whether this feast was made now, or not 20 afterwards, is a point of some importance in the order of events, and not agreed among harmonists. The probability is that it did not take place till a considerable time afterwards. For Matthew, who ought surely to know what took place while his Lord was speaking at his own table, tells us that the visit of Jairus, the ruler of the synagogue, occurred at that moment (v. 18). But we know from Mark and Luke that this visit of Jairus did not take place till after our Lord's return, at a later period, from the country of the Gadarenes. (See Mark, 5. 21, &c., and Luke, 8. 40, &c.) We conclude, therefore, that the feast was not made in the novelty of his discipleship, but after Matthew had had time to be somewhat established in the faith: when, returning to Capernaum, his companions for old friends, of his own calling and character, led him to gather them together that they might have an opportunity of hearing the gracious words which proceeded out of His Master's mouth, if haply they might experience a like change. behold, many publicans and sinners—Luke says, "a great company" (v. 20, came and sat down with him and his disciples. In all such cases the word rendered 'sat' is 'meant' in allusion to the ancient mode of lying on couches at meals. 11. And when the Pharisees—"and scribes," add Mark and Luke, saw it, they "muttered" or 'muttered,' says Luke (5. 30), and said unto his disciples—not venturing to put their question to Jesus Himself. Why eateth your Master with publicans and sinners? (See on Luke, 15. 2.) 12. But when Jesus heard (that), he said unto them—to the Pharisees and scribes; addressing Himself to them, though they had shrunk from addressing Him. They that are whole need not a physician, but they that are sick—i.e., 'Ye deem yourselves whole; My mission, therefore, is not to you: The physician's business is with the sick; therefore eat I with publicans and sinners.' O, what myriads of broken hearts, of sick souls, have been bound up by this matchless saying! 13. But go ye and learn what that meaneth (Hosea, 6. 6. I will have mercy, and not sacrifice—i.e., the one rather than the other. "Sacrifice" the chief part of the ceremonial law, is here put for a religion of external observance to mere rules; while "Mercy" expresses such compassion for the fallen as seeks to lift them up. The duty of keeping aloof from the polluted, in the sense of "having no fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness," is obvious enough; but to understand this as prohibiting such intercourse with them as is necessary to their recovery, is to place it. This was what these pharisaical representatives did, and this is what our Lord here exposes. For I am come to call the righteous, but sinners (to repentance). The words enclosed in brackets are of doubtful authority here, and more than doubtful authority in Mark, 2. 17; but in Luke, 5. 32 they are undisputed. We have here just the former statement stripped of its figure. "The righteous" are the whole; "sinners," the sick. When Christ "called" the latter, as He did Matthew, and probably some of those publicans and sinners whom he had invited to meet with Him, it was to heal them of their spiritual maladies, or save their souls; "The righteous," like those miserable, self-satisfied Pharisees, "He sent empty away."

14-17. DISCOURSE ON FASTING. See on Luke, 5. 33-39.

18-26. THE WOMAN WITH THE ISSUE OF BLOOD HEALED.—THE DAUGHTER OF JAIRUS RAISED TO LIFE. (=Luke, 8. 40-56; Mark, 5. 21-43.) For the exposition, see on Mark, 5. 21-43.

27-34. TWO BLIND MEN, AND A DUMB DEMONIAK HEALED. These two miracles are recorded by Matthew alone. Two Blind Men Healed (v. 27-31). 27. And when Jesus departed thence, two blind men followed him—hearing, doubtless, as in a later case is expressed, "that Jesus passed by" (ch. 20. 30), crying, and saying, Thou son of David, have mercy on us. It is remarkable that in the only other recorded case in which the blind applied to Jesus for their sight, and obtained it, they addressed Him, over and over again, by this one Messianic title, so well known—"Son of David" (ch. 20. 30). Can there be a doubt that their faith fastened on such great Messianic promises as this, "Then the eyes of the blind shall be opened?" &c. (Isaiah, 35. 5); and if so, this appeal to Him, as the Consolation of Israel, to do His predicted office, would fall with great weight upon the ears of Jesus. 28. And when he came into the house. To try their faith and patience, He seems to have made them no answer. But the blind men came to Him—which, no doubt, was what He desired, and Jesus saith unto them, Believe ye that I am able to do this? they said unto him, Yea, Lord. Doubtless our Lord's design was not only to put their faith to the test by this question, but to deepen it, to raise their expectation of a cure, and so prepare them to receive it; and the cordial acknowledgment, so touchingly simple, which they immediately made to Him of His power to heal them, shows how entirely that object was gained. 29. Then touched he their eyes, saying, According to your faith be it unto you—Not, Receive a cure proportioned to your faith, but, Receive this cure as granted to your faith. Thus would they carry about with them, in their restored vision, a gracious seal of the faith which drew it from their compassionate Lord. 30. And their eyes were opened: and Jesus straitly charged them. The expression is very strong, denoting great earnestness. 31. But they, when they were departed, spread abroad his fame in all that country. (See on ch. 8. 4.)

A Dumb Demoniac Healed (v. 32-34). 32. As they went out, behold, they brought to him a dumb man possessed with a devil—"demonized." The dumbness was not natural, but was the effect of the possession. 33. And when the devil—or 'demon'—was cast out, the dumb spake. The particulars in this case are not given; the object being simply to record the instantaneous restoration of the natural faculties, on the removal of the malignant oppression of them, the form which the popular astonishment took, and the very different effect of it upon another class, and the multitudes marvelled, saying, It was never so seen in Israel—referring, probably, not to this case only, but to all those miraculous displays of healing power which seemed to promise a new era in the history of Israel. Probably they meant by this language to indicate, as far as they thought it safe to do so, their inclination to regard Him as the promised Messiah. 34. But the Pharisees said, He casteth out devils through the prince of the devils—the demons through the prince of the demons.' This seems to be the first muttering of a theory of such miracles which soon became a fixed mode of calumniating them—a theory which would be ridiculous if it were not melancholy, as an outburst of the darkest malignity. (See on ch. 12, 24, &c.)

35—X. A. THIRD GALILEAN CIRCUIT—MISSION OF THE TWELVE APOSTLES. As the Mission of the Twelve supposes the previous Choice of them—of which our Evangelist gives no account, and which did not take place till a later stage of our Lord's public life—it is introduced here out of its proper place, which is after what is recorded in Luke, 4, 12-19.

Third Galilean Circuit (c. 35)—and probably the last. 35. And Jesus went about all the cities and villages, teaching in their synagogues, and preaching the gospel of the kingdom, and healing every sickness and every disease [among the people]. The bracketed words are of more than doubtful authority here, and were probably introduced from ch. 4, 23. The language here is so identical with that used in describing the first circuit (ch. 4, 23), that we may presume the work done on both occasions was much the same. It was just a further preparation of the soil, and a fresh sowing of the precious seed. (See on ch. 4, 21.) To these fruitful journeyings of the Redeemer, "with healing in His wings," Peter no doubt alludes, when, in his address to the household of Cornelius, he spoke of "How God anointed Jesus of Nazareth with the Holy Ghost and with power: who went about doing good, and healing all that were oppressed of the devil: for God was with Him" (Acts, 10, 38).

Jesus, Compassionating the Multitude, Asks Prayer for Help (c. 35-36). He had now returned from His preaching and healing circuit, and the result, as at the close of the first one, was the gathering of a vast and motley multitude around Him. After a whole night spent in prayer, He had called His more immediate disciples, and from them had solemnly chosen the Twelve; then, coming down from the mountain, on which this was transacted, to the multitudes that waited for Him below, He had addressed to them—as we take it—that Discourse which bears so strong a resemblance to the Sermon on the Mount that many critics take it to be the same. (See on Luke, 4, 12-49; and on ch. 4, Introductory Remarks.) Soon after this, it should seem, the multitudes still hanging on Him, Jesus is touched with their wretched and helpless condition, and acts as is now to be described. 36. But when he saw the multitudes, he was moved with compassion on them, because they fainted. This reading, however, has hardly any authority at all. The true reading doubtless is, 'were harassed,' and were scattered abroad—rather, 'lying about,' 'abandoned,' or 'neglected'—as sheep having no shepherd—their pitiable condition as wearied and couching under bodily fatigue, a vast disorganized mass, being but a faint picture of their wretchedness as the victims of Pharisaic guidance; their souls uncared for, yet drawn after and hanging upon Him. This moved the Redeemer's compassion. 37. Then saith he unto his disciples, The harvest truly is plenteous. His eye doubtless rested immediately on the Jewish field, but this he saw widening into the vast field of "the world" (ch. 13, 38), teeming with souls having to be gathered to Him, but the labourers—men divinely qualified and called to gather them in—are few: 38. Pray ye therefore the Lord of the harvest—the great Lord and Proprietor of all. Cf. John, 16, 1—"I am the true Vine, and my Father is the Husbandman." that he will send forth labourers into his harvest. The word properly means 'thrust forth'; but this emphatic sense disappears in some places, as in v. 25, and John, 10, 4—"When He putteth forth His own sheep." (See on ch. 4, 1.)

CHAPTER X.

Ver. 1-5. Mission of the Twelve Apostles (=Mark, 6, 7-13; Luke, 9, 1-6). The last three verses of ch. 9, form the proper introduction to the Mission of the Twelve; as is evident from the remarkable fact that the Mission of the Seventy was prefaced by the very same words. (See on Luke, 10, 2.) 1. And when he had called unto him his twelve disciples, he gave them power. The word signifies both 'power,' and 'authority' or 'right.' Even if it were not evident that here both ideas are included, we find both words expressly used in the parallel passage of Luke (9, 1)—"He gave them power and authority"—in other words, He both qualified and authorized them—against—or 'over'—unclean spirits, to cast them out, and to heal all manner of sickness, and all manner of disease. 2. Now the names of the twelve apostles are these. The other Evangelists enumerate the Twelve in immediate connection with their appointment (Mark, 3, 13-19; Luke, 4, 13-16). But our Evangelist, not intending to record the appointment, but only the Mission of the Twelve, gives their names here. And as in the Acts, i, 13, we have a list of the Eleven who met daily in the upper room with the other disciples after their Master's ascension until the day of Pentecost, we have four catalogues in all for comparison. The first, Simon, who is called Peter (see on John, 1, 42), and Andrew his brother; James the son of Zebedee, and John his brother—named after James, as the younger of the two. 3. Philip and Bartholomew. That this person is the same with "Nathanael of Cana in Galilee," is justly concluded for the three following reasons: First, because Bartholomew is not so properly a name as a family surname; next, because not only in this list, but in Mark's and Luke's, he follows the name of "Philip," who was the instrument of bringing Nathanael first to Jesus (John, 1, 45); and again, when our Lord, after His resurrection, appeared at the sea of Tiberias, "Nathanael of Cana in Galilee" is mentioned along with six others, all of them apostles, as being present (John, 21, 2). Matthew the publican. In none of the four lists of the Twelve is this apostle so branded but in his own one, as if he would have all to know how deep a debtor he had been to his Lord. (See on ch. 1, 3, 5, 6; 9, 9.) James the son of Alphaeus—the same person apparently who is called Cleopas or Copas (Luke, 24, 18; John, 19, 25; and as he was the husband of Mary, sister to the Virgin, James the less must have been our Lord's cousin, and Lebbeus, whose surname was Thaddeus—the same, without doubt, as "Judas the brother of James," mentioned in both the lists of Luke (6, 16; Acts, 1, 13), while no one of the name of Lebbeus or Thaddeus is so. It is he who in John (14, 22) is sweetly called "Judas, not Iscariot." That he was the author of the Catholic Epistle of "Jude," and not "the Lord's brother" (ch. 13, 65), unless these be the same, is most likely. 4. Simon the Cananite; rather 'Kananite,' but better still, 'the Zealot,' as he is called in Luke, 4, 15, where the original term should not have been retained as in our version ("Simon, called Zelotes"; but rendered 'Simon, called the Zealot.' The word "Kananite" is just the Aramaic, or Syro-Chaldaic, term for 'Zealot.' Probably before his acquaintance with Jesus, he belonged to the sect of the Zealots, who bound themselves, as a sort of voluntary ecclesiastical police, to see that the law was not broken with impunity, and Judas Iscariot—i. e., Judas of Kerioth, a town of Judah (Joshua, 15, 25); so called to distinguish him from "Judas the brother of James" (Luke, 4, 16), who also betrayed him—a note of infamy attached to his name in all the catalogues of the Twelve.

5-12. THE TWELVE RECEIVE THEIR INSTRUCTIONS. This Directory divides itself into three dis-

The first part—extending from v. 5 to 15—directions for the brief and temporary which they were now going forth, with the places they were to go to, the works to do, the message they were to bear, and in which they were to conduct themselves—part—extending from v. 16 to 23—directions of no such limited and temporary it opens out into the permanent exercise of ministry. The third part—extending from v. 24 to 42—of wider application still, reaching not to ministry of the Gospel in every age, but to the work of Christ in the widest sense. It is a division of this threefold division, that each with the words, "VERILY I SAY UNTO YOU" etc.

for the Present Mission (v. 5-15). 5. These are sent forth, and commanded them, saying, Go ye into the way of the Gentiles, and into every city whithersoever ye enter. The Samaritans were hated by blood; but being the descendants of the king of Assyria had transported from the place of the ten tribes carried away they had adopted the religion of the Jews, with admixtures of their own; and, as the neighbours of the Jews, they occupied a place between them and the Gentiles. And when this prohibition was to be taken off, the Spirit at Pentecost, the apostles said that they should be Christ's witnesses first in Jerusalem, and in all Judaea; then "in Samaria," and "unto the uttermost part of the earth." 6. But go rather to the lost sheep of Israel. Until Christ's death, which broke the wall of partition (Ephesians, 2: 14), the commission was to the Jews only, who were the visible people of God, were "lost sheep" in the sense in which all sinners are (Isaiah, 53: 6; with Luke, 19: 10), but as abandoned wanderers from the right way by faithless leaders (Jeremiah, 50, 6, 17; Ezekiel, 34: 2-6, &c.). 7. Ye shall say, The kingdom of heaven is at hand. [cast out devils.] The bracketed words "the dead"—is wanting in many MSS. 8. The first communication of super-natural gifts of Pentecost. And right he dispense it, freely ye have received, likewise give, divinely said! (cf. Deuteronomy, 32: 6)—an apple of gold in a sieve (Proverbs, 25: 11). It reminds us of the saying of our Lord, rescued from the sun. "It is more blessed to give than to receive." Who can estimate what the such sayings, and with what beautiful fruit such seeds have covered, and this earth! 9. Provide neither gold, nor silver, nor for your purses—i.e., your belts, kept their money. 10. Nor scrip for your wallets used by travellers for holding their two coats—or tunics, worn next the skin. Take no change of dress, no shoes, neither shoes—i.e., change of them. The received text here has 'a staff,' but follows another reading, 'staves,' found in the received text of Luke (9: 3), and, however, evidently is 'a staff'—they were not to procure even thus for this missionary journey, but to go forth as they had. No doubt it was the misunderstanding that gave rise to the reading "staves" MSS. Even if this reading were genuine, it means "more than one;" for who, as ALA, would think of taking a spare staff?

for the workman is worthy of his meat—his 'food' or 'maintenance'; a principle which, being universally recognised in secular affairs, is here authoritatively applied to the services of the Lord's workmen, and by Paul repeatedly and touchingly employed in his appeals to the churches (Romans, 15: 27; 1 Corinthians, 9: 11; Galatians, 6: 6), and once as "Scripture" (1 Timothy, 5: 18). 11. And into whatsoever city or town—or village—ye shall enter [carefully] enquire who in it is worthy—or 'meet' to entertain such messengers; not in point of rank, of course, but of congenial disposition. and there abide till ye go thence—not shifting about, as if discontented, but returning the welcome given them with a courteous, contented, accommodating disposition. 12. And when ye come into an house—or 'the house,' but it means not the worthy house, but the house ye first enter, to try if it be worthy. salute it—show it the usual civilities. 13. And if the house be worthy—showing this by giving you a welcome—let your peace come upon it. This is best explained by the injunction to the Seventy, "And into whatsoever house ye enter, first say, Peace be to this house" (Luke, 10: 5). This was the ancient salutation of the East, and it prevails to this day. But from the lips of Christ and his messengers, it means something far higher, both in the gift and the giving of it, than in the current salutation. (See on John, 14: 27.) but if it be not worthy, let your peace return to you. If your peace finds a shut instead of an open door in the heart of any household, take it back to yourselves, who know how to value it, and will taste the sweeter to you for having been offered, even though rejected. 14. And whosoever shall not receive you, nor hear your words, when ye depart out of that house or city—for possibly a whole town might not furnish one "worthy," shake off the dust of your feet—for a testimony against them," as Mark and Luke add. By this symbolical action they vividly shook themselves from all connection with such, and all responsibility for the guilt of rejecting them and their message. Such symbolical actions were common in ancient times, even among others than the Jews, as strikingly appears in Pilate (ch. 27: 24). And even to this day it prevails in the East. 15. Verily I say unto you, It shall be more tolerable—more bearable, for Sodom and Gomorrah in the day of judgment, than for that city. Those cities of the plain, which were given to the flames for their loathsome impurities, shall be treated as less criminal, we are here taught, than those places which, though morally respectable, reject the Gospel message and affront those that bear it.

Directions for the Future and Permanent Exercise of the Christian Ministry (v. 16-23). 16. Behold, I send you forth. The "I" here is emphatic, holding up Himself as the Fountain of the Gospel ministry, as He is also the Great Burden of it, as sheep—defenceless, in the midst of wolves—ready to make a prey of you (John, 10: 12). To be left exposed, as sheep to wolves, would have been startling enough; but that the sheep should be sent among the wolves would sound strange indeed. No wonder this announcement begins with the exclamation, "Behold," be ye therefore wise as serpents, and harmless as doves. Wonderful combination this! Alone, the wisdom of the serpent is mere cunning, and the harmlessness of the dove little better than weakness; but in combination, the wisdom of the serpent would save them from unnecessary exposure to danger; the harmlessness of the dove, from sinful expedients to escape it. In the apostolic age of Christianity, how harmoniously were these qualities displayed! Instead of the fanatical thirst for martyrdom, to which a later age gave birth, there was a manly combination of unflinching zeal and calm discretion, before which nothing was able to stand. 17. But beware of men; for they will deliver you up to the councils—the local courts, used here for civil magistrates in general, and they will scourge you in their synagogues. By this is meant persecution at the hands of the ecclesiastics. 18. And ye shall be brought before governors—or provincial rulers, and kings—the highest tribunals—for my sake, for a testimony against them—rather, 'to them,' in order to bear testimony to the truth and its glorious effects—and [to] the Gentiles—a hint that their message would not long be confined to the lost sheep of the house of Israel. The Acts of the Apostles are the best commentary on these warnings. 19. But when they deliver you up, take no thought—'be not solicitous' or 'anxious.' (See on ch. 6. 25.) how or what ye shall speak—i. e., either in what manner ye shall make your defence, or of what matter it shall consist—for it shall be given you in that same hour what ye shall speak. (See Exodus, 4. 12; Jeremiah, 1. 7.) 20. For it is not ye that speak, but the Spirit of your Father which speaketh in you. How remarkably this has been verified, the whole history of persecution thrillingly proclaims—from the Acts of the Apostles to the latest martyrology. 21. And the brother shall deliver up the brother to death, and the father the child: and the children shall rise up against their parents, and cause them to be put to death—for example, by lodging informations against them with the authorities. The deep and virulent hostility of the old nature and life to the new—as of Bellal to Christ—was to issue in awful wrenches of the dearest ties; and the disciples, in the prospect of their cause and themselves being launched upon society, are here prepared for the worst. 22. And ye shall be hated of all men for my name's sake. The universality of this hatred would make it evident to them, that since it would not be owing to any temporary excitement, local virulence, or personal prejudice, on the part of their enemies, so no amount of discretion on their part, consistent with entire fidelity to the truth, would avail to stifle that enmity—though it might soften its violence, and in some cases avert the outward manifestations of it, but he that endureth to the end shall be saved—a great saying, repeated, in connection with similar warnings, in the prophecy of the destruction of Jerusalem (ch. 24. 13); and often reiterated by the apostle as a warning against "drawing back unto perdition." (Hebrews, 3. 6. 13; 4. 4-6; 10. 23, 26-29, 38, 39; &c.) As "drawing back unto perdition" is merely the palpable evidence of the want of "root" from the first in the Christian profession (Luke, 8. 13, so "enduring to the end" is just the proper evidence of its reality and solidity. 23. But when they persecute you in this city, flee ye into another—into the other." This, though applicable to all time, and exemplified by our Lord Himself once and again, had special reference to the brief opportunities which Israel was to have of "knowing the time of his visitation." for verily I say unto you—what will startle you, but at the same time show you the solemnity of your mission, and the need of economizing the time for it—Ye shall not have gone over—Ye shall in no wise have completed" the cities of Israel, till the Son of man be come. To understand this—as LANGRISH and others do—in the first instance, of Christ's own peregrinations, as if He had said, "Waste not your time upon hostile places, for I myself will be after you ere your work be over"—seems almost trifling. "The coming of the Son of man" has a fixed doctrinal sense, here referring immediately to the crisis of Israel's history as the visible kingdom of God, when Christ was to come and judge it: when "the wrath would come upon it to the uttermost;" and when, on the ruins of Jerusalem and the old economy, He would establish His own kingdom. This, in the uniform language of Scripture, is more immediately "the coming of the Son of man," "the day of vengeance of our God" (ch. 10. 28; 24. 27, 34; with Hebrews, 10. 26; James, 5. 7-9)—but only as being such a lively anticipation of His Second Coming for vengeance and deliverance. So understood, it is parallel with ch. 24. 14 (on which see).

Directions for the Service of Christ in its widest sense (v. 24-43). 24. The disciple is not above his master—'teacher,' nor the servant above his lord—another maxim which our Lord repeats in various connections (Luke, 6. 40; John, 13. 16; 15. 20'. 25. It is enough for the disciple that he be as his Master, and the servant as his Lord. If they have called the master of the house Beelzebub. All the Greek MSS. write "Beelzebub," which undoubtedly is the right form of this word. The other reading came in no doubt from the Old Testament "Baalzebub," the god of Ekron (3 Kings, 1. 2', which it was designed to express. As all idolatry was regarded as devil-worship (Leviticus, 17. 7; Deuteronomy, 32. 17; Psalm 106. 37; 1 Corinthians, 10. 20, so there seems to have been something peculiarly Satanic about the worship of this hateful god, which caused his name to be a synonym of Satan. Though we nowhere read that our Lord was actually called "Beelzebub," He was charged with being in league with Satan under that hateful name (ch. 12. 24, 26', and more than once Himself was charged with "having a devil" or "demon" Mark, 3. 30; John, 7. 20; 8. 49). Here it is used to denote the most opprobrious language which could be applied by one to another, how much more [shall they call] them of his household—the inmates." Three relations in which Christ stands to His people are here mentioned: He is their Teacher—they His disciples; He is their Lord—they His servants; He is the Master of the household—they its inmates. In all these relations, He says here, He and they are so bound up together that they cannot look to fare better than He, and should think it enough if they are no worse. 26. Fear them not therefore: for there is nothing covered, that shall not be revealed; and hid, that shall not be known—q. d., 'There is no use, and no need, of concealing anything; right and wrong, truth and error, are about to come into open and deadly collision; and the day is coming when all hidden things shall be disclosed, everything seen as it is, and every one have his due' (1 Corinthians, 4. 6). 27. What I tell you in darkness—in the privacy of a teaching for which men are not yet ripe—that speak ye in the light—for when ye go forth all will be ready—and what ye hear in the ear, that preach ye upon the house-tops:—Give free and fearless utterance to all that I have taught you while yet with you. Objection: But this may cost us our life? Answer: It may, but there their power ends: 28. And fear not them which kill the body, but are not able to kill the soul. In Luke, 12. 4, "and after that have no more that they can do," but rather fear him—in Luke this is peculiarly solemn, "I will forewarn you whom ye shall fear," even Him which is able to destroy both soul and body in hell. A decisive proof this that there is a hell for the body as well as the soul in the eternal world; in other words, that the torment that awaits the lost will have elements of suffering adapted to the material as well as the spiritual part of our nature, both of which, we are assured, will exist forever. In the corresponding warning contained in Luke, Jesus calls His disciples "My friends," as if He had felt that such sufferings constituted a bond of peculiar tenderness between Him and them. 29. Are not two sparrows sold for a farthing? In Luke (12. 6) it is "Five sparrows sold for two farthings;" so that, if the purchaser took two farthings' worth, he got one in addition—of such small value were they, and one of them shall not fall on the ground—exhausted or killed—without your Father—"Not one of them is forgotten to God," as it is in Luke. 30. But the very hairs of his head are all numbered. See Luke, 21. 15 (and of the language I Samuel, 14. 45; Acts, 27. 34). 31. Ye are not therefore, ye are of more value than many swine. Was ever language of such simplicity felt by any such weight as this does? But here lies the charm and power of our Lord's teaching. Whoever therefore shall confess me before men—wearing the shame," him will I confess also before the Father which is in heaven—I will not be ashamed of him, but will own him before the most august of assembles. 32. But whosoever shall deny me before men will I also deny before my Father which is in heaven—before that same assembly; 'He shall have Me his own treatment of Me on the earth.' See ch. 16. 27. 34. Think not that I am come to save the world; I came not to send peace, but a sword, discord, conflict; deadly opposition between the hostile principles, penetrating into and agitating the dearest ties. 35. For I am come as a man at variance against his father, and the daughter-in-law against her mother, and the daughter-in-law against her mother-in-law. See on Luke, 12. 51-53. 36. A man's foes shall be they of his own household, saying, which is quoted, as is the whole verse, Micah, 7. 6. It is but an extension of the Psalmist's sentiment, Psalm 41. 9; 55. 12-14, which had its most striking illustration in the treason of Judas against Lord Himself (John, 13. 18; Matthew, 26. 48-50). It would arise the necessity of a choice between the nearest and the nearest relations, which would put it to the severest test. 37. He that loveth father or mother more than me, is not worthy of me; and he that loveth son or daughter more than me, is not worthy of me. Deuteronomy, 33. 9. As the preference of the world, in the case supposed, necessitate the abandonment of the other, our Lord here, with a stern, yet awful self-respect, asserts His own claims of supreme affection. 38. And he that taketh not his cross, and followeth after me, is not worthy of me—a saying which our Lord once and again emphatically repeats (ch. 10. 14; Luke, 9. 23; 14. 27). We have become so accustomed to this expression—"taking up one's cross"—in the sense of 'being prepared for martyrdom in general for Christ's sake,' that we are apt to lose sight of its primary and proper sense here—"a willingness to go forth even to crucifixion," as when our Lord had to bear His own cross on His way to Calvary—saying the more remarkable as our Lord had not as yet given a hint that He would die this death, nor was crucifixion a Jewish mode of capital punishment. 39. He that findeth his life shall lose it; and he that loseth his life for my sake shall find it—another of those pregnant sayings which our Lord so often utters (ch. 10. 25; Luke, 17. 33; John, 12. 25). The pitch of such paradoxical maxims depends on the double sense attached to the word "life"—a lower and a higher, the natural and the spiritual, the temporal and eternal. An entire sacrifice of the lower, with all its relationships and interests—or, which is the same thing, a willingness to make it—is indispensable to the preservation of the higher life; and he who cannot bring himself to surrender the one for the sake of the other shall eventually lose both. 40. He that receiveth—or 'entertaineth' you, receiveth me; and he that receiveth me, receiveth him that sent me. As the treatment which an ambassador receives is understood and regarded as expressing the light in which he that sends him is viewed, so, says our Lord here, 'Your authority is mine, as mine is my Father's.' 41. He that receiveth a prophet—one divinely commissioned to deliver a message from heaven. Predicting future events was no necessary part of a prophet's office, especially as the word is used in the New Testament, in the name of a prophet—for his office' sake and love to his Master. (See 2 Kings, 4. 9, 10.) shall receive a prophet's reward. What an encouragement to those who are not prophets! (See 3 John, 5-8.) and he that receiveth a righteous man in the name of a righteous man—from sympathy with his character and esteem for himself as such, shall receive a righteous man's reward—for he must himself have the seed of righteousness who has any real sympathy with it and placency in him who possesses it. 42. And whosoever shall give to drink unto one of these little ones. Beautiful epithet! originally taken from Zechariah, 13. 7. The reference is to their lowliness in spirit, their littleness in the eyes of an undiscerning world, while high in Heaven's esteem, a cup of cold water only—meaning, the smallest service, in the name of a disciple—or, as it is in Mark (9. 41), because ye are Christ's: from love to Me, and to him from his connection with Me, verily I say unto you, he shall in no wise lose his reward. There is here a descending climax—"a prophet," "a righteous man," "a little one;" signifying that however low we come down in our services to those that are Christ's, all that is done for His sake, and that bears the stamp of love to His blessed name, shall be divinely appreciated and owned and rewarded.

CHAPTER XI.

VER. 1-19. THE IMPRISONED BAPTIST'S MESSAGE TO HIS MASTER—THE REPLY, AND DISCOURSE, ON THE DEPARTURE OF THE MESSENGERS, REGARDING JOHN AND HIS MISSION. (=Luke, 7. 18-35.) 1. And it came to pass, when Jesus had made an end of commanding his—rather, 'the' twelve disciples, he departed thence to teach and to preach in their cities. This was scarcely a fourth circuit—if we may judge from the less formal way in which it is expressed—but, perhaps, a set of visits paid to certain places, either not reached at all, or too rapidly passed through before, in order to fill up the time till the return of the Twelve. As to their labours, nothing is said of them by our Evangelist. But Luke (9. 6) says, "They departed, and went through the towns," or 'villages,' "preaching the Gospel, and healing everywhere." Mark (6. 12, 13), as usual, is more explicit: "And they went out, and preached that men should repent. And they cast out many devils (or 'demons'), and anointed with oil many that were sick, and healed them." Though this "anointing with oil" was not mentioned in our Lord's instructions—at least in any of the records of them—we know it to have been practised long after this in the apostolic Church (see James, 5. 14, and cf. Mark, 6. 12, 13)—not medicinally, but as a sign of the healing virtue which was communicated by their hands, and a symbol of something still more precious. It was unction, indeed, but, as BENNETT remarks, it was something very different from what Romanists call extreme unction. He adds, what is very probable, that they do not appear to have carried the oil about with them, but, as the Jews used oil as a medicine, to have employed it just as they found it with the sick, in their own higher way. 2. Now when John had heard in the prison. For the account of this imprisonment, see on Mark, 6. 17-20. the works of Christ, he sent, &c. On the whole passage, see on Luke, 7. 18-35.

20-30. OUTBURST OF FEELING, SUGGESTED TO THE MIND OF JESUS BY THE RESULT OF HIS LABOURS IN GALILEE. The connection of this with what goes before it, and the similarity of its tone, makes it evident, we think, that it was delivered on the same occasion, and that it is but a new and more comprehensive series of reflections in the same strain. 20. Then began he to upbraid the cities wherein most of his mighty works were done, because they repented not. 21. Woe unto thee, Chorazin!—not elsewhere mentioned, but it must have lain near Capernaum. woe unto thee, Bethsaida! ['hunting' or 'fishing-house'—a fishing station']—on the western side of the sea of Galilee, and to the north of Capernaum; the birth-place of three of the apostles—the brothers Andrew and Peter, and Phillip. These two cities appear to be singled out to denote the whole region in which they lay—a region favoured with the Redeemer's presence, teaching, and works above every other, for if the mighty works—the miracles which were done in you had been done in Tyre and Sidon—ancient and celebrated commercial cities, on the north-eastern shores of the Mediterranean sea, lying north of Palestine, and the latter the northern-most. As their wealth and prosperity engendered luxury and its concomitant evils—irreligion and moral degeneracy—their overthrow was repeatedly foretold in ancient prophecy, and once and again fulfilled by victorious enemies. Yet they were rebuilt, and at this time were in a flourishing condition. They would have repented long ago in sackcloth and ashes. Remarkable language, showing that they had done less violence to conscience, and so, in God's sight, were less criminal than the region here spoken of. 22. But I say unto you, It shall be more tolerable—more 'endurable,' for Tyre and Sidon at the day of judgment, than for you. 23. And then, Capernaum (see on ch. 4. 13, which art exalted unto heaven. Not even of Chorazin and Bethsaida is this said. For since at Capernaum Jesus had His stated abode during the whole period of His public life which He spent in Galilee, it was the most favoured spot upon earth, the most exalted in privilege. shall be brought down to hell: for if the mighty works, which have been done in thee, had been done in Sodom—destroyed for its pollutions, it would have remained until this day—having done no such violence to conscience, and so incurred unpeppably less guilt. 24. But I say unto you, That it shall be more tolerable for the land of Sodom in the day of judgment, than for thee. 'It has been indeed,' says Dr. STANLEY, 'more tolerable, in one sense, in the day of its earthly judgment, for the land of Sodom than for Capernaum; for the name, and perhaps even the remains, of Sodom are still to be found on the shores of the Dead Sea; whilst that of Capernaum has, on the Lake of Gennesareth, been utterly lost.' But the judgment of which our Lord here speaks is still future; a judgment not on material cities, but their responsible inhabitants—a judgment final and irretrievable. 25. At that time Jesus answered and said. We are not to understand by this, that the previous discourse had been concluded; and that this is a record only of something said about the same period. For the connection is most close, and the word "answered"—which, when there is no one to answer, refers to something just before said, or rising in the mind of the speaker in consequence of something said—confirms this. What Jesus here "answered" evidently was the melancholy results of His ministry, lamented over in the foregoing verses. It is as if He had said, 'Yes; but there is a brighter side of the picture; even in those who have rejected the message of eternal life, it is the pride of their own hearts only which has blinded them, and the glory of the truth does but the more appear in their inability to receive it; Nor have all rejected it even here; souls thirsting for salvation have drawn water with joy from the wells of salvation; the weary have found rest; the hungry have been filled with good things, while the rich have been sent empty away.' I thank thee—rather, 'I assent to thee.' But this is not strong enough. The idea of 'jud' or 'cordial' concurrence is conveyed by the preposition. The thing expressed is adoring acquiescence, holy satisfaction with that law of the divine procedure about to be mentioned. And as, when He afterwards uttered the same words, He "exulted in spirit"

(see on Luke, 10. 21), probably He did the same now, though not recorded. O Father, Lord of heaven and earth. He so styles His Father here, to signify that from Him of right emanate all such high arrangements. because thou hast hid these things—the knowledge of these saving truths—from the wise and prudent. The former of these terms points to the men who pride themselves upon their speculative or philosophical attainments; the latter to the men of worldly shrewdness—the clever, the sharp-witted, the men of affairs. The distinction is a natural one, and was well understood. (See 1 Corinthians, 1. 19; &c.) But why had the Father hid from such the things that belonged to their peace, and why did Jesus so emphatically set His seal to this arrangement? Because it is not for the offending and revolted to speak or to speculate, but to listen to Him from whom we have broken loose, that we may learn whether there be any recovery for us at all; and if there be, on what principles—of what nature—to what ends. To bring our own "wisdom and prudence" to such questions is impertinent and presumptuous; and if the truth regarding them, or the glory of it, be "hid" from us, it is but a fitting retribution, to which all the right-minded will set their seal along with Jesus. But, Thou hast revealed them unto babes—to babe-like men; men of unassuming docility, men who, conscious that they know nothing, and have no right to sit in judgment on the things that belong to their peace, determine simply to "hear what God the Lord will speak." Such are well called "babes." (See Hebrews, 5. 13; 1 Corinthians, 13. 11; 14. 20; &c.) 26. Even so, Father; for so it seemed good—the emphatic and chosen term for expressing any object of divine complacency; whether Christ Himself (see on ch. 3. 17) or God's gracious eternal arrangements (see on Philipians, 2. 13)—in thy sight. This is just a sublime echo of the foregoing words; as if Jesus, when He uttered them, had paused to reflect on it, and as if the glory of it—not so much in the light of its own reasonableness as of God's absolute will that so it should be—had filled His soul. 27. All things are delivered unto me of my Father. He does not say, They are revealed—as to one who knew them not, and was an entire stranger to them save as they were discovered to him—but, They are 'delivered over,' or 'committed, to me of my Father; meaning the whole administration of the kingdom of grace. So in John, 3. 35, "The Father loveth the Son, and hath given all things into His hand" (see on that verse). But though the "all things" in both these passages refer properly to the kingdom of grace, they of course include all things necessary to the full execution of that trust—that is, unlimited power. (So ch. 28. 18; John, 17. 2; Ephesians, 1. 22.) and no man knoweth the Son, but the Father; neither knoweth any man the Father, save the Son, and he to whomsoever the Son will—or "willeth" to reveal him. What a saying is this, that 'the Father and the Son are mutually and exclusively known to each other!' A higher claim to equality with the Father cannot be conceived. Either, then, we have here one of the most revolting assumptions ever uttered, or the proper Divinity of Christ should to Christians be beyond dispute. 'But alas for me!' may some burdened soul, sighing for relief, here exclaim. If it be thus with us, what can any poor creature do but lie down in passive despair, unless he could dare to hope that he may be one of the favoured class 'to whom the Son is willing to reveal the Father?' But nay. This testimony to the sovereignty of that gracious "will," on which alone men's salvation depends, is designed but to reveal the source and enhance the glory of it when once imparted—not to paralyse or shut the soul up in despair. Hear, accordingly, what follows: 28. Come unto me, all ye that labour and are

and I will give you rest. Incomparable, sounds these—if ever such were heard in groaning world! What gentleness, what is there in the very style of the invitation to Me? and in the words, 'All ye that toil burdened,' the universal wretchedness depicted, on both its sides—the active and the passive of it. 29. Take my yoke upon you—the objection to Jesus—and learn of me; for I am lowly in heart; and ye shall find rest unto your Christ's willingness to empty Himself to meet of His Father's requirements was the ineffable repose to His own spirit, so in the end does He invite all to follow Him, with ease of the same experience. 30. For my yoke, and my burden is light. Matchless even amongst the paradoxically couched a which our Lord delights! That rest of soul experiences, when once safe under the yoke, makes all yokes easy, all burdens light.

CHAPTER XII.

PLUCKING CORN-EARS ON THE SABBATH (Mark, 2, 23-28; Luke, 6, 1-5.) The season of when this occurred is determined by the fact. Ripe corn-ears are only found in the before harvest. The barley harvest seemed ended here, at the close of our March and of our April. It coincided with the Passover, as the wheat harvest with Pentecost. (2, 1) we have a still more definite note we could be certain of the meaning of the term which he employs to express it. "It is as (he says) on the sabbath, which was the first—for that is the proper rendering of the word—the second sabbath after the first resurrection. Of the various conjectures what mean, that of SCALIGER is the most adopted, as we think, the freest from difficulty, that sabbath after the second day of the week, the first of the seven sabbaths which reckoned from the second day of the Passover itself a sabbath, until the next feast, of Pentecost (Leviticus, 23, 15, 16; Deuteronomy, 16, 10). In this case, the day meant by the text is the first of those seven sabbaths intervene Passover and Pentecost. And if we regard the "feast" mentioned in John, 6, 1, and consequently the second during public ministry (see on that passage), this of the ears of corn must have occurred only after the scene and the Discourse recorded in John, 6, which, doubtless, would induce to hasten His departure for the north, to the wrath of the Pharisees, which He had in Jerusalem. Here, accordingly, we find Jesus went on the sabbath day through the corn fields" (Mark, 2, 23; Luke, 6, 1). They were as hungry—not as one may be regular meals; but evidently from shortness; for Jesus defends their plucking and eating them on the plea of necessity. "pluck the ears of corn, and to eat—"rubbing their hands" (Luke, 6, 1). 2. But when they saw it, they said unto him, Behold, thy disciples do that is not lawful to do upon the sabbath day. It was expressly permitted (Deuteronomy, 10, 6) as being "servile work," which was prohibited sabbath day, it was regarded as sinful to do unto them. Have ye not read—or as Mark 2, 26 ye never read?—what David did (1 Samuel, 21, 6) he was an hungry, and they that were with him. How he entered into the house of God, and showed bread, which was not lawful for him to do for them which were with him, but only for the priests? No example could be more apposite than this. The man after God's own heart, of whom the Jews ever boasted, when suffering in God's cause and straitened for provisions, asked and obtained from the high priest what, according to the law, it was illegal for any one save the priests to touch. Mark (2, 26) says this occurred "in the days of Abiathar the high priest." But this means not during his high priesthood—for it was under that of his father Ahimelech—but simply, in his time. Ahimelech was soon succeeded by Abiathar, whose connection with David, and prominence during his reign, may account for his name, rather than his father's, being here introduced. Yet there is not a little confusion in what is said of these priests in different parts of the Old Testament. Thus he is called both the son and the father of Ahimelech (1 Samuel, 22, 20; 2 Samuel, 8, 17); and Ahimelech is called Ahiah (1 Samuel, 14, 9), and Ahimelech (1 Chronicles, 18, 16). 5. Or have ye not read in the Law, how that on the sabbath days the priests in the temple profane the sabbath—by doing "servile work,"—and are blameless? The double offerings required on the sabbath day (Numbers, 28, 9) could not be presented, and the new-baked showbread (Leviticus, 24, 5; 1 Chronicles, 9, 32) could not be prepared and presented every sabbath morning, without a good deal of servile work on the part of the priests; not to speak of circumcision, which, when the child's eighth day happened to fall on a sabbath, had to be performed by the priests on that day. (See on John, 7, 22, 23.) 6. But I say unto you, That in this place is one greater than the temple—or rather, according to the reading which is best supported, 'something greater.' The argument stands thus: 'The ordinary rules for the observance of the sabbath give way before the requirements of the temple; but there are rights here before which the temple itself must give way.' Thus indirectly, but not the less decidedly, does our Lord put in His own claims to consideration in this question—claims to be presently put in even more nakedly. 7. But if ye had known what [this] meant, I will have mercy, and not sacrifice (Hosea, 6, 6; Micah, 6, 6-8, &c.). See on ch. 9, 13. ye would not have condemned the guiltless:—q.d. 'Had ye understood the great principle of all religion, which the Scripture everywhere recognises—that ceremonial observances must give way before moral duties, and particularly the necessities of nature—ye would have refrained from these captious complaints against men who in this matter are blameless.' But our Lord added a specific application of this great principle to the law of the sabbath, preserved only in Mark: "And he said unto them, the sabbath was made for man, and not man for the sabbath" (Mark, 2, 27). A glorious and far-reaching maxim, alike for the permanent establishment of the sabbath and the true freedom of its observance. 8. For the Son of man is Lord [even] of the sabbath day. In what sense now is the Son of man Lord of the sabbath day? Not surely to abolish it—that surely were a strange lordship, especially just after saying that it was made or instituted for MAN—but to own it, to interpret it, to preside over it, and to ennoble it, by merging it in "the Lord's Day" (Revelation, 1, 10), breathing into it an air of liberty and love necessarily unknown before, and thus making it the nearest resemblance to the eternal sabbatism.

9-21. THE HEALING OF A WITHERED HAND ON THE SABBATH DAY, AND RETIREMENT OF JESUS TO AVOID DANGER. (=Mark, 3, 1-12; Luke, 6, 6-11.) Healing of a Withered Hand (v. 9-14). 9. And when he was departed thence—but "on another sabbath" (Luke, 6, 6), he went into their synagogue—and taught." He had now, no doubt, arrived in Galilee; but this, it would appear, did not occur at Capernaum, for after it was over He "withdrew Himself," it is said, "to the sea" (Mark, 3. 7), whereas Capernaum was at the sea. 10. And, behold, there was a man which had his hand withered—disabled by paralysis (as 1 Kings, 13. 4). It was his right hand, as Luke graphically notes. And they asked him, saying, Is it lawful to heal on the sabbath days? that they might accuse him. Matthew and Luke say they "watched Him whether He would heal on the sabbath day." They were now come the length of dogging His steps, to collect materials for a charge of impiety against Him. It is probable that it was to their thoughts rather than their words that Jesus addressed Himself in what follows. 11. And he said unto them, What man shall there be among you that shall have one sheep, and if it fall into a pit on the sabbath day, will he not lay hold on it, and lift it out? 12. How much then is a man better than a sheep? Restless appeal! "A righteous man regardeth the life of his beast" (Proverbs, 12. 10), and would instinctively rescue it from death or suffering on the sabbath day; how much more his nobler fellow-man. But the reasoning, as given in the other two Gospels, is singularly striking: "But He knew their thoughts, and said to the man which had the withered hand, Rise up, and stand forth in the midst. And he arose and stood forth. Then said Jesus unto them, I will ask you one thing; Is it lawful on the sabbath days to do good, or to do evil? to save life or to destroy it?" (Luke, 6. 8, 9) or as in Mark (3. 4) "to kill?" He thus shuts them up to this startling alternative: 'Not to do good, when it is in the power of our hand to do it, is to do evil; not to save life, when we can, is to kill'—and must the letter of the sabbath-rest be kept at this expense? This unexpected thrust shut their mouths. By this great ethical principle our Lord, we see, held Himself bound, as Man. But here we must turn to Mark, whose graphic details make the second Gospel so exceedingly precious. "When He had looked round about on them with anger, being grieved for the hardness of their hearts, He saith unto the man" (Mark, 3. 5). This is one of the very few passages in the Gospel History which reveal our Lord's feelings. How holy this anger was, appears from the "grief" which mingled with it at "the hardness of their hearts." 13. Then saith he to the man, Stretch forth thine hand. And he stretched it forth—the power to obey going forth with the word of command, and it was restored whole, like as the other. The poor man, having faith in this wonderful Healer—which no doubt the whole scene would singularly help to strengthen—disregarded the proud and venomous Pharisees, and thus gloriously put them to shame. 14. Then the Pharisees went out, and held a council against him, how they might destroy him. This is the first explicit mention of their murderous designs against our Lord. Luke (6. 11) says "they were filled with madness, and communed one with another what they might do to Jesus." But their doubt was not, whether to get rid of Him, but how to compass it. Mark (3. 6), as usual, is more definite: "The Pharisees went forth, and straightway took counsel with the Herodians against Him, how they might destroy Him." These Herodians were supporters of Herod's dynasty, created by Caesar—a political rather than religious party. The Pharisees regarded them as untrue to their religion and country. But here we see them combining together against Christ, as a common enemy. So on a subsequent occasion, ch. 22. 15, 16.

Jesus Retreats to Avoid Danger (v. 15-21). 15. But when Jesus knew it, he withdrew himself from thence—whither, our Evangelist says not; but Mark (3. 7) says "it was to the sea"—to some distance, no doubt, from the scene of the miracle, the madness, and the plotting just recorded, and great multitudes followed him, and he healed them all. Mark gives the following interesting details: "A great multitude from Galilee followed Him, and from Judea, and from Jerusalem, and from Idumea, and from beyond Jordan, and they about Tyre and Sidon, a great multitude when they had heard what great things he did, came unto Him. And he spake to His disciples, that small ship"—or "wherry"—"should wait on Him because of the multitude, lest they should throng Him. For He had healed many; inasmuch that they press upon Him for to touch Him, as many as had plagues and unclean spirits, when they saw Him, fell down before Him, and cried, saying, Thou art the Son of God. And He straightly charged them that they should not make Him known" (Mark, 3. 7-12). How glorious this extorted homage to the Son of God! But as it was not the time, so neither were they the fittest preachers, as BENGEL says. (See on Mark, 1. 28, as cf. James, 2. 19.) Healing back now to our Evangelist after saying "He healed them all," he continues, "And charged them—the healed—that they should not make Him known. (See on ch. 8. 4.) 17. That it might be fulfilled which was spoken by Esaias the prophet, as lying (Isaias, 42. 1), 18. Behold my servant, whom I have chosen; my beloved, in whom my soul is well pleased: will put my Spirit upon him, and he shall show judgment to the Gentiles. 19. He shall not strive, nor cry; neither shall any man hear his voice in the streets. 20. A bruised reed shall he not break, and smoking flax shall he not quench, till he send forth judgment unto victory—"untruth," says the Hebrew original, and the LXX. also. But our Evangelist merely seizes the spirit, instead of the letter of the prediction in this point. The grandeur and completeness of Messiah's victory would prove, it seems, not more wonderful than the unobtrusive noiselessness with which they were to be achieved. And whereas one rough touch will break a bruised reed, and quench the flickering, smoking flax, His it should be, with matchless tenderness, love, and skill, to lift up the meek, to strengthen the weak hands and confirm the feeble knees, to comfort all that mourn, to say to them that are of a fearful heart, Be strong, fear not. 21. And in his name shall the Gentiles trust. Part of His present audience were Gentiles—from Tyre and Sidon—first-fruits of the great Gentile harvest, contemplated in the prophecy 22-27. A BLIND AND DUMB DEMONIAC HEALS AND REPLY TO THE MALIGNANT EXPLANATION UPON IT. (=Mark, 3. 20-30; Luke, 11. 14-23.) The precise time of this Section is uncertain. Judging from the statements with which Mark introduces it, we should conclude that it was when our Lord's popularity was approaching its zenith, and so, before the feeding of the five thousand. But, on the other hand, the advanced state of the charges brought against our Lord, and the plainness of His warnings and denunciations in reply, seem to favour the latter period at which Luke introduces it. "And the multitude," says Mark (3. 20, 21), "cometh together again referring back to the immense gathering which Mark had before recorded (ch. 2. 2)—"so that they could not so much as eat bread. And when His friends—or rather, 'relatives,' as appears from v. 31, and as on ch. 12. 46—"heard of it, they went out to lay hands on Him; for they said, He is beside Himself." (1 Cor. 14. 23) "For whether we be beside ourselves, it is to God." 22. Then was brought unto him one possessed with a devil—or 'a demonized person'—blind and dumb; and he healed him, inasmuch that the blind and the dumb both spake and saw. 23. And all the people were amazed, and said, Is not this the son of David? The form of the interrogative requires this to be rendered, 'Is this the Son of David?' And as questions put in this form (in Greek) suppose doubt, an expect rather a negative answer, the meaning is, 'Can it possibly be?—the people thus indicating the

10. 2;—the price of the devils. Two things placed—first, that the bitterest enemies of were unable to deny the reality of His aid next, that they believed in an organized system of evil, under one chief. This belief of small consequence, had not our Lord al to it; but His immediately does. the unsophisticated testimony of "all the key had no way of holding out against His s by the desperate shift of ascribing His s Satan. 28. And Jesus knew their thoughts them" (Mark, 3. 23), and said unto them, *How divided against itself is brought to desecrity or house—i.e., household—divided self shall not stand: 26. And if Satan cast out is divided against himself; how shall then his stand! The argument here is irresistible: dead society can stand—whether kingdom, household—when turned against itself; such war is suicidal: But the works I do are de- of Satan's kingdom; That I should be in h Satan, therefore, is incredible and absurd.' I by Beelzebub cast out devils, by whom do men—your sons; meaning here, the 'dis- pupils of the Pharisees, who were so termed similar language of the Old Testament in of the sons of the prophets. (1 Kings, 20. 35; 1. &c. Our Lord here seems to admit works were wrought by them; in which Pharisees stood self-condemned, as ex- Luke 11. 19, "Therefore shall they be m." 28. But if I cast out devils by the Spirit a Luke 11. 20) it is, "with (or 'by') the God." This latter expression is just a way of representing the power of God, while r tells us the living Personal Agent made the Lord Jesus in every exercise of that m—"no doubt" (Luke, 11. 20)—the kingdom s was you—rather 'upon you,' as the sion is rendered in Luke:—q.d., 'If this of Satan is, and can be, by no other than of God, then is his Destroyer already in of his, is already rising on its ruins,' 29. Or an enter into a—or rather, 'the'—strong* though very unusual reading, 'in danger of eternal guilt'—a guilt which he will underlie for ever. Mark has the important addition v. 30, "Because they said, He hath an unclean spirit." See on ch. 10. 25.) What, then, is this sin against the Holy Ghost—the unpardonable sin? One thing is clear: Its unpardonableness cannot arise from anything in the nature of the sin itself; for that would be a naked contradiction to the emphatic declaration of a 31st, that all manner of sin is pardonable. And what is this but the fundamental truth of the Gospel? (See Acts, 13. 38, 39; Romans, 3. 22, 24; 1 John, 1. 7; &c.) Then, again, when it is said (v. 32., that to speak against or blaspheme the Son of man is pardonable, but the blasphemy against the Holy Ghost is not pardonable, it is not to be conceived that this arises from any greater sanctity in the one blessed Person than the other. These remarks so narrow the question, that the true sense of our Lord's words seem to disclose themselves at once. It is a contrast between slandering "the Son of man" in His veiled condition and unfinished work—which might be done "ignorantly, in unbelief" (1 Timothy, 1. 13), and slandering the same blessed Person after the blaze of glory which the Holy Ghost was soon to throw around His claims, and in the full knowledge of all that. This would be to slander Him with eyes open, or to do it "presumptuously." To blaspheme Christ in the former condition—when even the apostles stumbled at many things—left them still open to conviction on fuller light; but to blaspheme Him in the latter condition would be to hate the light the clearer it became, and resolutely to shut it out; which, of course, precludes salvation. (See on Hebrews, 10. 26-29.) The Pharisees had not as yet done this; but in charging Jesus with being in league with hell they were displaying beforehand a malignant determination to shut their eyes to all evidence, and so, bordering upon, and in spirit committing the unpardonable sin. 33. Either make the tree good, &c. 34. O generation of vipers (see on ch. 3. 7). how can ye, being evil, speak good things! for out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh—a principle obvious enough, yet of deepest significance and vast application. In Luke, 6. 45 we find it uttered as part of the Discourse delivered after the ment. They might say, 'It was nothing; we meant no evil; we merely threw out a supposition, as one way of accounting for the miracle we witnessed: if it will not stand, let it go; why make so much of it, and bear down with such severity for it?' Jesus replies, 'It was not nothing, and at the great day will not be treated as nothing: Words, as the index of the heart, however idle they may seem, will be taken account of, whether good or bad, in estimating character in the day of judgment.'

35-40. A SIGN DEMANDED, AND THE REPLY—HIS MOTHER AND BROTHERS SEEK TO SPEAK WITH HIM, AND THE ANSWER. (=Luke, 11, 16, 24-36; Mark, 3, 31-36; Luke, 8, 19-21.) A Sign demanded, and the Reply (v. 38-45). The occasion of this Section was manifestly the same with that of the preceding. 35. Then certain of the scribes and of the Pharisees answered, saying, Master—'Teacher,' equivalent to 'Rabbi'—we would see a sign from thee—"a sign from heaven" (Luke, 11, 16); something of an immediate and decisive nature, to show, not that his miracles were real—that they seemed willing to concede—but that they were not from above, not from beneath. These were not the same class with those who charged Him with being in league with Satan (as we see from Luke, 11, 15, 16; but as the spirit of both was similar, the tone of severe rebuke is continued. 39. But he answered and said unto them—"when the people were gathered thick together" (Luke, 11, 29), an evil and adulterous generation. This latter expression is best explained by Jeremiah, 3, 20, "Surely as a wife treacherously departeth from her husband, so have ye dealt treacherously with me, O house of Israel, saith the Lord." For this was the relationship in which He stood to the covenant people—"I am married unto you" (Jeremiah, 3, 14), seeketh after a sign. In the eye of Jesus this class were but the spokesmen of their generation, the exponents of the reigning spirit of unbelief, and there shall no sign be given to it, but the sign of the prophet Jonas: 40. For as Jonas—"a sign unto the Ninevites, so shall also the Son of man be to this generation" (Luke, 11, 30). For as Jonas was three days and three nights in the whale's belly (Jonah, 1, 17), so shall the Son of man be three days and three nights in the heart of the earth. This was the second public announcement of His resurrection three days after His death. (For the first, see John, 2, 19.) Jonah's case was analogous to this, as being a signal judgment of God; reversed in three days; and followed by a glorious mission to the Gentiles. The expression "in the heart of the earth," suggested by the expression of Jonah with respect to the sea (2, 3, in LXX.), means simply the grave, but this considered as the most emphatic expression of real and total entombment. The period during which He was to lie in the grave is here expressed in round numbers, according to the Jewish way of speaking, which was to regard any part of a day, however small, included within a period of days, as a full day. (See 1 Samuel, 30, 12, 13; Esther, 4, 16; & 1; ch. 27, 63, 64; &c.) 41. The men of Nineve shall rise in judgment with this generation, &c. The Ninevites, though heathens, repented at a man's preaching; while they, God's covenant people, repented not at the preaching of the Son of God—whose supreme dignity is rather implied here than expressed. 42. The queen of the south shall rise up in the judgment with this generation, &c. The queen of Sheba—a tract in Arabia, near the shores of the Red Sea—came from a remote country, "south" of Judea, to hear the wisdom of a mere man, though a gifted one, and was transported with wonder at what she saw and heard (1 Kings, 10, 1-9). They, when a Greater than Solomon had come to them, despised and rejected, slighted and slandered Him. 43-45. When the unclean spirit is gone out of a man, &c. On this important parable, in connection with the corresponding one—v. 29—see on Luke, 11, 21-23. A charming little incident, given only in Luke, 11, 27, 28, seems to have its proper place here. "And it came to pass, as He spake these things, a certain woman of the company"—'out of the crowd'—'lifted up her voice and said unto Him, Blessed is the womb that bare thee, and the paps which Thou hast sucked.' With true womanly feeling, she envies the mother of such a wonderful Teacher. And a higher and better than she had said as much before her (see on Luke, 1, 28). 43. How does our Lord, then, treat it? He is far from condemning it. He only holds up as "blessed rather" another class; "But he said, Yea rather, blessed are they that hear the word of God, and keep it"—in other words, the humblest real saint of God. How utterly alien is this sentiment from the teaching of the Church of Rome, which would doubtless excommunicate any one of its members that dared to talk in such a strain!

His Mother and Brethren Seek to Speak with Him, and the Answer (v. 46-50). 46. While he yet talked to the people, behold, his mother and his brethren (see on ch. 13, 55, 56) stood without, desiring to speak with him—"and could not come at Him for the press" (Luke, 8, 19). For what purpose these came, we learn from Mark, 3, 20, 21. In His zeal and ardour He seemed indifferent both to food and repose, and "they went to lay hold of Him" as one "beside himself." Mark says graphically, "And the multitude sat about Him"—or 'around Him.' 47. Then one said unto him, Behold, thy mother and thy brethren stand without, desiring to speak with thee, &c. Absorbed in the awful warnings He was pouring forth, He felt this to be an unseasonable interruption, fitted to dissipate the impression made upon the large audience—such an interruption as duty to the nearest relatives did not require Him to give way to. But instead of a subtle rebuke, He seizes on the incident to convey a sublime lesson, expressed in a style of inimitable condescension. 49. And he stretched forth his hand toward his disciples. How graphic is this! It is the language evidently of an eye-witness, and said, Behold my mother and my brethren! 50. For whosoever shall do the will of my Father which is in heaven, the same is my brother, and sister, and mother;—&c. There stand here the members of a family transcending and surviving this of earth: Filial subjection to the will of my Father in heaven is the indissoluble bond of union between Me and all its members; and whosoever enters this hallowed circle becomes to Me brother, and sister, and mother!

CHAPTER XIII.

Ver. 1-52. JESUS TEACHES BY PARABLES. (=Mark, 4, 1-34; Luke, 8, 4-18; 13, 18-20.) Introduction (v. 1-34). 1. The same day went Jesus out of the house, and sat by the sea-side. 2. And great multitudes were gathered together unto him, so that he went into a ship—the article in the received text wants authority—and sat; and the whole multitude stood on the shore. How graphic this picture—no doubt from the pen of an eye-witness, himself impressed with the scene! It was "the same day" on which the foregoing solemn discourse was delivered, when His kindred thought Him "beside Himself" for His indifference to food and repose—that same day, retiring to the sea-shore of Galilee, and there seating Himself, perhaps for coolness and rest, the crowds again flock around Him, and He is fain to push off from them, in the boat usually kept in readiness for Him; yet only to begin, without waiting to rest, a new course of teaching by parables to the eager multitudes that lined the shore. To the parables of our Lord there is nothing in all language to be compared, for simplicity, grace, fulness, and variety of spiritual teaching. They are adapted to stages of advancement, being understood according to the measure of his spirit. 3. And he spake many things unto them, etc. These parables are SEVEN in number, the first FOUR of them to the mixed multitude, while the FIVE were spoken to the Twelve in divisions, two and three, being three in the symbolical arithmetic of Scripture; the remarkable in the structure of which, that while the first of the Seven—two—is of the nature of an Introduction, the remaining Six consist of three and four, the Third and Fourth, and Sixth, corresponding to each other, setting forth the same general truths, but in diversity of aspect. All this can be seen.

10. THE SOWER (v. 3-9, 13-23). This is entitled, THE EFFECT OF THE WORD ON THE STATE OF THE HEART. For a full of this parable, see on Mark, 4. 1-9.

Teaching in Parables (v. 10-17). 10. And he said unto him—"they that were sent by me were alone" (Mark, 4, 10)—Why were they alone? Though before he had coached some things in the parabolic or vivid illustration, it would appear for the first time, formally employed of teaching. 11. He answered and said unto him, "it is given unto you to know the kingdom of heaven. The word 'mystery' is not used in its classical sense—'secret,' nor yet of 'things incomprehensible of their own nature difficult to be understood,' usually, 'things darkly announced and economy, and during all that period of time, but fully published under the prophets, 2. 6-10; Ephesians, 3. 3-6, 8, 9). 'the kingdom of heaven,' then, 'the Kingdom' to those who know and understand in never so small a degree, in a slight light; but to those who are insensible things yielding only, as so many temporary entertainments. 12. For whosoever heeth, as a thing which he values, to him, and he shall have more abundance—rewarded by an increase of what he so values; whosoever hath not—who lets this go as a thing on which he sets no value—'it is taken away even that he hath—or as 13. 19, "what he seemeth to have," or hath." This is a principle of immense value, like other weighty sayings, appears uttered by our Lord on more than one in different connections. (See on ch. 13. 12). This is a principle of immense value, under the general law of habit; in which moral principles become stronger by their exercise, or the exercise of their contraries, and at length expire. The principle remains in the intellectual world, and is confirmed—if not in the vegetable also—as physiology sufficiently prove. Here, howsoever as a divine ordination, as a judicial continual operation under the divine law. 13. Therefore speak I to them in parables—which our Lord, be it observed, did not begin to do till His miracles were malignantly ascribed to Satan, because they seeing, see not. They "saw," for the light shone on them as never light shone before; but they "saw not," for they closed their eyes, and hearing, they hear not; neither do they understand. They "heard," for He taught them who "spoke as never man spake;" but they "heard not," for they took nothing in, apprehending not the soul-penetrating, life-giving words addressed to them. In Mark and Luke, what is here expressed as a human fact is represented as the fulfilment of a divine purpose—"that seeing they may see, and not perceive," &c. The explanation of this lies in the statement of the foregoing verse—that, by a fixed law of the divine administration, the duty men voluntarily refuse to do, and in point of fact do not do, they at length become morally incapable of doing. 14. And in them is fulfilled—rather, 'is fulfilling,' or is receiving its fulfilment—the prophecy of Isaiah, which saith (Isaiah, 6. 9, 10—here quoted according to the LXX.). By hearing ye shall hear, and shall not understand, &c. They were thus judiciously sealed up under the darkness and obduracy which they deliberately preferred to the light and healing which Jesus brought nigh to them. 16. But blessed are your eyes, for they see; and your ears, for they hear;—g. d. 'Happy ye, whose eyes and ears, voluntarily and gladly opened, are drinking in the light divine.' 17. For verily I say unto you, That many prophets and righteous men have desired—rather, 'coveted,' to see those things which ye see, and have not seen them; and to hear those things which ye hear, and have not heard them. Not only were the disciples blessed above the blinded just spoken of, but favoured above the most honoured and the best that lived under the old economy, who had but glimpses of the things of the new kingdom, just sufficient to kindle in them desires not to be fulfilled to any in their day. In Luke, 10. 23, 24, where the same saying is repeated on the return of the Seventy—the words, instead of "many prophets and righteous men," are "many prophets and kings;" for several of the Old Testament saints were kings.

Second and Seventh Parables, or First Pair: THE WHEAT AND THE TARES, AND THE GOOD AND BAD FISH (v. 24-30; 36-43; and 47-50). The subject of both these Parables—which teach the same truth, with a slight diversity of aspect—is

THE MIXED CHARACTER OF THE KINGDOM IN ITS PRESENT STATE, AND THE FINAL ABSOLUTE SEPARATION OF THE TWO CLASSES.

The Tares and the Wheat (v. 24-30, 36-43). 24. Another parable put he forth unto them, saying, The kingdom of heaven is likened unto a man which sowed good seed in his field. Happily for us, these exquisite parables are, with like charming simplicity and clearness, expounded to us by the Great Preacher Himself. Accordingly, we pass to v. 36-38. Then Jesus sent the multitude away, and went into the house; and his disciples came unto him, saying, Declare unto us the parable of the tares of the field, &c. In the parable of the Sower, "the seed is the word of God" (Luke, 8. 11). But here that word has been received into the heart, and has converted him that received it into a new creature, a "child of the kingdom," according to that saying of James (1. 18), "Of His own will begat He us with the word of truth, that we should be a kind of first-fruits of His creatures." It is worthy of notice that this vast field of the world is here said to be Christ's own—"His field," says the parable. (See Psalm 2. 8.) 25. But while men slept, his enemy came and sowed tares among the wheat, and went his way. 38. The tares are the children of the wicked one. As this sowing could only be "while men slept," no blame seems intended, and certainly none is charged upon "the servants;"

It is probably just the dress of the parable. 30. The enemy that sowed them is the devil—emphatically “His enemy” (v. 26). See Genesis, 3, 15; 1 John, 3, 8. By “tares” is meant, not what in our husbandry is so called, but some noxious plant, probably darne. “The tares are the children of the wicked one;” and by their being sown “among the wheat” is meant their being deposited within the territory of the visible Church. As they resemble the children of the kingdom, so they are produced, it seems, by a similar process of “sowing”—the seeds of evil being scattered and lodging in the soil of those hearts upon which falls the seed of the word. The enemy, after sowing his “tares,” “went his way”—his dark work soon done, but taking time to develop its true character. 28. But when the blade was sprung up, and brought forth fruit, then appeared the tares also—the growth in both cases running parallel, as antagonistic principles are seen to do. 27. So the servants of the householder came—i.e., Christ’s ministers—and said unto him, Sir, didst not thou sow good seed in thy field? from whence then hath it tares? This well expresses the surprise, disappointment, and anxiety of Christ’s faithful servants and people, at the discovery of “false brethren” among the members of the Church. 28. He said unto them, An enemy hath done this. Kind words these from a good Husbandman, honourably clearing His faithful servants of the wrong done to His field. The servants said unto him, Wilt thou then that we go and gather them up? Cf. with this the question of James and John (Luke, 9, 64), “Lord, wilt thou that we command fire to come down from heaven and consume” those Samaritans? In this kind of zeal there is usually a large mixture of carnal heat. (See James, 1, 20.) 29. But he said, Nay.—It will be done in due time, but not now, nor is it your business; lest, while ye gather up the tares, ye root up also the wheat with them. Nothing could more clearly or forcibly teach the difficulty of distinguishing the two classes, and the high probability that in the attempt to do so these will be confounded. 30, 39. Let both grow together—i.e., in the visible Church—until the harvest—till the one have ripened for full salvation, the other for destruction. The harvest is the end of the world—the period of Christ’s second coming, and of the judicial separation of the righteous and the wicked. Till then, no attempt is to be made to effect such separation. But to stretch this so far as to justify allowing openly scandalous persons to remain in the communion of the Church, is to wrest the teaching of this parable to other than its proper design, and go in the teeth of apostolic injunctions (1 Corinthians, 5), and in the time of harvest I will say to the reapers. And the reapers are the angels. But whose angels are they? “The Son of man shall send forth His angels” (v. 41). Cf. 1 Peter, 3, 22.—“Who is gone into heaven, and is on the right hand of God; angels and authorities and powers being made subject unto Him.” Gather ye together first the tares, and bind them in bundles to burn them—“in the fire” (v. 40)—but gather the wheat into my barn. Christ, as the Judge, will separate the two classes (as in ch. 25, 32). It will be observed that the tares are burned before the wheat is housed; in the exposition of the parable (v. 41, 43) the same order is observed; and the same in ch. 25, 48—as if, in some literal sense, “with thine eyes shalt thou behold and see the reward of the wicked” (Psalm 91, 8). 41. The Son of man shall send forth his angels, and they shall gather out of his kingdom—to which they never really belonged. They usurped their place and name and outward privileges; but “the ungodly shall not stand in the judgment, nor sinners [abide] in the congregation of the righteous” (Psalm 1, 5), all things that offend—all those who have proved a stumbling-block to others, and them which do iniquity. The former class, as the worst, are mentioned first. 42. And shall cast them into a furnace—rather, ‘the furnace’ of fire: there shall be wailing and gnashing of teeth. What terrific strength of language—the “casting” or “flinging” expressive of indignation, abhorrence, contempt (cf. Psalm 9, 17; Daniel, 12, 2); “the furnace of fire” denoting the fierceness of the torment; the “wailing” signifying the anguish this causes; while the “gnashing of teeth” is a graphic way of expressing the despair in which its remedilessness issues (see on ch. 8, 12)! 43. Then shall the righteous shine forth as the sun in the kingdom of their Father—as if they had been under a cloud during their present association with ungodly pretenders to their character, and claimants of their privileges, and obstructors of their course. Who hath ears to hear, let him hear. (See on Mark, 4, 9.)

The Good and Bad Fish (v. 47-50). The object of this brief parable is the same with that of the Tares and Wheat. But as its details are fewer, so its teaching is less rich and varied. 47. Again, the kingdom of heaven is like unto a net, that was cast into the sea, and gathered of every kind. The word here rendered “net” signifies, a large drag-net, which draws everything after it, suffering nothing to escape, as distinguished from a casting-net, Mark, 1, 16, 15. The far-reaching efficacy of the Gospel is thus denoted. This Gospel net “gathered of every kind,” meaning every variety of character. 48. Which, when it was full, they drew to shore—for the separation will not be made till the number of the elect is accomplished—and sat down—expressing the deliberateness with which the judicial separation will at length be made—and gathered the good into vessels, but cast the bad away—lit., ‘the rotten,’ but here meaning, ‘the foul’ or ‘worthless’ fish: corresponding to the “tares” of the other parable. 49. So shall it be at the end of the world, &c. See on v. 42. We have said that each of these two parables holds forth the same truth under a slight diversity of aspect. What is that diversity? First, the bad, in the former parable, are represented as vile seed sown amongst the wheat by the enemy of souls; in the latter, as foul fish drawn forth out of the great sea of human beings by the Gospel net itself. Both are important truths—that the Gospel draws within its pale, and into the communion of the visible Church, multitudes who are Christians only in name; and that the injury thus done to the Church on earth is to be traced to the wicked one. But further, while the former parable gives chief prominence to the present mixture of good and bad, in the latter, the prominence is given to the future separation of the two classes.

Third and Fourth Parables, or Second Pair: THE MUSTARD SEED AND THE LEAVEN (v. 31-33). The subject of both these parables, as of the first pair, is the same, but under a slight diversity of aspect, namely,

THE GROWTH OF THE KINGDOM, FROM THE SMALLEST BEGINNINGS TO ULTIMATE UNIVERSALITY.

The Mustard Seed (v. 31, 32). 31. Another parable put he forth unto them, saying, The kingdom of heaven is like to a grain of mustard seed, which a man took, and sowed in his field: 32. Which indeed is the least of all seeds—not absolutely, but popularly and proverbially, as in Luke, 17, 6, “If ye had faith as a grain of mustard seed,” i.e., “never so little faith” but when it is grown, it is the greatest among herbs—not absolutely, but in relation to the small size of the seed, and in warm latitudes proverbially great, and becometh a tree, so that the birds of the air come and lodge in the branches thereof. This is added, no doubt, to express the amplitude of the tree. But as this seed has a hot, fiery vigour, gives out its best virtues when bruised, and is grahbed in the taste of birds, which are accordingly situated to its branches both for shelter and food, is in studying the parable, asks TRENCH, to suppose that, besides the wonderful growth of His kingdom, our Lord selected this seed to illustrate further the dotter, repute, and blessedness it is destined to afford to the nations of the world?

The Leaven (v. 33). 33. Another parable spake he unto them: The kingdom of heaven is like unto leaven, which a woman hid and hid in three measures of meal, till the whole was leavened. This parable, while it teaches the same general truth as the foregoing one, holds forth, perhaps, rather the inspired growth of the kingdom, while "the Mustard Seed" seems to point chiefly to the outward. It being a woman's work to knead, it seems a reference to say that "the woman" here represents the Church, as the instrument of depositing the leaven. Nor does it yield much satisfaction to understand the "three measures of meal" of that fruitful divison of our nature into "spirit, soul, and body," alluded to in 1 Thessalonians, 5. 23, or of the fruitful partition of the world among the three sons of Noah (Genesis, 10. 22), as some do. It yields more real satisfaction to see in this brief parable just the assimilating and assimilating quality of the Gospel, by virtue of which it will yet mould all institutions and tribes of men, and exhibit over the whole earth one "Kingdom of our Lord and of His Christ."

34. 34. These things spake Jesus unto the multitude in parables; and without a parable spake he not unto them;—on this occasion; refraining not only from all mixed discourse, but even from all interpretation of these parables to the mixed multitude. 35. That it might be fulfilled which was spoken by the prophet, saying (Psalms 78. 2 nearly as in LXX.), I will open my mouth in parables, &c. Though the Psalm seems to contain only a summary of Israelitish history, the Psalmist himself calls it "a parable," and "dark sayings born of old"—as containing, underneath the history, truths for all time, not fully brought to light till the Gospel-day.

Fifth and Sixth Parables, or Third Pair: THE HIDDEN TREASURE and THE PEARL OF GREAT PRICE (v. 44-46). The subject of this last Pair, as of the two former, is the same, but also under a slight diversity of aspect, namely,

THE PRICELESS VALUE OF THE BLESSINGS OF THE KINGDOM. And while the one parable represents the Kingdom as found without seeking, the other holds forth the Kingdom as sought and found.

The Hidden Treasure (v. 44). 44. Again, the kingdom of heaven is like unto treasure hid in a field—no uncommon thing in unsettled and half-civilized countries, even now as well as in ancient times, when there was no other way of securing it from the rapacity of robbers or marauders. (Jeremiah, 41. 8; Job, 3. 21; Proverbs, 2. 4) the which when a man hath found—i. e., unexpectedly found—he hideth, and for joy thereof—i. e., in perceiving what a treasure he had lighted on—i. e., seeing the worth of all he possessed, goeth and selleth all that he hath, and buyeth that field—in which case, by Jeremiah, the treasure would become his own.

The Pearl of Great Price (v. 45, 46). 45. Again, the kingdom of heaven is like unto a merchantman, seeking goodly pearls: 46. Who, when he had found one pearl of great price, went and sold all that he had, and bought it. The one pearl of great price, instead of being found by accident, as in the former case, is found by one whose business it is to seek for such, and who finds it just in the way of searching for such treasures. But in both cases the surpassing value of the treasure is alike recognized, and in both all is parted with for it. 47. Jesus saith unto them—i. e., to the Twelve. He had spoken the first four in the hearing of the mixed multitude; the last three He reserved till, on the dismissal of the mixed audience, He and the Twelve were alone (v. 36, &c.). Have ye understood all these things? They say unto him, Yea, Lord. 52. Then said he unto them, Therefore—or as we should say, Well, then, every scribe—or Christian teacher: here so called from that well-known class among the Jews. (See ch. 23. 34.) which is instructed unto the kingdom of heaven—himself taught in the mysteries of the Gospel which he has to teach to others, is like unto a man that is an householder which bringeth forth—'turneth' or 'dealeth out'—out of his treasure—his store of divine truth, things new and old—old truths in ever new forms, aspects, applications, and with ever new illustrations.

53-58. HOW JESUS WAS REGARDED BY HIS RELATIVES. (=Mark, 6. 1-6; Luke, 4. 16-30.) 53. And it came to pass, that, when Jesus had finished these parables, he departed thence. 54. And when he was come into his own country—i. e., Nazareth; as is plain from Mark, 6. 1. See on John, 4. 43, where also the same phrase occurs. This, according to the majority of Harmonists, was the second of two visits which our Lord paid to Nazareth during His public ministry; but in our view it was His first and only visit to it. See on ch. 4. 13; and for the reasons, see on Luke, 4. 16-30. Whence hath this man this wisdom, and these mighty works?—'these miracles.' These surely are not like the questions of people who had asked precisely the same questions before, who from astonishment had proceeded to rage, and in their rage had hurried Him out of the synagogue, and away to the brow of the hill whereon their city was built, to thrust Him down headlong, and who had been foiled even in that object by His passing through the midst of them, and going His way. But see on Luke, 4. 16, &c. 55. Is not this the carpenter's son? In Mark (6. 3) the question is, "Is not this the carpenter?" In all likelihood, our Lord, during His stay under the roof of His earthly parents, wrought along with His legal father. Is not his mother called Mary?—Do we not know all about His parentage? Has He not grown up in the midst of us? Are not all His relatives our own townfolk? Whence, then, such wisdom and such miracles? These particulars of our Lord's human history constitute the most valuable testimony, first, to His true and real humanity—for they prove that during all His first thirty years His townsmen had discovered nothing about Him different from other men; secondly, to the divine character of His mission—for these Nazarenes proclaim both the unparalleled character of His teaching and the reality and glory of His miracles, as transcending human ability; and, thirdly, to His wonderful humility and self-denial—in that when He was such as they now saw Him to be, He yet never gave any indications of it for thirty years, because "His hour was not yet come" and his brethren James, and Joseph, and Simon, and Judas? 56. And his sisters, are they not all with us? Whence then hath this [man] all these things? An exceedingly difficult question here arises—What were these "brethren" and "sisters" to Jesus? Were they, First, His full brothers and sisters? or, Secondly, Were they his step-brothers and step-sisters, children of Joseph by a former marriage? or, Thirdly, Were they His cousins, according to a common way of speaking among the Jews respecting persons of collateral descent? On this subject an immense deal has been written; nor are opinions yet by any means agreed. For the second opinion there is no ground but a vague tradition, arising probably from the wish for some such explanation. The first opinion undoubtedly suits the text best in all the places where the parties are certainly referred to (ch. 12. 46; and its parallels, Mark, 3. 31, and Luke, 8. 19; our present passage, and its parallel, Mark, 6. 3; John, 2. 12; 7. 3, 4, 10; Acts, 1. 14). But, in addition to other objections, many of the best interpreters, thinking it in the last degree improbable that our Lord, when hanging on the cross, would have committed His mother to John if He had had full brothers of His own then alive, prefer the third opinion; although, on the other hand, it is not to be doubted that our Lord might have good reasons for entrusting the guardianship of His doubly widowed mother to the beloved disciple in preference even to full brothers of His own. Thus dubiously we prefer to leave this vexed question, encompassed as it is with difficulties. As to the names here mentioned, the first of them, "JAMES," is afterwards called "the Lord's brother" (see on Galatians, 1. 19), but is perhaps not to be confounded with "James the son of Alphaeus," one of the Twelve, though many think their identity beyond dispute. This question also is one of considerable difficulty, and not without importance; since the James who occupies so prominent a place in the Church of Jerusalem, in the latter part of the Acts, was apparently the apostle, but is by many regarded as "the Lord's brother," while others think their identity best suits all the statements. The second of those here named, "JOSEPH" (or Joseph), who must not be confounded with "Joseph called Barsabas, who was surnamed Justus" (Acts, 1. 23); and the third here named, "SIMON," is not to be confounded with Simon the Kananite or Zealot (see on ch. 10. 4). These three are nowhere else mentioned in the New Testament. The fourth and last-named, "JUDAS," can hardly be identical with the apostle of that name—though the brothers of both were of the name of "James"—nor (unless the two be identical, was this Judas, with the author of the catholic Epistle so called. 68. And he did not many mighty works there, because of their unbelief—"save that He laid His hands on a few sick folk, and healed them" (Mark, 6. 6. See on Luke, 4. 16-30.

CHAPTER XIV.

Ver. 1-12. HEROD THINKS JESUS A RESURRECTION OF THE MURDERED BAPTIST—ACCOUNT OF HIS IMPRISONMENT AND DEATH. (=Mark, 6. 14-29; Luke, 9. 7-9.) The time of this alarm of Herod Antipas appears to have been during the mission of the Twelve, and shortly after the Baptist—who had lain in prison for probably more than a year—had been cruelly put to death.

Herod's Theory of the Works of Christ (v. 1, 2). 1. At that time Herod the tetrarch—Herod Antipas, one of the three sons of Herod the Great, and own brother of Archelaus (ch. 2. 22), who ruled as Ethnarch over Galilee and Perea, heard of the fame of Jesus—"for His name was spread abroad" (Mark, 6. 14). 2. And said unto his servants—his counsellors or court-ministers. This is John the Baptist: he is risen from the dead, &c. The murdered prophet haunted his guilty breast like a spectre, and seemed to him alive again and clothed with unearthly powers in the person of Jesus.

CHAPTER XV.

Ver. 1-30. DISCOURSE ON CEREMONIAL POLLUTION. (=Mark, 7. 1-23.) The time of this Section was after that Passover which was nigh at hand when our Lord fed the five thousand (John, 6. 4)—the third Passover, as we take it, since His public ministry began, but which He did not keep at Jerusalem for the reason mentioned in John, 7. 1. 1. Then came to Jesus scribes and Pharisees, which were of—or 'from' Jerusalem. Mark says they "came from" it; a deputation probably sent from the capital expressly to watch Him. As He had not come to them at the last Passover, which they had reckoned on, they now come to Him. "And," says Mark, "when they saw some of His disciples eat bread with defiled, that is to say, with unwashed hands"—hands not ceremonially cleansed by washing—"they found fault. For the Pharisees, and all the Jews, except they wash their hands oft"—id., 'in' or 'with the fist,' i.e., probably, washing the one hand by the use of the other—though some understand it, with our version, in the sense of 'diligently,' 'sedulously'—"eat not, holding the tradition of the elders;" acting religiously according to the custom handed down to them. "And when they come from the market"—"And after market," after any common business, or attending a court of justice, where the Jews, as WEBSTER & WILKINSON remark, after their subjection to the Romans, were especially exposed to intercourse and contact with heathens—"except they wash, they eat not. And many other things there be, which they have received to hold, as the washing of cups and pots, brazen vessels and tables"—rather, 'couches,' such as were used at meals, which probably were merely sprinkled for ceremonial purposes. "Then the Pharisees and scribes asked Him," saying, 2. Why do thy disciples transgress the tradition of the elders! for they wash not their hands when they eat bread. 3. But he answered and said unto them, Why do ye also transgress the commandment of God by your tradition! The charge is retorted with startling power: The tradition they transgress is but man's, and is itself the occasion of heavy transgression, undermining the authority of God's law. 4. For God commanded, saying (Exodus, 20. 12; &c.), Honour thy father and mother; and (Exodus, 21. 17; &c.), He that curseth father or mother, let him die the death. 5. But ye say, Whosoever shall say to his father or his mother, It is a gift—or simply, 'A gift' in Mark it is, 'Corban'! i.e., "An oblation!" meaning, any unbloody offering or gift dedicated to sacred uses, by whatever thou mightest be profited by me; 6. And honour not his father or his mother, he shall be free.—q.d., "It is true, father—mother—that by giving to thee this, which I now present, thou mightest be profited by me; but I have gifted it to pious uses, and therefore, at whatever cost to thee, I am not now at liberty to alienate any portion of it." "And," it is added in Mark, "ye suffer him no more to do ought for his father or his mother." To dedicate property to God is indeed lawful and laudable, but not at the expense of filial duty. Thus have ye made the commandment of God of none effect—"cancelled" or 'nullified' it—by your tradition. 7. Ye hypocrites, well did Isaiah prophecy of you, saying (Isaiah, 29. 13), 8. This people draweth nigh unto me with their mouth, &c. By putting the commandments of men on a level with the divine requirements, their whole worship was rendered vain—a principle of deep moment in the service of God. "For," it is added in Mark, 7. 8, "laying aside the commandment of God, ye hold the tradition of men, as the washing of pots and cups; and many other such like things ye do." The drivelling nature of their multitudinous observances is here pointedly exposed, in contrast with the manly observance of "the commandment of God," and when our Lord says, "Many other such like things ye do," it is implied that He had but given a specimen of the hideous treatment which the divine law received, and the tion which, under the mask of piety, d by the ecclesiastics of that day. 10. the multitude, and said unto them. Hear and understand: 11. Not what enters into the mouth defileth a man; but what cometh out of the mouth, this defileth a man. Said even more emphatically in Mark 11 it is there added, "If any man have let him hear." As in ch. 13, & this so saying seems designed to call attention to the social and universal character of the 11. 12. Then came his disciples, and said unto them that the Pharisees were offended, of this saying? They had given vent to, and perhaps threats, not to our Lord whom they seem to have slunk away, of the disciples, who report it to their But he answered and said, Every plant, which my Father hath not planted, shall be they are offended, are they? the Old Testament sense of "folly;" i.e., criminal senselessness, the folly of the heart. How appalling is this black catalogue! 30. These are the things which defile a man; but to eat with unwashed hands defileth not a man. Thus does our Lord sum up this whole searching Discourse.

13-28. PETER'S NOBLE CONFSSION OF CHRIST, AND THE BENEDICTION PRONOUNCED UPON HIM—CHRIST'S FIRST EXPLICIT ANNOUNCEMENT OF HIS APPROACHING SUFFERINGS, DEATH, AND RESURRECTION—HIS REBUKE OF PETER AND WARNING TO ALL THE TWELVE. (=Mark, 8. 27; 9. 1; Luke, 9. 18-27.) The time of this Section—which is beyond doubt, and will presently be mentioned—is of immense importance, and throws a touching interest around the incidents which it records. Peter's Confession and the Benediction pronounced upon him (v. 13-20).

13. When Jesus came into the coasts—'the parts'; i.e., the territory or region: In Mark (8. 27) it is 'the towns' or 'villages,' of Cesarea Philippi. It lay at the foot of mount Lebanon, near the sources of the Jordan, in the territory of Dan, and at the north-east extremity of Palestine. It was originally called Panion (from a cavern in its neighbourhood dedicated to the god Pan) and Paneas, Philip, the tetrarch, the only good son of Herod the Great, in whose dominions Paneas lay, having beautified and enlarged it, changed its name to Cesarea, in honour of the Roman emperor, and added Philippi after his own name, to distinguish it from the other Cesarea (Acts, 19. 1) on the north-east coast of the Mediterranean sea. (JOSEPHUS Antiquities, 15. 10, 3; 18. 2, 1.) This quiet and distant retreat Jesus appears to have sought, with the view of talking over with the Twelve the fruit of His past labours, and breaking to them for the first time the sad intelligence of His approaching death. He asked his disciples—"by the way," says Mark (8. 27), and "as He was alone praying," says Luke (9. 18)—saying, Whom—or more grammatically, "Who" do men say that I the Son of man am! (or, 'that the Son of man is'—recent editors omitting here the me of Mark and Luke; though the evidence seems pretty nearly balanced—q.d., 'What are the views generally entertained of Me, the Son of man, after going up and down among them so long? He had now closed the first great stage of His ministry, and was just entering on the last dark one. His spirit, burdened, sought relief in retirement, not only from the multitude, but even for a season from the Twelve. He retreated into "the secret place of the Most High," pouring out His soul "in supplications and prayers, with strong crying and tears" (Hebrews, 5. 7). On rejoicing His disciples, and as they were pursuing their quiet journey, He asked them this question. 14. And they said, Some say that thou art John the Baptist—risen from the dead. So that Herod Antipas was not singular in his surmise (ch. 14. 1, 2). some, Elias—(cf. Mark, 6. 14.) and others, Jeremias. Was this theory suggested by a supposed resemblance between the "Man of Sorrows" and 'the weeping prophet' or one of the prophets—or, as Luke (9. 8) expresses it, "that one of the old prophets is risen again." In another report of the popular opinions which Mark (6. 15) gives us, it is thus expressed, "That it is a prophet, [or] as one of the prophets;"— in other words, That he was a prophetic person, resembling those of old. 15. He saith unto them, But whom—rather, “Who” say ye that I am? He had never put this question before, but the crisis He was reaching made it fitting that He should now have it from them. We may suppose this to be one of those moments of which the prophet says, in His name, “Then I said, I have laboured in vain; I have spent my strength for nought, and in vain” (Isaiah, 49. 4): Lo, these three years I come seeking fruit on this fig tree; and what is it? As the result of all, I am taken for John the Baptist, for Elias, for Jeremias, for one of the prophets. Yet some there are that have beheld My glory, the glory as of the Only begotten of the Father, and I shall hear their voice, for it is sweet. 16. And Simon Peter answered and said, Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God. He does not say, ‘Scribes and Pharisees, rulers and people, are all perplexed; and shall we, unlettered fishermen, presume to decide!’ But feeling the light of his Master’s glory shining in his soul, he breaks forth—not in a tame, prosaic acknowledgement, ‘I believe that thou art,’ &c.—but in the language of adoration—such as one uses in worship, “THOU ART THE CHRIST, THE SON OF THE LIVING GOD!” He first owns Him the promised Messiah (see on ch. I. 16); then he rises higher, echoing the voice from heaven—“This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased;” and in the important addition—“Son of the LIVING GOD,”—he recognises the essential and eternal life of God as in this His Son—though doubtless without that distinct perception afterwards vouchsafed. 17. And Jesus answered and said unto him, Blessed art thou. Though it is not to be doubted that Peter, in this noble testimony to Christ, only ex-

French, as WERTEN & WILKINSON perfect, Pierre—pierre. I will build up on the man Simon Bar-jona; but on him taught Confessor of such a faith. “says our Lord, calling the Church His nificent expression, remarks BENGEL, r self—nowhere else occurring in the Gospels, the gates of hell—‘of Hades,’ or, the unseen ing, the gates of Death: in other words, ‘perish.’ Some explain it of ‘the as powers of darkness:’ but though the glorious truth, probably the former is t 19. 1423. HEALING OF A DEMONIC BOY—SECOND EXPLICIT ANNOUNCEMENT BY OUR LORD OF HIS APPROACHING DEATH AND RESURRECTION: (Mark, 9: 14-22; Luke, 9: 37-43.) The time of this Section is sufficiently denoted by the events which all the narratives show to have immediately preceded it—the first explicit announcement of His death, and the transfiguration—both being between His third and His fourth and last Passover.

Healing of the Demonic and Lunatic Boy (v. 14-21).
For the exposition of this portion, see on Mark, 9, 14-32.

Second Announcement of His Death (v. 22, 23). 22.
And while they abode in Galilee, Jesus said unto them.
Mark, 9: 30), as usual, is very precise here: "And they departed thence"—i. e., from the scene of the last miracle—"and passed through Galilee; and He would not that any man should know it." So this was not a preaching, but a private journey through Galilee.
Indeed, His public ministry in Galilee was now all but concluded. Though He sent out the Seventy after this to preach and heal, Himself was little more in public there, and He was soon to bid it a final adieu. Till this hour arrived He was chiefly occupied with the Twelve, preparing them for the coming events. The Son of man shall be betrayed into the hands of men. . . . And they were exceeding sorry. Though the shock would not be so great as at the first announcement (ch. 16: 21, 22), their "sorrow" would not be the less, but probably the greater, the deeper the intelligence went down into their hearts, and a new wave dashing upon them by this repetition of the heavy tidings. Accordingly, Luke (9: 43, 44), connecting it with the scene of the miracle just recorded, and the teaching which arose out of it—or possibly with all His recent teaching—says our Lord forewarned the Twelve that they would soon stand in need of all that teaching: "But while they wondered every one at all things which Jesus did, He said unto His disciples, Let these sayings sink down into your ears; for the Son of Man shall be delivered." &c.: 'Be not carried off your feet by the grandeur you have lately seen in Me, but remember what I have told you, and now tell you again, that that Sun in whose beams ye now rejoice is soon to set in midnight gloom.' Remarkable that the attitude to these words of our Lord, pre-

34-37. THE TRIBUTE MONEY. The time of this Section is evidently in immediate succession to that of the preceding one. The brief but most pregnant incident which it records is given by our Evangelist alone—for whom, no doubt, it would have a peculiar interest, from its relation to his own town and his own familiar lake. 24. And when they were come to Capernaum, they that received tribute money—"the double drachma," a sum equal to two Attic drachmas, and corresponding to the Jewish "half-shekel," payable, towards the maintenance of the Temple and its services, by every male Jew of twenty years old and upwards. For the origin of this annual tax, see Exodus, 30. 13, 14; 2 Chronicles, 24. 6, 9. Thus, it will be observed, it was not a civil, but an ecclesiastical tax. The tax mentioned in the next verse was a civil one. The whole teaching of this very remarkable scene depends upon this distinction. came to Peter—at whose house Jesus probably resided while at Capernaum. This explains several things in the narrative, and said, Dost not your master pay tribute? The question seems to imply that the payment of this tax was voluntary, but expected; or what, in modern phrase, would be called a 'voluntary assessment.' 25. He saith, Yes—g. d. "To be sure He does; as eager to remove even the suspicion of the contrary. If Peter knew—as surely he did—that there was at this time no money in the bag, this reply must be regarded as a great act of faith in his Master. And when he was come into the house—Peter's, Jesus prevented him—anticipated him; according to the old sense of the word "prevent," saying, What thinkest thou, Simon?—using his family name for familiarity, of whom do the kings of the earth take custom—meaning custom on goods exported or imported—or tribute—the coin was an Attic silver coin equal to two of fore-mentioned "didrachms" of half-a-shekel's value and so, was the exact sum required for both. Accordingly, the Lord adds, that take, and give unto them for me and thee—lit. 'instead of Me and thee;' perhaps because the payment was a redemption of the person paid for (Exodus, 30, 12)—in which view Jesus' coin certainly was "free." If the house was Peter's, it will account for payment being provided on that occasion, not for all the Twelve, but only for Jesus and His Lord. Observe, our Lord does not say "for us," but "for Me and thee;" thus distinguishing the Exempted One and His non-exempted disciple.

Same Subject (v. 10-20). 10. Take heed that ye do not—'stumble'—not one of these little ones; for I say unto you, That in heaven their angels do always behold the face of my Father which is in heaven. A difficult verse—perhaps the following may be more than an illustration:—Among men, those who nurse and rear royal children, however humble in themselves, are allowed free entrance with their charge, and a degree of familiarity which even the highest state ministers dare not assume. Probably our Lord means in virtue of their charge over His disciples (Hebrews, 1. 13; John, 1. 81), the angels have errands from His throne, a welcome there, and a dear familiarity in dealing with "His Father which is in Heaven," one on earth by the tie of His assumed flesh, and to the other in heaven by the tie of His eternal Spirit—their symphonious prayers on earth would thrill upwards through Him to heaven, be carried by Him into the holiest of all, and so reach the Throne. Thus will He be the living Conductor of the prayer upward and the answer downward.

Parable of the Unmerciful Debtor (v. 21-35). 21. Then came Peter to him, and said, Lord, how oft shall my brother sin against me, and I forgive him? In the recent dispute, Peter had probably been an object of special envy, and his forwardness in continually answering for all the rest would likely be cast up to him—and it so, probably by Judas—notwithstanding his Master's commendations. And as such insinuations were perhaps made once and again, he wished to know how often and how long he was to stand it, till seven times? This being the sacred and complete number, perhaps his meaning was, Is there to be a limit at which the needful forbearance will be full? 22. Jesus saith unto him, I say not unto thee, Until seven times; but, Until seventy times seven—i. e., so long as it shall be needed and sought; you are never to come to the point of refusing forgiveness sincerely asked. (See on Luke, 17, 3, 4.) 23. Therefore—'with reference to this matter,' is the kingdom of heaven likened unto a certain king, which would take account of his servants—or, would scrutinise the accounts of his revenue-collectors. 24. And when he had begun to reckon, one was brought unto him, which owed him ten thousand talents. If Attic talents are here meant, 10,000 of them would amount to above a million and a half sterling; if Jewish talents, to a much larger sum. 25. But forasmuch as he had not to pay, his lord commanded him to be sold, and his wife and children, and all that he had, and payment to be made. (See 2 Kings, 4, 1; Nehemiah, 5, 8; Leviticus, 25, 39.) 26. The servant therefore fell down, and worshipped him—or did humble obeisance to him, saying, Lord, have patience with me, and I will pay thee all. This was just an acknowledgment of the justice of the claim made against him, and a piteous imploration of mercy. 27. Then the lord of that servant was moved with compassion, and loosed him, and forgave him the debt. Payment being hopeless, the Master is, first, moved with compassion; next, liberates his debtor from prison; and then cancels the debt freely. 28. But the same servant went out, and found one of his fellow-servants. Mark the difference here. The first case is that of master and servant; in this case, both are on a footing of equality. (See v. 33, below.) which owed him an hundred pence. If Jewish money is intended, this debt was to the other less than one to a million, and he laid hands on him, and took him by the throat—he seized and throttled him,' saying, Pay me that thou owest. Mark the mercilessness even of the tone. 29. And his fellow-servant fell down at his feet, and besought him, saying, Have patience with me, and I will pay thee all. The same attitude, and the same words which drew compassion from his master are here employed towards himself by his fellow-servant. 30. And he would not; but went and cast him into prison, till he should pay the debt, &c. Jesus here vividly conveys the intolerable injustice and impudence which even the servants saw in this act, on the part of one so recently laid under the heaviest obligations to their common master. 31, 32. Then his lord, after that he had called him, said unto him, O thou wicked servant, &c. Before bringing down his vengeance upon him, he calmly points out to him how shamefully unreasonable and heartless his conduct was; which would give the punishment inflicted on him a double sting. 34. And his lord was wroth, and delivered him to the tormentors—more than masters; denoting the severity of the treatment which he thought such a case demand. till he should pay all that was due unto him. 35. So likewise—in this spirit, or on this principle, shall my heavenly Father do also unto you, if ye from your hearts forgive not every one his brother their trespasses.

CHAPTER XIX.

Ver. 1-12. FINAL DEPARTURE FROM GALILEE—DIVORCE. (=Mark, 10. 1-12; Luke, 9. 61.)

Forewell to Galilee. 1. And it came to pass, that when Jesus had finished these sayings, he departed from Galilee. This marks a very solemn period in our Lord's public ministry. So slightly is it touched here, and in the corresponding passage of Mark (10. 1), that few readers probably note it as the Redeemer's Forewell to Galilee, which however it was. See on the sublime statement of Luke (9. 51), which relates to the same transition-stage in the progress of our Lord's work, and came into the coasts—or 'boundaries'—of Judea beyond Jordan—i.e., to the further, or east side of the Jordan, into Perea, the dominions of Herod Antipas. But though one might conclude from our Evangelist that our Lord went straight from the one region to the other, we know from the other Gospels that a considerable time elapsed between the departure from the one and the arrival at the other, during which many of the most important events in our Lord's public life occurred—probably a large part of what is recorded in Luke, 9. 51, onwards to ch. 18. 15, and part of John, 7. 2-11. 54. 2. And great multitudes followed him; and he healed them there. Mark says further (10. 1), that "as He was wont, He taught them there." What we now have on the subject of Divorce is some of that teaching.

Divorce (v. 3-12). 3. Is it lawful for a man to put away his wife for every cause? Two rival schools (as we saw on ch. 6. 31) were divided on this question—a delicate one, as DE WETTE pertinently remarks, in the dominions of Herod Antipas. 4. And he answered and said unto them, Have ye not read, that he which made them at the beginning made them male and female—or better, perhaps, 'He that made them made them from the beginning a male and a female.' 5. And said, For this cause—to follow out this divine appointment, shall a man leave father and mother, and shall cleave to his wife; and they twain shall be one flesh? &c. Jesus here sends them back to the original constitution of man as one pair, a male and a female; to their marriage, as such, by divine appointment; and to the purpose of God, expressed by the sacred historian, that in all time one man and one woman should by marriage become one flesh—so to continue as long as both are in the flesh. This being God's constitution, let not man break it up by causeless divorces. 7. They say unto him, Why did Moses then command to give a writing of divorcement, and to put her away? 8. He saith unto them, Moses—as a civil lawgiver, because of—or 'having respect to' the hardness of your hearts—looking to your low moral state, and your inability to endure the strictness of the original law, suffered you to put away your wives—tolerated a relaxation of the strictness of the marriage bond—not as approving of it, but to prevent still greater evils. but from the beginning it was not so. This is repeated, in order to impress upon His audience the temporary and purely civil character of this Mosaic relaxation. 9. And I say unto you, Whosoever shall put away his wife, except &c. See on ch. 5. 32. 10. His disciples say unto him, If the case of the man be so with his wife, it is not good to marry:—q.d., 'In this view of marriage, surely it must prove a snare rather than a blessing, and had better be avoided altogether.' 11. But he said unto them, All men cannot receive this saying, save they to whom it is given:—q.d., 'That the unmarried state is better, is a saying not for every one, and indeed only for such as it is divinely intended for.' But who are these? they would naturally ask; and this our Lord proceeds to tell them in three particulars. 12. For there are some eunuchs, which were so born from their mother's womb—persons constitutionally either incapable of or indisposed to marriage; and there are some eunuchs, which were made eunuchs of men—persons rendered incapable by others; and there be eunuchs, which have made themselves eunuchs for the kingdom of heaven's sake—persons who, to do God's work better, deliberately choose this state. Such was Paul (1 Corinthians, 7. 7). He that is able to receive it, let him receive it—'He who feels this to be his proper vocation, let him embrace it;' which, of course, is as much as to say—'he only.' Thus, all is left free in this matter.

CHAPTER XX.

Ver. 1-16. PARABLE OF THE LABOURERS IN THE VINEYARD. This parable, recorded only by Matthew, is closely connected with the end of ch. 18, being spoken with reference to Peter's question, How it should fare with those who, like himself, had left all for Christ? It is designed to show that while they would be richly rewarded, a certain equity would still be observed towards late converts and workmen in His service. 1. For the kingdom of heaven is like unto a man that is an householder, &c. The figure of a Vineyard, to represent the rearing of souls for heaven, the culture required and provided for that purpose, and the care and pains which God takes in that whole matter, is familiar to every reader of the Bible. (Psalm 80. 5-16; Isaiah, 5. 1-7; Jeremiah, 2. 21; Luke, 20. 9-16; John, 15. 1-8.) At vintage-time, as WENSTER & WILKINSON remark, labour was scarce, and masters were obliged to be early in the market to secure it. Perhaps the pressing nature of the work of the Gospel, and the comparative paucity of labourers, may be incidentally suggested, ch. 8. 37, 38. The 'labourers,' as in ch. 9. 38, are first, the official servants of the Church, but after them and along with them all the servants of Christ, whom he has laid under the weightiest obligation to work in His service. 2. And when he had agreed with the labourers for a penny—a usual day's hire (the amount of which will be found in the margin of our Bible), he sent them into his vineyard. 3. And he went out about the third hour—about nine o'clock, or after a fourth of the working day had expired: the day of twelve hours was reckoned from six to six, and saw others standing idle—'unemployed'—in the market-place. 4. And said unto them, Go ye also into the vineyard; and whatsoever is right—'just,' 'equitable,' in proportion to their time—I will give you. And they went their way. 5. Again he went out about the sixth and ninth hour—about noon, and about three o'clock afternoon—and did likewise—hiring and sending into his vineyard fresh labourers each time. 6. And about the eleventh hour—but one hour before the close of the working day: a most unusual hour both for offering and engaging—and found others standing idle, and saith, Why stand ye here all the day idle? Of course they had not been there, or not been disposed to offer themselves at the proper time; but as they were now willing, and the day was not over, and "yet there was room," they also are engaged, and on similar terms with all the rest. 8. So when even was come—i.e., the reckoning time between masters and labourers (see Deuteronomy, 24. 15): pointing to the day of final account—the lord of the vineyard saith unto his steward—answering to Christ Himself, represented "as a Son use" (Hebrews, 3, 6; see ch. 11, 27).

Call the labourers, and give them the servants of Christ. 11. And

AND THE REPLY—THE PARABLES OF THE TWO SONS, AND OF THE WICKED HUSBANDMEN. (=Mark, 11, 27-12, 12; Luke, 20, 1-19.) Now commences, as AL-FORD remarks, that series of parables and discourses of our Lord with His enemies, in which He develops, more completely than ever before, His hostility to their hypocrisy and iniquity; and so they are stirred up to compass His death.

The Authority of Jesus Questioned, and the Reply (v. 23-27). 23. By what authority doest thou these things!
—referring particularly to the expulsion of the buyers and sellers from the temple. And who gave thee this authority? 24. And Jesus answered and said unto them, I also will ask you one thing . . . 25. The baptism of John —meaning, his whole mission and ministry, of which baptism was the proper character, whence was it? from heaven, or of men? What wisdom there was in this way of meeting their question, will best appear by their reply. If we shall say, From heaven; he will say unto us, Why did ye not then believe him?—Why did ye not believe the testimony which he bore to Me, as the promised and expected Messiah? for that was the burden of his whole testimony. 26. But if we shall say, Of men; we fear the people—rather the multitude. In Luke (20, 6) it is, "all the people will stone us"—'stone us to death,' for all hold John as a prophet. Crooked, cringing hypocrites! No wonder Jesus gave you no answer. 27. And they answered Jesus, and said, We cannot tell. Evidently their difficulty was, how to answer, so as neither to shake their determination to reject the claims of Christ nor damage their reputation with the people. For the truth itself they cared nothing whatever. Neither tell I you by what authority I do these things. What composure and dignity of wisdom does our Lord here display, as He turns their question upon themselves, and, while revealing His knowledge of their hypocrisy, closes their mouths! Taking advantage of the surprise, silence, and awe, produced by this reply, our Lord followed it immediately up by the two following parables.

Parable of the Two Sons (v. 28-32). 28. But what think ye? A certain man had two sons; and he came to the first and said, Son, go work to-day in my vineyard—for true religion is a practical thing, a "bringing forth fruit unto God." 29. He answered and said, I will not.
TRENCH notices the rudeness of this answer, and the total absence of any attempt to excuse such disobedience, both characteristic; representing careless, reckless sinners, resisting God to His face. 30. And he came to the second, and said likewise. And he answered and said, I (go), sir—'I, sir.' The emphatic "I," here, denotes the self-righteous complacency which says, "God, I thank thee that I am not as other men" (Luke, 18, 11), and went not. He did not "afterward repent" and refuse to go; for there was here no intention to go. It is the class that "say and do not" (ch. 23, 3)—a falsehood more abominable to God, says STRIER, than any "I will not." 31. Whether of them twain did the will of his Father? They say unto him, The first. Now comes the application. Jesus saith unto them, Verily I say unto you, That the publicans and the harlots go—or 'are going'; even now entering, while ye hold back, into the kingdom of God before you. The publicans and the harlots were the first son, who, when told to work in the Lord's vineyard, said, I will not; but afterwards repented and went.

Their early life was a flat and flagrant refusal to do what they were commanded; it was one continued rebellion against the authority of God. "The chief priests and the elders of the people," with whom our Lord was now speaking, were the second son, who said, I go, Sir, but went not. They were early called, and all their life long professed obedience to God, but never rendered it; their life was one of continued disobedience. 32. For John came unto you in the way of righteousness—i. e., 'calling you to repentance,' as Noah is styled 'a preacher of righteousness'; 2 Peter, 2. 5, when like the Baptist he warned the old world to "flee from the wrath to come," and ye believed him not—"They did not reject him;" nay, they "were willing for a season to rejoice in his light" (John, 5. 36); but they would not receive his testimony to Jesus, but the publicans and the harlots believed him. Of the publicans this is twice expressly recorded, Luke, 3. 12; 7. 29. Of the harlots, then, the same may be taken for granted, though the fact is not expressly recorded. These outcasts gladly believed the testimony of John to the coming Saviour, and so hastened to Jesus when He came. See Luke, 7. 37; 16. 1, &c. and ye, when ye had seen it, repented not afterward, that ye might believe him. Instead of being "provoked to jealousy" by their example, ye have seen them flocking to the Saviour and getting to heaven, unmoved.

Parable of the Wicked Husbandmen (v. 33-46). 33. Hear another parable: There was a certain householder, which planted a vineyard. See on Luke, 13. 6. and hedged it round about, and digged a winepress in it, and built a tower. These details are taken, as is the basis of the parable itself, from that beautiful parable of Isaiah, 6. 1-7, in order to fix down the application and sustain it by Old Testament authority, and let it out to husbandmen. These are just the ordinary spiritual guides of the people, under whose care and culture the fruits of righteousness are expected to spring up, and went into a far country—"for a long time" (Luke, 20. 9; leaving the vineyard to the laws of the spiritual husbandry during the whole time of the Jewish economy. On this phraseology, see on Mark, 4. 21. 34. And when the time of the fruit drew near, he sent his servants to the husbandmen. By these "servants" are meant the prophets and other extraordinary messengers, raised up from time to time. See on ch. 23. 37. that they might receive the fruits of it. See again on Luke, 13. 6. 35. And the husbandmen took his servants, and beat one—see Jeremiah, 37. 16; 38. 6. and killed another—see Jeremiah, 21. 20-23. and stoned another—see 2 Chronicles, 24. 21. Compare with this whole verse ch. 23. 37, where our Lord reiterates these charges in the most melting strain. 36. Again, he sent other servants more than the first; and they did unto them likewise—see 2 Kings 17. 13; 2 Chronicles, 34. 16, 18; Nehemiah, 9. 21. 37. But last of all he sent unto them his son, saying, They will reverence my son. In Mark (12. 6) this is most touchingly expressed: "Having yet therefore one son, His well-beloved, He sent Him also last unto them, saying, They will reverence my son." Luke's version of it too (20. 13) is striking: "Then said the lord of the vineyard, What shall I do? I will send my beloved son: it may be they will reverence Him when they see Him." Who does not see that our Lord here severs Himself, by the sharpest line of demarcation, from all merely human messengers, and claims for Himself Sonship in its loftiest sense? (Cf. Hebrews, 3. 3-4.) The expression, "It may be they will reverence my son," is designed to teach the almost unimaginable guilt of not reverentially welcoming God's Son. 38. But when the husbandmen saw the son, they said among themselves—cf. Genesis, 37. 18-20; John, 11. 47-53. This is the heir. Sublime expression this of the great truth, that God's inheritance was destined for, and in due time is to come into the possession of, His own Son in our nature (Hebrews, 1. 2). come, let us kill him, and let us seize on his inheritance—that so, from mere servants, we may become lords. This is the deep aim of the depraved heart; this is emphatically "the root of all evil." 39. And they caught him, and cast him out of the vineyard—cf. Hebrews, 12. 11-13 ("without the gate—without the camp"); 1 Kings, 21. 13; John, 10. 17, and slew him. 40. When the lord therefore of the vineyard cometh, This represents 'the settling time,' which, in the case of the Jewish ecclesiastics, was that judicial trial of the nation and its leaders which issued in the destruction of their whole state. what will he do unto these husbandmen? 41. They say unto him, He will miserably destroy these wicked men—an emphatic alliteration not easily conveyed in English: 'He will badly destroy those bad men,' or 'miserably destroy those miserable men,' is something like it, and will let out his vineyard unto other husbandmen, which shall render him the fruits in their seasons. If this answer was given by the Pharisees, to whom our Lord addressed the parable, they thus unwittingly pronounced their own condemnation; as did David to Nathan the prophet (2 Samuel, 12. 5-7), and Simon the Pharisee to our Lord (Luke, 7. 43, &c.). But if it was given, as the two other Evangelists agree in representing it, by our Lord Himself, and the explicitness of the answer would seem to favour that supposition, then we can better explain the exclamation of the Pharisees which followed it, in Luke's report—"And when they heard it, they said, God forbid!"—His whole meaning now bursting upon them. 42. Jesus saith unto them, Did ye never read in the Scriptures (Psalm 118. 22, 23). The stone which the builders rejected, &c. A bright Messianic prophecy, which reappears in various forms (Isaiah, 28. 16, &c.), and was made glorious use of by Peter before the Sanhedrim (Acts, 4. 11). He recurs to it in his first epistle (1 Peter, 2. 4-6). 43. Therefore say I unto you, The Kingdom of God—God's visible Kingdom, or Church, upon earth, which up to this time stood in the seed of Abraham, shall be taken from you, and given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof—i. e., the great Evangelical community of the faithful, which, after the extinction of the Jewish nation, would consist chiefly of Gentiles, until "all Israel should be saved" (Romans, 11. 25, 26). This vastly important statement is given by Matthew only. 44. And whosoever shall fall on this stone shall be broken; but on whomsoever it shall fall, it will grind him to powder. The Kingdom of God is here a Temple, in the erection of which a certain stone, rejected as unsuitable by the spiritual builders, is, by the great Lord of the House, made the key-stone of the whole. On that Stone the builders were now "falling" and being "broken" (Isaiah, 4. 15). They were sustaining great spiritual hurt; but soon that Stone should "fall upon them" and "grind them to powder" (Daniel, 2. 34, 35; Zechariah, 12. 3)—in their corporate capacity, in the tremendous destruction of Jerusalem, but personally, as unbelievers, in a more awful sense still. 45. And when the chief priests and Pharisees had heard his parables—referring to that of the Two Sons and this one of the Wicked Husbandmen, they perceived that he spake of them. 46. But when they sought to lay hands on him—which Luke (20. 19) says they did "the same hour," hardly able to restrain their rage, they feared the multitude—rather 'the multitudes'—because they took him for a prophet—just as they feared to say John's baptism was of men, because the masses took him for a prophet (v. 26). Miserable creatures! So, for this time, "they left Him and went their way" (Luke, 12. 12).

 vants went out into the highways, and gathered together all as many as they found, both bad and good—i.e., without making any distinction between open sinners and the morally correct. The Gospel call fetched in Jews, Samaritans, and outlying heathen alike.
 Thus far the parable answers to that of 'the Great Supper,' Luke, 14, 15, &c. But the distinguishing feature of our parable is what follows: 11. And when the king came in to see the guests. Solemn expression this, of that conscientious inspection of every professed disciple of the Lord Jesus from age to age, in virtue of which his true character will hereafter be judicially proclaimed! he saw there a man. This shows that it is the judgment of individuals which is intended in this latter part of the parable: the first part represents rather national judgment, which had not on a wedding garment. The language here is drawn from the following remarkable passage in Zephaniah, 1, 7, 8:—"Hold thy peace at the presence of the Lord God; for the day of the Lord is at hand; for the Lord hath prepared a sacrifice, He hath hid His guests.
 And it shall come to pass in the day of the Lord's sacrifice, that I will punish the princes, and the king's children, and all such as are clothed with strange apparel." The custom in the East of presenting festival garments (see Genesis, 45, 22; 3 Kings, 6, 22), even though not clearly proved, is certainly presupposed here. It undoubtedly means something which they bring not of their own—for how could they have any such dress who were gathered in from the highways indiscriminately?—but which they receive as their appropriate dress. And what can that be but what is meant by "putting on the Lord Jesus," as "THE LORD OUR RESURRECTION?" (See Psalm 45, 13, 14.) Nor could such language be strange to those in whose ears had so long resounded those words of prophetic joy: "I will greatly rejoice in the Lord, my soul shall be joyful in my God; for He hath clothed me with the garments of salvation, He hath covered me with the robe of righteousness, as a bridegroom decketh himself with ornaments, and as a bride adorneth herself with her jewels" (Isaiah, 61, 10). 12. Friend, how canst thou be hither not having a wedding garment? And how speechless—being self-condemned

that region and condition, shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth. See on ch. 13. 42. 14. For many are called, but few are chosen. So ch. 19. 30. See on ch. 20. 16.

CHAPTER XXIII.

Ver. 1-39. DENUNCIATION OF THE SCRIBES AND PHARISEES—LAMENTATION OVER JERUSALEM, AND FAREWELL TO THE TEMPLE. (=Mark, 12. 38-40; Luke, 20. 45-47.) For this long and terrible discourse we are indebted, with the exception of a few verses in Mark and Luke, to Matthew alone. But as it is only an extended repetition of denunciations uttered not long before at the table of a Pharisee, and recorded by Luke (11. 37-54), we may take both together in the exposition.

Denunciation of the Scribes and Pharisees (v. 1-39). The first twelve verses were addressed more immediately to the disciples, the rest to the scribes and Pharisees. 1. Then speaks Jesus to the multitude—to the multitudes, and to his disciples. 2. Saying, The scribes and the Pharisees sit. The Jewish teachers stood to read, but sat to expound the Scriptures, as will be seen by comparing Luke, 4. 16 with v. 20. in Moses' seat—i.e., as interpreters of the law given by Moses. 3. All therefore—i.e., all which, as sitting in that seat and teaching out of that law, they bid you observe, that observe and do. The word "therefore" is thus, it will be seen, of great importance, as limiting those injunctions which He would have them obey to what they fetched from the law itself. In requiring implicit obedience to such injunctions, He would have them to recognise the authority with which they taught over and above the obligation of the law itself—an important principle truly; but He who denounced the traditions of such teachers (ch. 15. 3) cannot have meant here to throw His shield over these. It is remarked by WEBSTER & WILKINSON that the warning to beware of the scribes is given by Mark and Luke without any qualification: the charge to respect and obey them being reported by Matthew alone, indicating for whom this Gospel was especially written, and the writer's desire to conciliate the Jews. 4. For they bind heavy burdens and grievous to be borne, and lay them on men's shoulders; but they themselves will not move them—"touch them not" (Luke, 11. 46); with one of their fingers—referring not so much to the irksomeness of the legal rites, though they were irksome enough (Acts, 15. 10), as to the heartless rigour with which they were enforced, and by men of shameless inconsistency. 5. But all their works they do for to be seen of men. Whatever good they do, or seal they show, has but one motive—human applause. They make broad their phylacteries—strips of parchment with Scripture-texts on them, worn on the forehead, arm, and side, in time of prayer, and enlarge the borders of their garments—fringes of their upper garments (Numbers, 15. 37-40). 6. And love the uppermost rooms. The word "room" is now obsolete in the sense here intended. It should be 'the uppermost place,' i.e., the place of highest honour. at feasts, and the chief seats in the synagogues. See on Luke, 14. 7, 8. 7. And greetings in the markets, and to be called of men, Rabbi, Rabbi. It is the spirit rather than the letter of this that must be pressed; though the violation of the letter, springing from spiritual pride, has done incalculable evil in the Church of Christ. The reiteration of the word "Rabbi" shows how it tickled the ear and fed the spiritual pride of those ecclesiastics.

8. But be not ye called Rabbi: for one is your Master—your Guide, your Teacher.' 9. And call no man your father upon the earth: for one is your Father, which is in heaven, &c. To construe these injunctions into a condemnation of every title by which church rulers may be distinguished from the flock which they rule, is virtually to condemn that rule itself; and accordingly the same persons do both—but against the whole strain of the New Testament and sound Christian judgment. But when we have guarded ourselves against these extremes, let us see to it that we retain the full spirit of this warning against that itch for ecclesiastical superiority which has been the bane and the scandal of Christ's ministers in every age. (On the use of the word "Christ" here, see on ch. 1. 1.) 11. But he that is greatest among you shall be your servant. This plainly means, 'shall show that he is so by becoming your servant;' as in ch. 20. 27, compared with Mark, 10. 44. 12. And whosoever shall exalt himself shall be abased. See on Luke, 14. 14. What follows was addressed more immediately to the scribes and Pharisees. 13. But woe unto you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites!—for ye shut up the kingdom of heaven against men. Here they are charged with shutting heaven against men: in Luke, 11. 52, they are charged with what was worse, taking away the key—"the key of knowledge"—which means, not the key to open knowledge, but knowledge as the only key to open heaven. A right knowledge of God's revealed word is eternal life, as our Lord says (John, 17. 3, and 5. 39); but thus they took away from the people, substituting for it their wretched traditions. 14. Woe unto you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! for ye devour widows' houses, &c. Taking advantage of the helpless condition and confiding character of "widows," they contrived to obtain possession of their property, while by their "long prayers" they made them believe they were raised far above "filthy lucre." So much "the greater damnation" awaits them. What a life-like description of the Romish clergy, the true successors of those scribes! 15. Woe unto you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! for ye compass sea and land to make one proselyte—from heathenism. We have evidence of this in JOSEPHUS, and when he is made, ye make him two-fold more the child of hell than yourselves—condemned, for the hypocrisy he would learn to practice, both by the religion he left and that he embraced. 16. Woe unto you, ye blind guides. Striking expression this of the ruinous effects of erroneous teaching. Our Lord, here and in some following verses, condemns the subtle distinctions they made as to the sanctity of oaths, distinctions invented only to promote their own avaricious purposes. which say, Whosoever shall swear by the temple, it is nothing—he has incurred no debt, but whosoever shall swear by the gold of the temple—meaning not the gold that adorned the temple itself, but the Corban, set apart for sacred uses (see on ch. 15. 5), he is a debtor!—i.e., it is no longer his own, even though the necessities of a parent might require it. We know who the successors of these men are, but whosoever sweareth by the gift that is upon it, he is guilty. It should have been rendered, "he is a debtor," as in v. 18. 19. Ye fools, and blind! for whether is greater, the gift, or the altar that sanctifieth the gift? (See Exodus, 29. 37.) 20-22. Whoso therefore shall swear by the altar, &c. See on ch. 5. 33-37. 23. Woe unto you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! for ye pay tithes of mint and anise—rather, 'dill,' as in margin, and cummin. In Luke (11. 42) it is 'and rue, and all manner of herbs.' They grounded this practice on Leviticus, 27. 30, which they interpreted rigidly. Our Lord purposely names the most trifling products of the earth, as examples of what they punctiliously exacted the tenth of, and have omitted the weightier matters of the law, judgment, mercy, and faith. In Luke ra. "Ye ought not to leave them undone." and guides, which strain at a gnat. The proper sense in the older English translations, and their own as it came from the translators' identically is, 'strain out.' It was the custom, such, of the stricter Jews to strain their beer, and other potables through linen or cloth; unawares they should drink down some lean insect therein, and thus transgress. 11. 30, 23, 41, 42.—just as the Buddhists do in Ylon and Hindostan—and to this custom of Lord here refers, and swallow a camel—the animal the Jews knew, as the "gnat" was not: both were by the law unclean. 25. without extortion. In Luke (11. 39) the same is rendered "ravening," i. e., 'rapacity.' 26. Pharisee, cleanse first that which is within the platter, that the outside of them may be clean. Luke (11. 40) it is, "Ye fools, did not he that which is without make that which is within?"—He to whom belongs the outer life, but demands its subjection to Himself, is the less His! A remarkable example this of power of drawing the most striking illustrations from the most familiar objects in life. To these words, recorded by adds the following, involving a principle of value: "But rather give alms of such things, and behold, all things are clean unto you" 41. As the greed of these hypocrites was most prominent features of their character 14, our Lord bids them exemplify the opposite, and then their outside, ruled by this, beautiful in the eye of God, and their meals eaten with clean hands, though never so the business of this worky world. (See ch. 9. 7.) 37. Woe unto you, scribes and Pharisees! for ye are like whited (or 'whitewashed' sepulchres (cf. Acts, 23. 3. The process of being the sepulchres, as LIGHTFOOT says, is to be done on a certain day every year, not for cleansing, but, as the following words are to imply, to beautify them. which indeed is outward, but are within full of dead men's filth of all uncleanness. What a powerful way intimate that the only difference between their condemnation now and then was, that now they were ripe for their doom, which they were not then. 34. Wherefore, behold, I send unto you prophets, and wise men, and scribes. The I here is emphatic: 'I am sending.' etc., 'am about to send.' In Luke, 11. 49, the variation is remarkable: "Therefore also, said the wisdom of God, I will send them," &c. What precisely is meant by "the wisdom of God" here, is somewhat difficult to determine. To us it appears to be simply an announcement of a purpose of the Divine Wisdom, in the high style of ancient prophecy, to send a last set of messengers whom the people would reject, and rejecting, would fill up the cup of their iniquity. But, whereas in Luke it is 'I, the Wisdom of God, will send them,' in Matthew it is 'I, Jesus, am sending them,' language only befitting the one Sender of all the prophets, the Lord God of Israel now in the flesh. They are evidently Evangelical messengers, but called by the familiar Jewish names of "prophets, wise men, and scribes," whose counterparts were the inspired and gifted servants of the Lord Jesus; for in Luke (11. 49) it is "prophets and apostles," unto the blood of Zacharias son of Barachias, whom ye slew between the temple and the altar. As there is no record of any fresh murder answering to this description, probably the allusion is not to any recent murder, but to 2 Chronicles, 24. 20-22, as the last recorded and most suitable case for illustration. And as Zacharias' last words were, "The Lord require it," so they are here warned that of that generation it should be required. 36. Verily I say unto you, All these things shall come upon this generation. As it was only in the last generation of them that "the iniquity of the Amorites was full" (Genesis, 15. 16), and then the abominations of ages were at once completely and awfully avenged, so the iniquity of Israel was allowed to accumulate from age to age till in that generation it came to the full, and the whole collected vengeance of Heaven broke at once over its devoted head. In the first French Revolution the same awful principle was exemplified, and Christendom has not done with it yet.

Lamentation over Jerusalem, and Farewell to the Temple (v. 37-39). 37. O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, thou that whither the tribes went up, to give thanks unto the name of the Lord;" and at this moment it was full of them. It is the whole family of God, then, which is here apostrophized, by a name dear to every Jew, recalling to him all that was distinctive and precious in his religion. The intense feeling that sought vent in this utterance comes out first in the redoubling of the opening word—"Jerusalem, Jerusalem!" but, next, in the picture of it which He draws—"that killest the prophets, and stonest them which are sent unto thee!"—not content with spurning God's messages of mercy, that canst not suffer even the messengers to live! When He adds, "How often would I have gathered thee!" He refers surely to something beyond the six or seven times that He visited and taught in Jerusalem while on earth. No doubt it points to "the prophets," whom they "killed" to "them that were sent unto her," whom they "stoned." But whom would He have gathered so often? "Thee," truth-hating, mercy-spurning, prophet-killing Jerusalem—how often would I have gathered Thee! Compare with this that affecting clause in the great ministerial commission, "that repentance and remission of sins should be preached in His name among all nations, beginning at Jerusalem." (Luke, 24. 47). What encouragement to the heart-broken at their own long-continued and obstinate rebellion! But we have not yet got at the whole heart of this outburst. I would have gathered thee, He says, "even as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings." Was ever imagery so homely invested with such grace and such sublimity as this, at our Lord's touch? And yet how exquisite the figure itself—of protection, rest, warmth, and all manner of conscious well-being in those poor, defenceless, dependent little creatures, as they creep under and feel themselves overshadowed by the capacious and kindly wing of the mother-bird! If, wandering beyond hearing of her peculiar call, they are overtaken by a storm or attacked by an enemy, what can they do but in the one case droop and die, and in the other submit to be torn in pieces? But if they can reach in time their place of safety, under the mother's wing, in vain will any enemy try to drag them thence. For rising into strength, kindling into fury, and forgetting herself entirely in her young, she will let the last drop of her blood be shed out and perish in defence of her precious charge, rather than yield them to an enemy's talons. How significant all this of what Jesus is and does for men! Under His great Mediatorial wing would He have "gathered" Israel. For the figure, see Deuteronomy, 32. 10-12; Ruth, 2. 12; Psalm 17. 8; 36. 7; 61. 4; 63. 7; 91. 4; Isaiah, 31. 5; Malachi, 4. 2. The ancient rabbins had a beautiful expression for proselytes from the heathen—that they had 'come under the wings of the Shechinah.' For this last word, see on v. 38. But what was the result of all this tender and mighty love? The answer is, "And ye would not." O mysterious word! mysterious the resistance of such patient Love—mysterious the liberty of self-undoing! The awful dignity of the will, as here expressed, might make the ears to tingle. 38. Behold, your house—the Temple, beyond all doubt; but their house now, not the Lord's. See on ch. 22. 7. Is left unto you desolate—'deserted,' i.e., of its Divine Inhabitant. But who is that? Hear the next words: 39. For I say unto you—and these were His last words to the impatient nation: see opening remarks on Mark, 13.—Ye shall not see me henceforth. What? Does Jesus mean that He was Himself the Lord of the temple, and that it became "deserted" when He finally left it? It is even so. Now is thy fate sealed, O Jerusalem, for the glory is departed from thee! That glory, once visible in the holy of holies, over the mercy-seat, when on the day of atonement the blood of typical expiation was sprinkled on it and in front of it—called by the Jews the Shechinah, or the Dwelling, as being the visible pavilion of Jehovah—that glory, which Isaiah (ch. 6.) saw in vision, the beloved disciple says was the glory of Christ (John, 12. 41). Though it was never visible in the second temple, Haggai foretold that "the glory of that latter house should be greater than of the former" (ch. 2. 9), because "the Lord whom they sought was suddenly to come to His temple" (Malachi, 3. 1), not in a mere bright cloud, but enshrined in living Humanity! Yet brief as well as "sudden" was the manifestation to be; for the world He was now uttering were to be HIS VERY LAST within its precincts. till ye shall say, Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord: i.e., till those "Hosannas to the Son of David" with which the multitude had welcomed Him into the city—instead of "sore displeasing the chief priests and scribes" (ch. 21. 15)—should break forth from the whole nation, as their glad acclaim to their once pierced but now acknowledged Messiah. That such a time will come is clear from Zechariah, 12. 10; Romans, 11. 26; 2 Corinthians, 3. 15, 16, &c. In what sense they shall then "see Him," may be gathered from Zechariah, 2. 10-13; Ezekiel, 37. 23-28; 38. 23, 26, &c.

CHAPTER XXIV.

VER. 1-51. CHRIST'S PROPHECY OF THE DESTRUCTION OF JERUSALEM, AND WARNINGS SUGGESTED BY IT TO PREPARE FOR HIS SECOND COMING. (= Mark, 13. 1-37; Luke, 21. 5-36.) For the exposition, see on Mark, 13. 1-37.

CHAPTER XXV.

VER. 1-13. PARABLE OF THE TEN VIRGINS. This and the following parable are in Matthew alone. 1. Then—at the time referred to at the close of the preceding chapter, the time of the Lord's Second Coming to reward His faithful servants and take vengeance on the faithless. Then shall the kingdom of heaven be likened unto ten virgins, which took their lamps, and went forth to meet the bridegroom. This supplies a key to the parable, whose object is, in the main, the same as that of the last parable—to illustrate the vigilant and expectant attitude of faith, in respect of which believers are described as "they that look for Him" (Hebrews, 9. 28), and "love His appearing" (2 Timothy, 4. 8). In the last parable it was that of servants waiting for their absent Lord; in this it is that of virgin-attendants on a Bride, whose duty it was to go forth at night with lamps, and be ready on the appearance of the Bridegroom to conduct the Bride to his house, and go in with him to the marriage. This entire and beautiful change of figure brings out the lesson of the former parable in quite a new light. But let it be observed that, just as in the parable of the Marriage Supper, so in this—the Bride does not come into view at all in this parable; the Virgins and the Bridegroom holding forth all the intended instruction: nor could believers be represented both as Bride and Bridal Attendants without incongruity. 2. And five of them were wise, and five were foolish. They are not distinguished into good and bad, as TRFNCH observes, but into "wise" and "foolish"—just as in ch. 7. 25-27, those who reared their house for eternity are distinguished into "wise" and "foolish builders," because in both cases a certain degree of good-will towards the truth is assumed. To make any thing of the equal number of both classes would, we think, be precarious, save to warn us how large a portion of those who, up to the last, so nearly resemble those that love Christ's appearing will be disowned by Him when He comes. 3. They that were foolish took their lamps, and took no oil with them: 4. But the wise took oil in their vessels with their lamps. What are these

"lamps" and this "oil?" Many answers have been given. But since the foolish as well as the wise took their lamps and went forth with them to meet the bridegroom, these lighted lamps, and this advance a certain way in company with the wise, must denote that Christian profession which is common to all who bear the Christian name: while the insufficiency of this without something else, of which they never possessed themselves, shows that "the foolish" mean those who, with all that is common to them with real Christians, lack the essential preparation for meeting Christ. Then, since the wisdom of "the wise" consisted in their taking with their lamps a supply of oil in their vessels, keeping their lamps burning till the bridegroom came, and so fitting them to go in with Him to the marriage—this supply of oil must mean that inward reality of grace which alone will stand when He appeareth whose eyes are as a flame of fire. But this is too general; for it cannot be for nothing that this inward grace is here set forth by the familiar symbol of oil, by which the Spirit of all grace is so constantly represented in Scripture. Beyond all doubt, this was what was symbolised by that precious anointing oil with which Aaron and his sons were consecrated to the priestly office (Exodus, 30, 23-25, 30); by "the oil of gladness above His fellows" with which Messiah was to be anointed (Psalm 45, 7; Hebrews, 1, 9, even as it is expressly said, that "God giveth not the Spirit by measure unto Him" (John, 3, 34); and by the bowl full of golden oil, in Zechariah's vision, which, receiving its supplies from the two olive-trees on either side of it, poured it through seven golden pipes into the golden lamp-stand to keep it continually burning bright (Zechariah, 4, 1)—for the prophet is expressly told that it was to proclaim the great truth, "Not by might, nor by power, but by My Spirit, saith the Lord of hosts [shall this temple be built]. Who art thou, O great mountain [of opposition to this issue]? Before Zerubbabel thou shalt become a plain [or, be swept out of the way], and he shall bring forth the head-stone [of the temple], with shoutings [crying], GRACE, GRACE unto it." This supply of oil, then, representing that inward grace which distinguishes the wise, must denote, more particularly, that "supply of the Spirit of Jesus Christ," which, as it is the source of the new spiritual life at the first, is the secret of its enduring character. Everything short of this may be possessed by "the foolish," while it is the possession of this that makes "the wise" to be "ready" when the Bridegroom appears, and fit to "go in with Him to the marriage." Just so in the parable of the Sower, the stony ground hearers, "having no deepness of earth" and "no root in themselves," though they spring up and get even into ear, never ripen, while they in the good ground bear the precious grain. 5. While the bridegroom tarried. So in ch. 24, 48, "My Lord delayeth His coming;" and so Peter says sublimely of the ascended Saviour, "Whom the heaven must receive until the times of restitution of all things" (Acts, 3, 21, and cf. Luke, 12, 11, 12). Christ "tarries," among other reasons, to try the faith and patience of His people. They all slumbered and slept—the wise as well as the foolish. The word "slumbered" signifies, simply, "dodged," or, "became drowsy;" while the word "slept" is the usual word for 'lying down to sleep,' denoting two stages of spiritual declension—first, that half-involuntary lethargy or drowsiness which is apt to steal over one who falls into inactivity; and then a conscious, deliberate yielding to it, after a little vain resistance. Such was the state alike of the wise and the foolish virgins, even till the cry of the Bridegroom's approach awoke them. So likewise in the parable of the Importunate Widow: "When the Son of man cometh, shall He find faith on the earth?"

(Luke, 18, 8.) 6. And at midnight—i.e., the time when the Bridegroom will be least expected; for "the day of the Lord so cometh as a thief in the night" (1 Thessalonians, 5, 2), there was a cry made, Behold, the bridegroom cometh; go ye out to meet him—i.e., 'Be ready to welcome Him.' 7. Then all those virgins arose, and trimmed their lamps—the foolish virgins as well as the wise. How very long do both parties seem the same—almost to the moment of decision! Looking at the mere form of the parable, it is evident that the folly of "the foolish" consisted not in having no oil at all; for they must have had oil enough in their lamps to keep them burning up to this moment; their folly consisted in not making provision against its exhaustion, by taking with their lamp an oil-vessel wherewith to replenish their lamp from time to time, and so have it burning until the bridegroom should come. Are we, then—with some even superior expositors—to conclude that the foolish virgins must represent true Christians as well as the wise, since only true Christians have the Spirit; and that the difference between the two classes consists only in the one having the necessary watchfulness which the other wants! Certainly not. Since the parable was designed to hold forth the prepared and the unprepared to meet Christ at His coming, and how the unprepared might, up to the very last, be confounded with the prepared—the structure of the parable behoved to accommodate itself to this, by making the lamps of the foolish to burn, as well as those of the wise, up to a certain point of time, and only then to discover their inability to burn on for want of a fresh supply of oil. But this is evidently just a structural device; and the real difference between the two classes who profess to love the Lord's appearing is a radical one—the possession by the one class of an enduring principle of spiritual life, and the want of it by the other. 8. And the foolish said unto the wise, Give us of your oil: for our lamps are gone out—rather, as in the margin, 'are going out; for oil will not light an extinguished lamp, though it will keep a burning one from going out. Ah! now at length they have discovered not only their own folly, but the wisdom of the other class, and they do homage to it. They did not perhaps despise them before, but they thought them righteous overmuch; now they are forced, with bitter mortification, to wish they were like them. 9. But the wise answered, [Not so]; lest there be not enough for us and you. The words "Not so," it will be seen, are not in the original, where the reply is very elliptical—"In case there be not enough for us and you." A truly wise answer this. 'And what, then, if we shall share it with you? Why, both will be undone,' but go ye rather to that sell, and buy for yourselves. Here again it would be straining the parable beyond its legitimate design to make it teach that men may get salvation even after they are supposed and required to have it already gotten. It is merely a friendly way of reminding them of the proper way of obtaining the needed and precious article, with a certain reflection on them for having it now to seek. Also, when the parable speaks of "selling" and "buying" that valuable article, it means simply, 'Go, get it in the only legitimate way.' And yet the word "buy" is significant; for we are elsewhere bidden "buy wine and milk without money and without price," and "buy of Christ gold tried in the fire," &c. (Isaiah, 55, 1; Revelation, 3, 18). Now, since what we pay the demanded price for becomes thereby our own property, the salvation which we thus take gratuitously at God's hands, being bought in His own sense of that word, becomes ours thereby in inalienable possession. (Cf. for the language, Proverbs, 23, 23; ch. 13, 44.) 10. And while they went to buy, the bridegroom came; and they that were ready went in with him to the marriage; and the door was shut. They are sensible of their past folly; they have taken good advice; they are in the act of getting what alone they lacked: a very little more, and they also are ready. But the Bridegroom comes; the ready are admitted; "the door is shut," and they are undone. How graphic and appalling this picture of one almost saved—but lost! 11. Afterward came also the other virgins, saying, Lord, Lord, open to us. In ch. 7, 22, this reiteration of the name was an exclamation rather of surprise; here it is a piteous cry of urgency, bordering on despair. Ah! now at length their eyes are wide open, and they realise all the consequences of their past folly. 12. But he answered and said, Verily I say unto you, I know you not. The attempt to establish a difference between "I know you not" here, and "I never knew you" in ch. 7, 23—as if this were gentler, and so implied a milder fate, reserved for "the foolish" of this parable—is to be resisted, though advocated by such critics as OLSHAUSEN, STIER, and ALFORD. Besides being inconsistent with the general tenor of such language, and particularly the solemn moral of the whole (v. 13), it is a kind of criticism which tampers with some of the most awful warnings regarding the future. If it be asked why unworthy guests were admitted to the marriage of the King's Son, in a former parable, and the foolish virgins are excluded in this one, we may answer, In the admirable words of GENHARD, quoted by TRENCH, that those festivities are celebrated in this life, in the Church militant; these at the last day, in the Church triumphant; to those, even they are admitted who are not adorned with the wedding-garment; but to these, only they to whom it is granted to be arrayed in fine linen clean and white, which is the righteousness of saints (Revelation, 19, 8); to those, men are called by the trumpet of the Gospel; to these by the trumpet of the Archangel; to those, who enters may go out from them, or be cast out; who is once introduced to these never goes out, nor is cast out, from them any more; wherefore, it is said, "The door is shut." 13. Watch therefore; for ye know neither the day nor the hour wherein the Son of man cometh. This, the moral or practical lesson of the whole parable, needs no comment.

As all that slaves have belongs to their master, so Christ has a claim to everything which belongs to His people, everything which may be turned to good, and He demands its appropriation to His service, or, viewing it otherwise, they first offer it up to Him; as being "not their own, but bought with a price" (1 Corinthians, 6, 19, 20), and He "delivers it to them" again to be put to use in His service. 15. And unto one he gave five talents, to another two, and to another one. While the proportion of gifts is different in each, the same ability is required of all, and equally rewarded. And thus there is perfect equity, to every man according to his several ability—his natural capacity as enlisted in Christ's service, and his opportunities in providence for employing the gifts bestowed on him, and straightway took his journey. Cf. ch. 21, 23, where the same departure is ascribed to God, after setting up the ancient economy. In both cases, it denotes the leaving of men to the action of all those spiritual laws and influences of Heaven under which they have been graciously placed for their own salvation and the advancement of their Lord's kingdom. 16. Then he that had received the five talents went and traded with the same—expressive of the activity which he put forth, and the labour he bestowed, and made them other five talents. 17. And likewise he that had received two—rather, 'the two'—he also gained other two—each doubling what he received, and therefore both equally faithful. 18. But he that had received one went and digged in the earth, and hid his lord's money—not mispending, but simply making no use it. Nay, his action seems that of one anxious that the gift should not be misused or lost, but ready to be returned, just as he got it. 19. After a long time the lord of those servants cometh and reckoneth with them. That any one—within the life-time of the apostles at least—with such words before them, should think that Jesus had given any reason to expect His Second Appearing within that period, would seem strange, did we not know the tendency of enthusiastic, ill-regulated love of His appearing ever to take this turn. 20. Lord, thou deliverest unto me five talents; behold, I have gained besides them five talents more. How beautifully does this illustrate what the beloved disciple says of "boldness in the day of judgment," and his desire that "when He shall appear we may have confidence, and not be ashamed before Him at His coming?" (1 John, 4, 17; 2, 28.) 21. His lord said unto him, Well done—a single word, not of bare satisfaction, but of warm and delighted commendation. And from what lips! thou hast been faithful over a few things, I will make thee ruler over many things... 22. He also that had received two talents came... good and faithful servant; thou hast been faithful over a few things, I will make thee ruler over many things. Both are commended in the same terms, and the reward of both is precisely the same. (See on v. 15.) Observe also the contrasts: 'Thou hast been faithful as a servant; now be a ruler—thou hast been entrusted with a few things; now have dominion over many things.' enter thou into the joy of thy lord—thy Lord's own joy. (See John, 15, 11; Hebrews, 12, 2.) 24. Then he which had received the one talent came and said, Lord, I knew thee that thou art as hard—or 'harsh,' man. The word in Luke (18, 21) is "austero," reaping where thou hast not sown, and gathering where thou hast not strawed. The sense is obvious: 'I knew thou wast one whom it was impossible to serve, one whom nothing would please; exacting what was impracticable, and dissatisfied with what was attainable.' Thus do men secretly think of God as a hard Master, and virtually throw on Him the blame of their fruitlessness. 25. And I was afraid—of making matters worse by meddling with it at all, and went and hid thy talent in the earth. This depicts the conduct of all those who shut up their gifts from the active service of Christ, without actually prostituting them to unworthy uses. Fitly, therefore, may it, at least, comprehend those, to whom TRENCH refers, who, in the early Church, leaped that they had enough to do with their own souls and were afraid of losing them in trying to do others'; and so, instead of being the salt of the earth, thought rather of keeping their own saltiness, withdrawing sometimes into caves and wildernesses, from all those active ministries of love by which they might have served their brethren. Thou skest and slothful servant. "Wicked" or "bad" means "false-hearted," as opposed to the others, who are emphatically styled "good servants." The addition of "slothful" is to mark the precise nature of the wickedness: it consisted, it seems not in his doing anything against, but simply nothing for his Master. Thou knowest that I reap where I sowed not, I gather where I have not sown. He takes the want's own account of his demands, as expressing emphatically enough, not the "hardness" which he had selfishly imputed to him, but simply his demand of 'a suitable return for the gift entrusted.' 27. thou knowest therefore to have put my money to the exchangers or, "the bankers," and thou at my coming I should have received mine own with usury—or 'interest.' 29. I unto every one that hath shall be given, &c. See ch. 13. 12. 30. And cast ye—'cast ye out' the unprofitable servant—the useless servant, that does his Master no service, into outer darkness—the darkness which is outside.' On this expression see on ch. 22. 13. we shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth. See on p. 13. 42.

THE LAST JUDGMENT. The close connection between this sublime scene—peculiar to Matthew and the two preceding parables is too obvious to need pointing out. 31. When the Son of man shall be in his glory—His personal glory, and all the holy angels with him. See Deuteronomy, 33. 2; Daniel, 7. 13; Jude, 14; with Hebrews, 1. 6; 1 Peter, 3. 22. then all be sit upon the thrones of his glory—the glory of judicial authority. 32. And before him shall be gathered all nations—or, 'all the nations.' That this could be understood to mean the heathen nations, all except believers in Christ, will seem amazing to every simple reader. Yet this is the exposition of BRAUSEN, STEE, KEIL, ALFORD (though latterly with some diffidence), and of a number, though not all, of those who hold that Christ will come the Second time before the Millennium, and that the saints will be caught up to meet Him in the air before His Appearing. Their chief argument is, the impossibility of any that ever knew the Lord Jesus wondering, at the Judgment Day, that they should be thought to be done—or left undone—anything "unto Christ," or that we shall advert when we come to it. But we may just say, that if this scene do not denote a personal, public, final judgment on men, according to the treatment they have given to Christ—and consequently men within the Christian pale—we shall have to consider again whether our Lord's teaching on the greatest themes of human interest does indeed possess that incomparable simplicity and transparency of meaning which, by universal consent, has been ascribed to it. If it be said, But we can see this be the General Judgment, if only those within the Christian pale be embraced by it?—we answer, What is here described, as it certainly does of meet the case of all the family of Adam is of mere so far not general. But we have no right to conclude that the whole "Judgment of the great day" will be limited to the points of view here presented. Other explanations will come up in the course of our exposition, and he shall separate them for the first time; the two classes having been mingled all along up to this awful moment—as a shepherd divideth his sheep from the goats (see Ezekiel, 34. 17). 33. And he shall set the sheep on his right hand—the side of honour (1 Kings, 2. 15; Psalm 45. 9; 110. 1, &c.)—but the goats on the left—the side consequently of dishonour. 34. Then shall the King. Magnificent title, here for the first and only time, save in parabolical language, given to Himself by the Lord Jesus, and that on the eve of His deepest humiliation! It is to intimate that in then addressing the heirs of the kingdom He will put on all His royal majesty, say unto them on his right hand, Come—the same sweet word with which He had so long invited all the weary and heavy laden to come unto Him for rest. Now it is addressed exclusively to such as have come and found rest. It is still "Come," and to "rest" too; but to rest in a higher style, and in another region. ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world. The whole story of this their blessedness is given by the apostle, in words which seem but an expansion of these: "Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who hath blessed us with all spiritual blessings in heavenly places in Christ; according as He hath chosen us in Him before the foundation of the world, that we should be holy and without blame before Him in love." They were chosen from everlasting to the possession and enjoyment of all spiritual blessings in Christ, and so chosen in order to be holy and blameless in love. This is the holy love whose practical manifestations the King is about to recount in detail; and thus we see that their whole life of love to Christ is the fruit of an eternal purpose of love to them in Christ. 35. For I was hungry . . . thirsty . . . a stranger . . . Naked . . . sick . . . prison, and ye came unto me. 37-39. Then shall the righteous answer him, &c. 40. And the King shall answer and say unto them, Verily I say unto you, &c. Astonishing dialogue this between the King, from the Throne of His glory, and His wondering people! "I was hungry, and ye gave Me meat," &c.—"Not we," they reply. "We never did that, Lord: We were born out of due time, and enjoyed not the privilege of ministering unto Thee." "But ye did it to these My brethren, now beside you, when ye pursued your love." "Truth, Lord, but was that doing it to Thee? Thy name was indeed dear to us, and we thought it an honour too great to suffer shame for it. When among the destitute and distressed we discerned any of the household of faith, we will not deny that our hearts leapt within us at the discovery, and when their knock came to our dwelling, "our bowels were moved," as though "our Beloved Himself had put in His hand by the hole of the door." Sweet was the fellowship we had with them, as if we had "entertained angels unawares;" all difference between giver and receiver somehow melted away under the beams of that love of Thine which knit us together; may rather, as they left us with gratitude for our poor gifts, we seemed the debtors—not they. But, Lord, were we all that time in company with Thee?" "Yes, that scene was all with Me," replies the King—"Me in the disguise of My poor ones. The door shut against Me by others was opened by you"—"Ye took Me in." Apprehended and imprisoned by the enemies of the truth, ye whom the truth had made free sought Me out diligently and found Me; visiting Me in My lonely cell at the risk of your own lives, and cheering My solitude; ye gave Me a coat, for I shivered; and then I felt warm. With cups of cold water ye moistened My parched lips; when famished with hunger ye supplied Me with crusts, and My spirit revived—"YE DID IT UNTO ME." What thoughts crowd upon us as we listen to such a description of the scenes of the Last Judgment! And in the light of this view of the heavenly Dialogue, how bald and wretched, not to say unscriptural, is that view of it to which we referred at the outset, which makes it a Dialogue between Christ and heathens who never heard of His name, and of course never felt any stirrings of His love in their hearts! To us it seems a poor, superficial objection to the Christian view of this scene, that Christians could never be supposed to ask such questions as the "blessed of Christ's Father" are made to ask here. If there were any difficulty in explaining this, the difficulty of the other view is such as to make it, at least, insufferable. But there is no real difficulty. The surprise expressed is not at their being told that they acted from love to Christ, but that Christ Himself was the Personal Object of all their deeds—that they found Him hungry, and supplied Him with food; that they brought water to Him, and slaked His thirst; that seeing Him naked and shivering, they put warm clothing upon Him, and Him visits when lying in prison for the truth, and sat by His bedside when laid down with sickness. This, this is the astonishing interpretation which Jesus says "the King" will give to them of their own actions here below. And will any Christian reply, 'How could this astonish them? Does not every Christian know that He does these very things, when He does them at all, just as they are here represented? Nay, rather, is it conceivable that they should not be astonished, and almost doubt their own ears, to hear such an account of their own actions upon earth from the lips of the Judge? And remember, that Judge has come in His glory, and now sits upon the Throne of His glory, and all the holy angels are with Him; and that it is from those glorified lips that the words come forth, 'Ye did all this unto Me.' O can we imagine such a word addressed to ourselves, and then fancy ourselves replying, 'Of course we did—To whom else did we anything? It must be others than we that are addressed, who never knew, in all their good deeds, what they were about? Rather, can we imagine ourselves not overpowered with astonishment, and scarcely able to credit the testimony borne to us by the King? 41 Then shall he say also unto them on the left hand, Depart from me, ye cursed, &c. "As for you on the left hand, ye did nothing for Me. I came to you also, but ye knew Me not: ye had neither warm affections nor kind deeds to bestow upon Me: I was as one despised in your eyes." In our eyes, Lord? We never saw Thee before, and never, sure, behaved we so to Thee.' "But thus ye treated these little ones that believe in Me and now stand on My right hand. In the disguise of these poor members of Mine I came soliciting your pity, but ye shut up your bowels of compassion from Me: I asked relief, but ye had none to give Me. Take back therefore your own coldness, your own contemptuous distance: Ye bid Me away from your presence, and now I bid you from Mine—Depart from Me, ye cursed!" 46. And these shall go away—these "cursed" ones. Sentence, it should seem, was first pronounced—in the hearing of the wicked—upon the righteous, who thereupon sit as assessors in the judgment upon the wicked: 1 Corinthians, 6: 2; but sentence is first executed. It should seem, upon the wicked, in the sight of the righteous—whose glory will thus not be beheld by the wicked, while their descent into "their own place" will be witnessed by the righteous, as BENJEL notes, into everlasting punishment—or, as in v. 41, "everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels." Cf. ch. 13: 42; 2 Thessalonians, 1: 9, &c. This is said to be "prepared for the devil and his angels," because they were "first in transgression." But both have one doom, because one unholiness character, but the righteous into life eternal—"life everlasting." The word in both clauses, being in the original the same, should have been the same in the translation also. Thus the decisions of this awful day will be final, irreversible, unending.

CHAPTER XXVI.

VER. 1-16. CHRIST'S FINAL ANNOUNCEMENT OF HIS DEATH, AS NOW WITHIN TWO DAYS, AND THE SIMULTANEOUS CONSPIRACY OF THE JEWISH AUTHORITIES TO COMPASS IT—THE AGONY AT BETHANY—JUDAS AGREES WITH THE CHIEF PRIESTS TO BETRAY HIS LORD. (=Mark, 14: 1-11; Luke, 22: 1-6; John, 12: 1-11.) For the exposition, see on Mark, 14: 1-11.

17-30. PREPARATION FOR AND LAST CELEBRATION OF THE PASSOVER, ANNOUNCEMENT OF THE TRAITOR, AND INSTITUTION OF THE SUPPER. (=Mark, 14: 12-26; Luke, 22: 7-23; John, 13: 1-3, 10, 11, 18-30.) For the exposition, see on Luke, 22: 7-23.

31-36. THE DESERTION OF JESUS BY HIS DISCIPLES, AND THE FALL OF PETER FORETOLD. (=Mark, 14: 27-31; Luke, 22: 31-38; John, 13: 26-32.) For the exposition, see on Luke, 22: 31-38.

36-46. THE AGONY IN THE GARDEN. (=Mark, 14: 32-42; Luke, 22: 39-46.) For the exposition, see on Luke, 22: 39-46.

47-56. BETRAYAL AND APPREHENSION OF JESUS—FLIGHT OF HIS DISCIPLES. (=Mark, 14: 43-52; Luke, 22: 47-54; John, 18: 1-12.) For the exposition, see on John, 18: 1-12.

57-75. JESUS ARRANGED BEFORE THE SANHEDRIM, CONDEMNED TO DIE, AND SHAMEFULLY ENTREATED—THE FALL OF PETER. (=Mark, 14: 53-72; Luke, 22: 54-71; John, 18: 13-18, 24-27.) For the exposition, see on Mark, 14: 53-72.

CHAPTER XXVII.

VER. 1-10. JESUS LED AWAY TO PILATE—REMOSS AND SUICIDE OF JUDAS. (=Mark, 16: 1; Luke, 23: 1; John, 18: 28.)

Jesus Led Away to Pilate (v. 1, 2). For the exposition of this portion, see on John, 18: 28, &c.

Remorse and Suicide of Judas (v. 3-10). This portion is peculiar to Matthew. On the progress of guilt in the traitor, see on Mark, 14: 1-11; and on John, 12: 21-30. 3. Then Judas, which had betrayed him, when he saw that he was condemned. The condemnation, even though not unexpected, might well fill him with horror. But perhaps this unhappy man expected that, while he got the bribe, the Lord would miraculously escape, as He had once and again done before, out of His enemies' power; and if so, his remorse would come upon him with all the greater keenness, repented himself—but, as the issue too sadly showed, it was "the sorrow of the world, which worketh death" (2 Corinthians, 7: 10), and brought again the thirty pieces of silver to the chief priests and elders. A remarkable illustration of the power of an awakened conscience. A short time before, the promise of this sordid pelf was temptation enough to his covetous heart to outweigh the most overwhelming obligations of duty and love; now, the possession of it so lashes him that he cannot use it, cannot even keep it! 4. Saying, I have sinned in that I have betrayed the innocent blood. What a testimony this to Jesus! Judas had been with Him in all circumstances for three years; his post, as treasurer to Him and the Twelve (John, 12: 6), gave him peculiar opportunity of watching the spirit, disposition, and habits of his Master; while his covetous nature and thievish practices would incline him to dark and suspicious, rather than frank and generous, interpretations of all that He said and did. If, then, he could have fastened on one questionable feature in all that he had so long witnessed, we may be sure that no such speech as this would ever have escaped his lips, nor would he have been so stung with remorse as not to be able to keep the money and survive his crime. And they symbol of separation between good and guilty men was, without a hand touching it, mysteriously "rent in twain from top to bottom;"—"the Holy Ghost thus signifying, that the way into the holiest of all was now made manifest!" How emphatic the statement, "from top to bottom;" as if to say, "Come boldly now to the Throne of Grace; the veil is clean gone; the Mercyseat stands open to the gaze of sinner, and the way to it is sprinkled with the blood of Him—"who through the eternal Spirit hath offered Himself without spot to God!" Before, it was death to go in, now it is death to stay out. See more on this glorious subject on Hebrews, 10, 19-22.

An Earthquake—The Rocks Rent—The Graves Opened, that the Saints which slept in them might Come Forth after their Lord's Resurrection (r. 51-53). 51. and the earth did quake. From what follows it would seem that this earthquake was local, having for its object the rending of the rocks and the opening of the graves. and the rocks rent ('were rent')—the physical creation thus sublimely proclaiming, at the bidding of its Maker, the concussion which at that moment was taking place in the moral world at the most critical moment of its history. Extraordinary rents and fissures have been observed in the rocks near this spot. 52. And the graves were opened; and many bodies of the saints which slept arose. These sleeping saints (see on 1 Thessalonians, 4, 14; were Old Testament believers, who—according to the usual penetration in our version—were quickened into resurrection-life at the moment of their Lord's death, but lay in their graves till His resurrection, when they came forth. But it is far more natural, as we think, and consonant with other scriptures, to understand that only the graves were opened, probably by the earthquake, at our Lord's death, and this only in preparation for the subsequent exit of those who slept in them, when the Spirit of life should enter into them from their risen Lord, and along with Him they should come forth, trophies of His victory over the grave. Thus, in the opening of the graves at the moment of the Redeemer's expiring, there was a glorious symbolical proclamation that the Death which had just taken place had "swallowed up death in victory;" and whereas the saints that slept in them were awakened only by their risen Lord to however, that the resurrection of these sleeping saints was not like those of the widow of Nain's son, of Jairus' daughter, of Lazarus, and of the man who "revived and stood upon his feet," on his dead body touching the bones of Elisha (2 Kings, 13. 21)—which were mere temporary recallings of the departed spirit to the mortal body, to be followed by a final departure of it "till the trumpet shall sound." But this was a resurrection once for all, to life everlasting; and so there is no room to doubt that they went to glory with their Lord, as bright trophies of His victory over death.

The Centurion's Testimony (v. 54). 54. Now when the centurion—the military superintendent of the execution, and they that were with him watching Jesus, saw the earthquake—or felt it and witnessed its effects, and those things that were done—reflecting upon the entire transaction, they feared greatly—convinced of the presence of a Divine Hand, saying, Truly this was the Son of God. There cannot be a reasonable doubt that this expression was used in the Jewish sense, and that it points to the claim which Jesus made to be the Son of God, and on which His condemnation expressly turned. The meaning, then, clearly is, that He must have been what He professed to be; in other words, that He was no impostor. There was no medium between those two. See, on the similar testimony of the penitent thief—"This man hath done nothing amiss"—on Luke, 23. 41.

The Galilean Women (v. 55, 56). 55. And many women were there beholding afar off, which followed Jesus. The sense here would be better brought out by the use of the plurimot, "which had followed Jesus," from Galilee, ministering unto him. As these dear women had ministered to Him during His glorious missionary tours in Galilee (see on Luke, 8. 1-3), so from this statement it should seem that they accompanied Him and ministered to His wants from Galilee on His final journey to Jerusalem. 56. Among which was Mary Magdalene (see on Luke, 8. 2), and Mary the mother of James and Joseph—the wife of Cleophas, or rather Clopas, and sister of the Virgin (John, 19. 25). See on ch. 13. 55, 56, and the mother of Zebedee's children—i.e., Salome; cf. Mark, 15. 40. All this about the women is mentioned for the sake of what is afterwards to be related of their purchasing spices to anoint their Lord's body.

The Taking Down from the Cross and the Burial (v. 57-60). For the exposition of this portion, see on John, 19. 38-42.

The Women mark the Sacred Spot, that they might recognise it on coming thither to Anoint the Body (v. 61). 61. And there was Mary Magdalene, and the other Mary—"the mother of James and Joseph," mentioned before (v. 56), sitting over against the sepulchre. See on Mark, 16. 1.

The Sepulchre Guarded (v. 62-64). 62. Now the next day, that followed the day of the preparation—i.e., after six o'clock of our Saturday evening. The crucifixion took place on the Friday, and all was not over till shortly before sunset, when the Jewish Sabbath commenced; and "that sabbath day was an high day" (John, 19. 31), being the first day of the feast of Unleavened Bread. The day being over at six on Saturday evening, they hastened to take their measures. 63. Saying, Sir, we remember that that deceiver—Never, remarks LINGGOL, will you find the heads of the people calling Jesus by His own name. And yet here there is betrayed a certain uneasiness, which one almost fancies they only tried to stifle in their own minds, as well as crush in Pilate's, in case he should have any lurking suspicion that he had done wrong: in yielding to them, said, while he was yet alive. Important testimony this, from the lips of His bitterest enemies, to the reality of Christ's death; the cornerstone of the whole Christian religion. After three days—which, according to the customary Jewish way of reckoning, need signify no more than 'after the commencement of the third day.' I will rise again—'I rise,' in the present tense, thus reporting not only the fact that this prediction of His had reached their ears, but that they understood Him to look forward confidently to its occurring on the very day named.

64. Command therefore that the sepulchre be made sure—by a Roman guard, until the third day—after which, if He still lay in the grave, the imposture of His claims would be manifest to all, and say unto the people, He is risen from the dead. Did they really fear this? so the last error shall be worse than the first—the imposture of His pretended resurrection worse than that of His pretended Messiahship. 65. Pilate said unto them, Ye have a watch. The guards had already acted under orders of the Sanhedrim, with Pilate's consent; but probably they were not clear about employing them as a night-watch without Pilate's express authority, go your way, make it as sure as ye can—as ye know how, or in the way ye deem securest. Though there may be no irony in this speech, it evidently insinuated that if the event should be contrary to their wish, it would not be for want of sufficient human appliances to prevent it. 66. So they went, and made the sepulchre sure, sealing the stone—which Mark (16. 4) says was "very great," and setting a watch—to guard it. What more could man do! But while they are trying to prevent the resurrection of the Prince of Life, God makes use of their precautions for His own ends. Their stone-covered, seal-secured sepulchre shall preserve the sleeping dust of the Son of God free from all indignities, in undisturbed, sublime repose; while their watch shall be His guard of honour until the angels shall come to take their place!

CHAPTER XXVIII.

VER. 1-15. GLOUBIOUS ANGELIC ANNOUNCEMENT ON THE FIRST DAY OF THE WEEK, THAT CHRIST IS RISEN—HIS APPEARANCE TO THE WOMEN—THE GUARDS BRIBED TO GET A FALSE ACCOUNT OF THE RESURRECTION. (—Mark, 16. 1-8; Luke, 24. 1-8; John, 20. 1.)

The Resurrection Announced to the Women (v. 1-8).

1. In the end of the sabbath, as it began to dawn, After the Sabbath, as it grew toward daylight, toward the first day of the week. Luke (24. 1) has it, "very early in the morning"—properly, 'at the first appearance of day-break;' and corresponding with this, John (20. 1) says, "when it was yet dark." See on Mark, 16. 2. Not an hour, it would seem, was lost by those dear lovers of the Lord Jesus. came Mary Magdalene, and the other Mary—"the mother of James and Joseph" (see on ch. 27. 56, 61), to see the sepulchre—with a view to the anointing of the body, for which they had made all their preparations. See on Mark, 16. 1. 2. And, behold, there was—i.e., there had been, before the arrival of the women, a great earthquake: for the angel of the Lord descended from heaven, &c. And this was the state of things when the women drew near. Some judicious critics think all this was transacted while the women were approaching; but the view we have given, which is the prevalent one, seems the more natural. All this august preparation—recorded by Matthew alone—bespoke the grandeur of the exit which was to follow. The angel sat upon the huge stone, to overawe, with the lightning-lustre that darted from him, the Roman guard, and do honour to his rising Lord. 3. His countenance—or, 'appearance,' was like lightning, and his raiment white as snow—the one expressing the glory, the other the purity of the celestial abode from which he came. 4. And for fear of him the keepers did shake, and became as dead men. Is the sepulchre "sure" now, O ye chief but steth in the heavens doth laugh at the angel answered and said unto it ye. The "ye" here is emphatic, to case with that of the guards. 'Let restures, sent to keep the Living One ad, for fear of Me shake and become as 4; but ye that have come hither on d, fear not ye,' for I know that ye seek as crucified—'Jesus the Crucified.' 6. for he is risen, as he said. See on Luke, as in ch. 11. 25, see the place where the rning invitation! 'Come, see the spot of glory lay: now it is an empty grave: as He lay there. Come, feast your eyes on John, 20. 12. 7. And go quickly, 13. 7. that he is risen from the dead; and, 1 before you into Galilee—to which those and ch. 27. 65. there shall ye see him. or to those more public manifestations) large numbers of disciples at once, ased only in Galilee; for individually of some of those very women almost after this (v. 9. 10). 10. I have told you, as this word from the world of light! ned quickly. Mark (16. 8) says "they agulate with fear and great joy. How mination of feelings! See on a similar Mark, 16. 11. and did run to bring his "Neither said they anything to any yl; for they were afraid" (Mark, 16. 8); to the Women (v. 9. 10). This appear- ed only by Matthew. 9. Then said Jesus unto them, Be not dear associations would these familiar tered in a higher style, but by the ng rushing back to their recollection! iren that they go into Galilee, and there me. The brethren here meant must brethren after the flesh (ch. 13. 55); for n the higher sense (see on John, 20. 17) settings with Him at Jerusalem before alilee, which they would have missed an the persons ordered to Galilee to

1. 11-13. The whole of this tion is peculiar to Matthew. 11. Now going—while the women were on their r to His brethren the message of their me of the watch came into the city, and which priests all the things that were done. 12. And when they were assembled. But Joseph at least was absent; 13. Saying, Say ye, His disciples and stole him away while we slept—which, served, was a capital offence for soldiers. 1. And if this come to the governor's ear- his case before the governor; i.e., not mere report, but for judicial investigation, we will persuade him, and secure you. The "we" and the "you" are emphatic here—'We shall (take care to) persuade him and keep you from trouble,' or 'save you harmless.' The grammatical form of this clause implies that the thing supposed was expected to happen. The meaning then is, 'If this come before the governor—as it likely will—we shall see to it that,' &c. The "persuasion" of Pilate meant, doubtless, quieting him by a bribe, which we know otherwise he was by no means above taking (like Felix afterwards, Acts, 24. 29. 15. So they took the money, and did as they were taught—thus consenting to brand themselves with infamy—and this saying is commonly reported among the Jews until this day—to the date of the publication of this Gospel. The wonder is that so clumsy and incredible a story lasted so long. But those who are resolved not to come to the light will catch at straws. JUSTIN MARTYR, who flourished about A.D. 170, says, in his "Dialogue with Trypho the Jew," that the Jews dispersed the story by means of special messengers sent to every country.

16-20. JESUS MEETS WITH THE DISCIPLES ON A MOUNTAIN IN GALILEE, AND GIVES FORTH THE GREAT COMMISSION. 16. Then the eleven disciples went away into Galilee—but certainly not before the second week after the resurrection, and probably somewhat later, into a mountain where Jesus had appointed them. It should have been rendered 'the mountain,' meaning some certain mountain which He had named to them—probably the night before He suffered, when He said, "After I am risen, I will go before you into Galilee" (ch. 26. 32; Mark, 14. 28). What it was can only be conjectured; but of the two between which opinions are divided—the Mount of the Beatitudes or Mount Tabor—the former is much the more probable, from its nearness to the sea of Tiberias, where last before this the Narrative tells us that He met and dined with seven of them. (John, 21. 1, &c.) That the interview here recorded was the same with that referred to in one place only—1 Corinthians, 15. 6—when "He was seen of above five hundred brethren at once; of whom the greater part remained unto that day, though some were fallen asleep," is now the opinion of the ablest students of the Evangelical History. Nothing can account for such a number as five hundred assembling at one spot but the expectation of some promised manifestation of their risen Lord; and the promise before His resurrection, twice repeated after it, best explains this immense gathering. 17. And when they saw him, they worshipped him; but some doubted—certainly none of "the Eleven," after what took place at previous interviews in Jerusalem. But if the five hundred were now present, we may well believe this of some of them. 19. Go ye therefore, and teach all nations—rather, 'make disciples of all nations;' for "teaching," in the more usual sense of that word, comes in afterwards, and is expressed by a different term, baptizing them in the name. It should be, 'into the name:' as in 1 Corinthians, 10. 2, "And were all baptized unto for rather '(into)' Moses;" and Galatians, 3. 27, "For as many of you as have been baptized into Christ," of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost; 20. Teaching them. This is teaching in the more usual sense of the term; or instructing the converted and baptized disciples, to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you; and, lo, I. The "I" here is emphatic. It is enough that I am with you always—all the days; i.e., till making converts, baptizing, and building them up by Christian instruction, shall be no more, even unto the end of the world. Amen. This glorious Commission embraces two primary departments, the Missionary and the Pastoral, with two sublime and comprehensive Encouragements to undertake and go through with them.

First, The MISSIONARY department (v. 18): "Go, make disciples of all nations." In the corresponding passage of Mark (16. 15), it is, "Go ye into all the world, and preach the Gospel to every creature." The only difference is, that in this passage the sphere, in its world-wide compass and its universality of objects, is more fully and definitely expressed; while in the former the great aim and certain result is delightfully expressed in the command to "make disciples of all nations." "Go, conquer the world for Me; carry the glad tidings into all lands and to every ear, and deem not this work at an end till all nations shall have embraced the Gospel and enrolled themselves My disciples." Now, Was all this meant to be done by the Eleven men nearest to Him of the multitude then crowding around the risen Redeemer? Impossible. Was it to be done even in their lifetime? Surely not. In that little band Jesus virtually addressed Himself to all who, in every age, should take up from them the same work. Before the eyes of the Church's risen Head were spread out, in those Eleven men, all His servants of every age; and one and all of them received His commission at that moment. Well, what next? Set the seal of visible discipleship upon the converts, by "baptizing them into the name," i.e., into the whole fulness of the grace "of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost," as belonging to them who believe. (See on 2 Corinthians, 13. 14.) This done, the Missionary department of your work, which in its own nature is temporary, must merge in another, which is per-

This is.

Second, The PASTORAL department (v. 20): them"—teach these baptised members of the visible—"to observe all things whatsoever I commanded you." My apostles, during 34 years ye have been with Me.

What must have been the feelings which Commission awakened? "We conquer the world. Thee, Lord, who have scarce conquered our givings—we, fishermen of Galilee, with no means, no influence over the humblest of us. Nay, Lord, do not mock us." "I mock you send you a warfare on your own charges. For we are brought to

Third, The ENCOURAGEMENTS to undertake through with this work. These are two; or van, the other in the rear of the Commission

First Encouragement: "All power in Heaven whole power of Heaven's love and wisdom strength, "and all power in earth"—power persons, all passions, all principles, all motives to bend them to this one high object, the evan-tion of the world: All this "is given unto Me risen Lord of all, to be by Me placed at your c —"Go ye therefore." But there remains a Second Encouragement: "And lo! I am 'all the days"—not only to perpetuity, but one day's interruption, "even to the end world." The "Amen" is of doubtful genuin this place. If, however, it belongs to the Evangelist's own closing word.

14-20. CHRIST BEGINS HIS GALILEAN MINISTRY—CALLING OF SIMON AND ANDREW, JAMES AND JOHN. See on Matthew, 4. 12-22.

21-26. HEALING OF A DEMONIAC IN THE SYNAGOGUE OF CAPERNAUM, AND THEREAFTER OF JESUS'S MOTHER-IN-LAW AND MANY OTHERS—JESUS, NEXT DAY, IS FOUND IN A SOLITARY PLACE AT MORNING PRAYERS, AND IS ENTRATED TO RETURN, BUT DECLINES, AND GOES FORTH ON HIS FIRST MISSIONARY CIRCUIT. (=Luke, 4. 31-44; Matthew, 8. 14-17; 4. 23-25.) 21. And went into Capernaum—see on Matthew, 4. 13—and straightway on the sabbath day he entered into the synagogue and taught. This should have been rendered, 'straightway on the sabbaths He entered into the synagogue and taught,' or 'continued to teach.' The meaning is, that as He began this practice on the very first Sabbath after coming to settle at Capernaum, so He continued it regularly thereafter. 22. And they were astonished at his doctrine—or 'teaching'—referring quite as much to the manner as the matter of it, for he taught them as one that had authority, and not as the scribes. See on Matthew, 7. 28, 29. 23. And there was in their synagogue a man with (lit. 'in') an unclean spirit—i.e., so entirely under demonical power that his personality was sunk for the time in that of the spirit. The frequency with which this character of 'impurity' is ascribed to evil spirits—some twenty times in the Gospels—is not to be overlooked, and he cried out, 24. Saying, Let us alone—or rather, perhaps, 'ah!' expressive of mingled astonishment and terror. what have we to do with thee—an expression of frequent occurrence in the Old Testament. (1 Kings, 11. 18; 2 Kings, 3. 13; 2 Chronicles, 35. 21, &c.) It denotes "entire separation of interests"—q.d., 'Thou and we have nothing in common: we want not Thee: what wouldst thou with us?' For the analogous application of it by our Lord to His mother, see on John, 2. 4. (thou) Jesus of Nazareth!—'Jesus, Nazareth' an epithet originally given to express contempt, but soon adopted as the current designation by those who held our Lord in honour (Luke, 18. 37; ch. 18. 6; Acts, 2. 22)—art thou come to destroy us? In the case of the Gadarene demoniac the question was, "Art thou come hither to torment us before the time?" (Matthew, 8. 29.) Themselves tormentors and destroyers of their victims, they discern in Jesus their own destined Tormentor and Destroyer, anticipating and dreading what they know and feel to be awaiting them! Conscious, too, that their power was but permitted and temporary, and perceiving in Him, perhaps, the Woman's Seed that was to bruise the head and destroy the works of the devil, they regard His approach to them on this occasion as a signal to let go their grasp of this miserable victim. I know thee who thou art, the Holy One of God. This and other even more glorious testimonies to our Lord were given, as we know, with no good will, but in hope that by the acceptance of them He might appear to the people to be in league with evil spirits—a calumny which His enemies were ready enough to throw out against Him. But a Wiser than either was here, who invariably rejected and silenced the testimonies that came to Him from beneath, and thus was able to rebut the imputations of His enemies against Him (Matthew, 12. 24-30). The expression, "Holy One of God," seems evidently taken from that Messianic Psalm (16. 10), in which He is styled "Thine Holy One." 25. And Jesus rebuked him, saying, Hold thy peace, and come out of him. A glorious word of command. BENGEL remarks that it was only the testimony borne to Himself which our Lord meant to silence. That he should afterwards cry out for fear or rage (v. 26) He would right willingly permit. 26. And when the unclean spirit had torn him. Luke (4. 35) says, "When he had thrown him in the midst." Malignant cruelty—just showing what he would have done, if permitted to go further: it was a last fling and cried with a loud voice—the voice of enforced submission and despair—he came out of him. Luke (4. 35) adds, "and hurt him not." Thus impotent were the malignity and rage of the impure spirit when under the restraint of "the Stronger than the strong one armed" (Luke, 11. 21, 22). 27. What thing is this? what new doctrine ('teaching') is this? The audience, rightly apprehending that the miracle was wrought to illustrate the teaching and display the character and glory of the Teacher, begin by asking what novel kind of teaching this could be, which was so marvellously attested. 28. And immediately his fame spread abroad throughout all the region round about Galilee—rather, 'the whole region of Galilee'; though some, as MAYER and ELTCOTT, explain it of the country surrounding Galilee. 29. And forthwith, when they were come out of the synagogue—so also in Luke, 4. 38, they entered into the house of Simon and Andrew, with James and John. The mention of these four—which is peculiar to Mark—is the first of those traces of Peter's hand in this Gospel, of which we shall come to many more. The house being his, and the disease and cure so nearly affecting himself, it is interesting to observe this minute specification of the number and names of the witnesses; interesting also as the first occasion on which the sacred triumvirate of Peter and James and John are selected from amongst the rest, to be a threefold cord of testimony to certain events in their Lord's life (see on ch. 5. 37)—Andrew being present on this occasion, as the occurrence took place in his own house. 30. But Simon's wife's mother lay sick of a fever. Luke, as was natural in "the beloved physician" (Colossians, 4. 14), describes it professionally; calling it a "great fever," and thus distinguishing it from that lighter kind which the Greek physicians were wont to call "small fevers," as GALEN, quoted by WESTSTEIN, tells us. and anon—or 'immediately' they tell him of her—naturally hoping that His compassion and power towards one of His own disciples would not be less signally displayed than towards the demonized stranger in the synagogue. 31. And he came and took her by the hand—rather, 'and advancing, He took her,' &c. The beloved physician again is very specific: "And He stood over her," and lifted her up. This act of condescension, much felt doubtless by Peter, is recorded only by Mark, and immediately the fever left her, and she ministered unto them—preparing their Sabbath-meal; in token both of the perfectness and immediateness of the cure, and of her gratitude to the glorious Healer. 32. And at even, when the sun did set—so Matthew, 8. 16. Luke (4. 40) says it was setting. they brought unto him all that were diseased, and them that were possessed with devils—the demonized.' From Luke, 13. 14, we see how unlawful they would have deemed it to bring their sick to Jesus for a cure during the Sabbath hours. They waited, therefore, till these were over, and then brought them in crowds. Our Lord afterwards took repeated occasion to teach the people by example, even at the risk of His own life, how superstitious a straining of the Sabbath-rest this was. 33. And all the city was gathered together at the door—of Peter's house; i.e., the sick and those who brought them, and the wondering spectators. This bespeaks the presence of an eye-witness, and is one of those lively specimens of word-painting so frequent in this Gospel. 34. And he healed many that were sick of divers diseases, and cast out many devils. In Matthew, 8. 16, it is said, "He cast out the spirits with His word;" or rather, 'with a word'—a word of command. and suffered not the devils to speak, because they knew him. Evidently they would have spoken, if permitted, proclaiming His Messiahship in such terms as in the synagogue; but once in one day, and that testimony immediately silenced, was enough. See on v. 24. After this account of His miracles of healing, we have in Matthew, 8. 17, this pregnant quotation, "That it might be fulfilled which was spoken by Esaias the prophet, saying (52. 4), Himself took our infirmities, and bare our sicknesses." 35. And in the morning—i.e., of the day after this remarkable Sabbath; or, on the First day of the week. His choosing this day to inaugurate a new and glorious stage of His public work, should be noted by the reader, rising up a great while before day—"while it was yet night," or long before day-break, he went out—from Peter's house, where He slept, all unperceived, and departed into a solitary place, and there prayed—or, 'continued in prayer.' He was about to begin His first preaching and healing Circuit; and as on similar solemn occasions (Luke, 6. 10; 8. 12; 9. 18, 29; ch. 6. 46), He spent some time in special prayer, doubtless with a view to it. What would one not give to have been, during the stillness of those grey morning-hours, within hearing—not of His "strong crying and tears," for He had scarce arrived at the stage for that—but of His calm, exalted anticipations of the work which lay immediately before Him, and the outpourings of His soul about it into the bosom of Him that sent Him! He had doubtless enjoyed some uninterrupted hours of such communings with His heavenly Father ere His friends from Capernaum arrived in search of Him. As for them, they doubtless expected, after such a day of miracles, that the next day would witness similar manifestations. When morning came, Peter, loath to break in upon the repose of his glorious Guest, would await His appearance beyond the usual hour; but at length, wondering at the stillness, and gently coming to see where the Lord lay, he finds it—like the sepulchre afterwards—empty! Speedily a party is made up to go in search of Him, Peter naturally leading the way. 36. And Simon and they that were with him followed after him—rather, 'pressed after Him.' Luke (4. 42) says, "The multitudes sought after Him;" but this would be a party from the town. Mark, having his information from Peter himself, speaks only of what related directly to him. "They that were with him" would probably be Andrew his brother, James and John, with a few other choice brethren. 37. And when they had found him—evidently after some search. They said unto him, All men seek for thee. By this time, "the multitudes" who, according to Luke, "sought after Him"—and who, on going to Peter's house, and there learning that Peter and a few more were gone in search of Him, had set out on the same errand—would have arrived, and "came unto Him and stayed Him, that He should not depart from them" (Luke, 4. 42); all now urging His return to their impatient townsmen. 38. And he said unto them, Let us go—or, according to another reading, 'Let us go elsewhere.' into the next towns—rather, 'unto the neighbouring village-towns,' meaning those places intermediate between towns and villages, with which the western side of the sea of Galilee was studded, that I may preach there also; for therefore came I forth—not from Capernaum, as DE WETTE miserably interprets, nor from His privacy in the desert place, as MEYER, no better; but from the Father. Cf. John, 16. 29, "I came forth from the Father, and am come into the world," &c.—another proof, by the way, that the lofty phraseology of the Fourth Gospel was not unknown to the authors of the others, though their design and point of view are different. The language in which our Lord's reply is given by Luke (4. 43) expresses the high necessity under which, in this as in every other step of His work, He acted—"I must preach the kingdom of God to other cities also; for therefore"—or, 'to this end'—"am I sent." An act of self-denial it doubtless was, to resist such pleadings to return to Capernaum. But there were overwhelming considerations on the other side.

40-45. HEALING OF A LEPER. (=Matthew, 8. 1-4; Luke, 5. 12-16.) See on Matthew, 8. 1-4.

CHAPTER II.

Ver. 1-12. HEALING OF A PARALYTIC. (=Matthew, 9. 1-8; Luke, 5. 17-26.) This incident, as remarked on Matthew, 9. 1, appears to follow next in order of time after the cure of the Leper (ch. 1. 40-45). 1. And again he entered into Capernaum—"His own city" (Matthew, 9. 1), and it was noted that he was in the house—no doubt of Simon Peter (ch. 1. 29). 2. And straightway many were gathered together, inasmuch that there was no room to receive them, no, not so much as about the door. This is one of Mark's graphic touches. No doubt in this case, as the scene occurred at his informant's own door, these details are the vivid recollections of that honoured disciple. and he preached the word unto them—i.e., in-doors; but in the hearing, doubtless, of the multitude that pressed around. Had He gone forth, as He naturally would, the paralytic's faith would have had no such opportunity to display itself. Luke (5. 17) furnishes an additional and very important incident in the scene—as follows: "And it came to pass on a certain day, as He was teaching, that there were Pharisees and doctors of the law sitting by, which were come out of every town, or 'village,' of Galilee, and Judea, and Jerusalem." This was the highest testimony yet borne to our Lord's growing influence, and the necessity increasingly felt by the ecclesiastics throughout the country of coming to some definite judgment regarding Him. "And the power of the Lord was (present) to heal them"—or, 'was efficacious to heal them,' i.e., the sick that were brought before Him. So that the miracle that is now to be described was only the most glorious and worthy to be recorded of many then performed; and what made it so was doubtless the faith which was manifested in connection with it, and the proclamation of the forgiveness of the patient's sins that immediately preceded it. 3. And they came unto him—i.e., towards the house where He was, bringing one sick of the palsy—"lying on a bed" (Matthew, 9. 2), which was borne of four—a graphic particular of Mark only. 4. And when they could not come nigh unto him for the press—or, as in Luke, "when they could not find by what way they might bring him in because of the multitude," they "went upon the house-top"—the flat or terrace-roof, universal in eastern houses—and uncovered the roof where he was; and when they had broken it up, they let down the bed—or portable couch, wherein the sick of the palsy lay. Luke says, they "let him down through the tiling with his couch into the midst before Jesus." Their whole object was to bring the patient into the presence of Jesus; and this not being possible in the ordinary way, for the multitude that surrounded Him, they took for the very unusual method here described of accomplishing their object, and succeeded. Several explanations have been given of the way in which this was done; but unless we knew the precise plan of the house, and the part of it from which Jesus taught—which may have been a quadrangle or open court, within the buildings of which Peter's house was one, or a gallery covered by a verandah—it is impossible to determine precisely how the thing was done. One thing, however, is clear, that we have both the accounts from an eye-witness. 5. When Jesus saw their faith. It is remarkable that all the three narratives call it "their faith" which Jesus saw. That the patient himself had faith, we know from the prooned state as a believer. And yet, as the understood our Lord to be denouncing par- saying, and Jesus not only acknowledges ere right, but founds His whole argument rrectness of it, we must regard the saying roclamation of the man's forgiveness by om it belonged to dispense it; nor could of address be justified on any lower sup- ee on Luke, 7. 41, &c.) 6. But there were scribes—"and the Pharisees" (Luke, 8. 21), —those Jewish ecclesiastics who, as Luke as come out of every village of Galilee, and Jerusalem," to make their observa- this wonderful Person, in anything but spirit, though as yet their venomous and feeling had not showed itself; and reason- hearts. 7. Why doth this man thus speak who can forgive sins but God only? In this tion they expressed a great truth. (See s; Micah, 7. 18; Exodus, 34. 6, 7, &c.) Nor at question altogether unnatural, though F's sole case it was unfounded. That a appearance like one of themselves should rity and power to forgive sins, they could first blush of it, but regard as in the last line; nor were they entitled even to weigh a, as worthy of a hearing, save on suppo- dless evidence afforded by Him in sup- claim. CHAPTER IV.

Ver. 1-29. PARABLE OF THE SOWER—REASON FOR TEACHING IN PARABLES—PARABLE OF THE SEED (GROWING WE KNOW NOT HOW, AND OF THE MUSTARD SEED. =Matthew, 13. 1-23, 31, 32; Luke, 8. 4-18.) 1. And he began again to teach by the sea-side; and there was gathered unto him a great multitude—or, according to another well-supported reading, 'a mighty,' or 'immense multitude,' so that he entered into a ship—rather, 'into the ship,' meaning the one mentioned in ch. 3. 9. (See on Matthew, 12. 15.) and sat in the sea; and the whole multitude was by the sea on the land—crowded on the sea-shore to listen to Him. See on Matthew, 13. 1, 2. 2. And he taught them many things by parables, and said unto them in his doctrine—or 'teaching.'

Parable of the Sower (v. 3-9, 13-20). After this parable is recorded, the Evangelist says, v. 10. And when he was alone, they that were about him with the twelve—probably those who followed Him most closely and were firmest in discipleship, next to the Twelve, asked of him the parable. The reply would seem to intimate that this parable of the Sower was of that fundamental, comprehensive, and introductory character which we have assigned to it (see on Matthew, 13. 1). 13. Know ye not this parable? and how then will ye know all parables? Probably this was said not so much in the spirit of rebuke, as to call their attention to the exposition of it which He was about to give, and so train them to the right apprehension of His future parables. As in the parables which we have endeavoured to explain in Matthew, 13., we shall take this parable and the Lord's own his agents among men themselves; and Christ's agents in the sowing of the good seed are the preachers of the word. Thus, as in all the cases about to be described, the Sower is the same, and the seed is the same, while the result is entirely different, the whole difference must lie in the soils, which mean the different states of the human heart. And so, the great general lesson held forth in this parable of the Sower is, That however faithful the preacher, and how pure soever his message, the effect of the preaching of the word depends upon the state of the hearer's heart. Now follow the cases.

First Case: THE WAY-SIDE. 4. And it came to pass, as he sowed, some fell by the wayside—by the side of the hard path through the field, where the soil was not broken up; and the fowls (of the air) came and devoured it up. Not only could the seed not get beneath the surface, but "it was trodden down" (Luke, 8, 6), and afterwards picked up and devoured by the fowls. What means this? 15. And these are they by the way-side, where the word is sown; but, when they have heard, &c.—or, more fully, Matthew, 13, 19, "When any one heareth the word of the kingdom, and understandeth it not, then cometh the wicked one, and catcheth away that which was sown in his heart." The great truth here taught is, that Hearts all unbroken and hard are no fit soil for sowing truth. They apprehend it not (Matthew, 13, 19), as God's means of restoring them to Himself; it penetrates not, makes no impression, but lies loosely on the surface of the heart, till the wicked one—afraid of losing a victim by his "believing to salvation" (Luke, 8, 12)—finds some frivolous subject by whose greater attractions to draw off the attention, and straightway it is gone. Of how many hearers of the word is this and the lusts of other things entering in—or "asures of this life" (Luke, 8, 14), choke the way becometh unfruitful. First, "The cares of this—anxious, unrelaxing attention to the bus this present life; second, "The deceitful riches"—of those riches which are the fruit worldly "care;" third, "The pleasures of it or "the lusts of other things entering in"—thments, in themselves it may be innocent worldly prosperity enables one to indulge, "choke" or "smother" the word, drawing off of one's attention, absorbing so much of interest, and using up so much of one's tin only the dregs of these remain for spiritual, and a fagged, hurried, and heartless formal length all the religion of such persons. What picture is this of the mournful condition of especially in great commercial countries, w promised much fruit! "They bring no fruit fection" (Luke, 8, 14); indicating how much there may be, in the early stages of such a e promise of fruit—which after all never ripens.

Fourth Case: THE GOOD GROUND. 8. And on good ground, and did yield fruit, &c. The of this last soil consists in its qualities be cisely the reverse of the other three soils: f softness and tenderness, receiving and cheris seed; from its depth, allowing it to take fir and not quickly losing its moisture; and f cleanness, giving its whole vigour and sap plant. In such a soil the seed "brings forth fr all different degrees of profusion, accordi measure in which the soil possesses those qu So 20. was covered with the waves; BUT THIS IS TOO STRONG. It should be, 'so that the ship was getting covered by the waves.' So we must translate the word used in Luke (8. 23)—not as in our version—"And there came down a storm on the lake, and they were filled [with water]"—but 'they were getting filled,' i. e., those who sailed; meaning, of course, that their ship was so. 38. And he was in the hinder—or stern, part of the ship, asleep on a pillow—either a place in the vessel made to receive the head, or a cushion for the head to rest on. It was evening; and after the fatigues of a busy day of teaching under the hot sun, having nothing to do while crossing the lake, He sinks into a deep sleep, which even this tempest raging around and tossing the little vessel did not disturb. and they awake him, and say unto him, Master—or 'Teacher.' In Luke (8. 24) this is doubled—in token of their life-and-death-earnestness—"Master, Master." carest thou not that we perish? Unbelief and fear made them sadly forget their place, to speak so. Luke has it, "Lord, save us, we perish." When those accus- tomed to fish upon that deep thus spake, the danger must have been imminent. They say nothing of what would become of Him, if they perished; nor think whether, if He could not perish, it was likely He would let this happen to them; but they hardly know what they said. 39. And he arose, and rebuked the wind—"and the raging of the water" (Luke. 8. 24), and said unto the sea, Peace, be still—two sublime words of command, from a Master to His servants, the elements. And the wind ceased, and there was a great calm. The sudden hushing of the wind would not at once have calmed the sea, whose commotion would have settled only after a considerable time. But the word of command was given to both elements at once. 40. And he said unto them, Why are ye so fearful? There is a natural apprehension under danger; but there was unbelief in their fear. It is worth, of notice how considerably the Lord defers this rebuke till He had first removed the danger, in the midst of which they would not have been in a state to listen to anything. how is it that ye have no faith!—next to none, or none in present exercise. In Luke it is, "Why are ye fearful, O ye of little faith?" Faith they had, for they applied to Christ for relief; but little for they were afraid, though Christ was in the howling tempest, and we had to awake Him with the cry of our terror: but rising at our call, His majesty was felt by the raging elements, for they were instantly hushed—"WILK MANNER OF MAN IS THIS!"

CHAPTER V.

1. And they came over unto the other side of the sea, into the country of the Gadarenes. 2. And when he was come out of the ship, immediately (see v. 6) there met him a man with an unclean spirit—"which had devils for 'demons' long time" (Luke, 8:27). In Matthew (8:28), "there met Him two men possessed with devils." Though there be no discrepancy between these two statements—more than between two witnesses, one of whom testifies to something done by one person, while the other affirms that there were two—it is difficult to see how the principal details here given could apply to more than one case. 3. Who had his dwelling among the tombs. Luke says, "He ware no clothes, neither abode in any house." These tombs were hewn out of the rocky caves of the locality, and served for shelters and lurking places (Luke, 8:26). 4. Because that he had been often bound with fetters and chains, &c. Luke says (8:29) that "often times it (the unclean spirit) had caught him:" and after mentioning how they had vainly tried to bind him with chains and fetters, because "he brake the bands," he adds, "and was driven of the devil (or 'demon') into the wilderness." The dark tyrant-power by which he was held clothed him with super-human strength, and made him scorn restraint. Matthew (8:28) says he was "exceeding fierce, so that no man might pass by that way." He was the terror of the whole locality. 5. And always, night and day, he was in the mountains, and in the tombs, crying, and

And when Jesus was again by ship unto the other side—from the side of the lake, where He had parted with demoniac, to the west side, at Capernaum He gathered unto him—who "gladly received say were all waiting for Him" (Luke, 8. 40). and teaching of that day (ch. 4. 1. &c., and 2.) had only whetted the people's appetite; ointed, as would seem, that He had left a evening to cross the lake, they remain out the beach, having got a hint, probably me of His disciples, that He would be back evening. This was the right experiment at last. What had she "heard of Jesus?" No doubt it was His marvellous cures she had heard of; and the hearing of these, in connection with her bitter experience of the vanity of applying to any other, had been blessed to the kindling in her soul of a firm confidence that He who had so willingly wrought such cures on others was able and would not refuse to heal her also. In the press behind—shrinking, yet seeking, and touched his garment. According to the ceremonial law, the touch of any one having the disease which this woman had would have defiled the person touched. Some think that the recollection of this may account for her stealthily approaching Him in the crowd behind, and touching but the hem of His garment. But there was an instinct in the faith which brought her to Jesus, which taught her, that if that touch could set her free from the defiling disease itself, it was impossible to communicate defilement to Him, and that this wondrous Healer must be above such laws. 28. For she said—"within herself" (Matthew, 9. 21). If I may touch but his clothes, I shall be whole—i.e., if I may but come in contact with this glorious Healer at all. Remarkable faith this! 29. And straightway the fountain of her blood was dried up. Not only was "her issue of blood stanch'd" (Luke, 8. 44), but the cause of it was thoroughly removed, inasmuch that by her bodily sensations she immediately knew herself perfectly cured. 30. And Jesus immediately knowing in himself that virtue—or 'efficacy'—had gone out of him. He was conscious of the forth-going of His healing power, which was not—as in prophets and apostles—something foreign to Himself and imparted merely, but what He had dwelling within Him as "His own fulness." turned him about in the press—or 'crowd'—and said, Who touched my clothes? 31. And his disciples said unto him. Luke says (8. 46), "When all denied, Peter and they that were with Him, said, Master," Thou seest the multitude thronging thee, and sayest thou, Who touched me? 'Askest thou, Lord, who touched Thee? Rather ask who touched Thee not in such a throng.' "And Jesus said, Somebody hath touched me"—"a certain person hath touched Me," "for I perceive that virtue is gone out of Me" (Luke, 8. 46). Yes, the multitude but, as we shall presently see, to obtain from the healed one a testimony to what He had done for her. 33. But the woman, fearing and trembling, knowing what was done in her—alarmed, as a humble, shrinking female would naturally be, at the necessity of so public an exposure of herself, yet conscious that she had a tale to tell which would speak for her, came and fell down before him, and told him all the truth. In Luke (8. 47) it is, "When the woman saw that she was not hid, she came trembling, and falling down before Him, she declared unto Him before all the people for what cause she had touched Him, and how she was healed immediately." This, though it tried the modesty of the believing woman, was just what Christ wanted in dragging her forth, her public testimony to the facts of her case—the disease with her abortive efforts at a cure, and the instantaneous and perfect relief which her touching the Great Healer had brought her. 34. And he said unto her, Daughter—"be of good comfort" (Luke, 8. 48), thy faith hath made thee whole; go in peace, and be whole of thy plagues. Though healed as soon as she believed, it seemed to her a stolen cure—she feared to acknowledge it. Jesus therefore sets His royal seal upon it. But what a glorious dismissal from the lips of Him who is "our Peace" is that "Go in peace!"

Jairus' Daughter Raised to Life (v. 35-43). 35. Thy daughter is dead: why troublest thou the Master—the Teacher—any further? 36. he saith unto the ruler of the synagogue, Be not afraid, only believe. Jesus knowing how the heart of the agonized father would sink at the tidings, and the reflections at the delay which would be apt to rise in his mind, hastens to reassure him, and in His accustomed style: "Be not afraid, only believe"—words of unchanging preciousness and power! How vividly do such incidents bring out Christ's knowledge of the human heart and tender sympathy! (Hebrews, 4. 15.). 37. And he suffered no man to follow him, save Peter, and James, and John the brother of James. See on ch. 1. 29. 38. And he cometh—rather 'they come'—to the house of the ruler of the synagogue, and seeth the tumult, and them that wept and wailed greatly—"the minstrels and the people making a noise" (Matthew, 9. 23)—lamenting for the dead. (See 2 Chronicles, 36. 26; Jeremiah, 9. 20; Ainos, 6. 16.) 39. And when he was come in, he saith unto them, Why make ye this ado, and weep? the damsel is not dead, but sleepeth—so brief her state of death as to be more like a short sleep. 40. And they laughed him to scorn—rather, simply, 'laughed at him'—"knowing that she was dead" (Luke, 8. 53): an important testimony this to the reality of her death. But when he had put them all out. The word is strong—"when he had put, or 'turned them all out,' meaning all those who were making this noise, and any others that may have been there from sympathy, that only those might be present who were most nearly concerned, and those whom He had Himself brought as witnesses of the great act about to be done. He taketh the father and the mother of the damsel, and them that were with him (Peter, and James, and John), and entereth in where the damsel was lying. 41. And he took the damsel by the hand—as He did Peter's mother-in-law (ch. 1. 31)—and said unto her, Talitha cumi. The words are Aramaic, or Syro-Chaladic, the then language of Palestine. Mark loves to give such wonderful words just as they were spoken. See ch. 7. 34; 14. 36. 42. And straightway the damsel. The word here is different from that in v. 29, 40, 41, and signifies 'young maiden,' or 'little girl,' arose, and walked—a vivid touch evidently from an eye-witness—for she was of the age of twelve years. And they were astonished with a great astonishment. The language here is the strongest. 43. And he charged them straitly—or strictly, that no man should know it. The only reason we can assign for this is His desire not to let the public feeling regarding Him come too precipitately to a crisis, and commanded that something should be given her to eat—in token of perfect restoration.

Herod's View of Christ (c. 14-16). 14. And king Herod—i.e., Herod Antipas, one of the three sons of Herod the Great, and older brother of Archelaus (Matthew, 2. 23, who ruled as Ethnarch over Galilee and Perea, heard of him; for his name was spread abroad; and he said—"unto his servants" (Matthew, 14. 2), his counsellors or court-ministers, That John the Baptist was risen from the dead. The murdered prophet haunted his guilty breast like a spectre, and seemed to him alive again and clothed with unearthly powers, in the person of Jesus. 15. Others said, That it is Elias. And others, That it is a prophet, or as one of the prophets. See on Matthew, 16. 14. 16. But when Herod heard thereof, he said, It is John, whom I beheaded: he is risen from the dead—"Himself has risen": as if the innocence and sanctity of his faithful reprobator had not suffered that he should lie long dead.

Account of the Baptist's Imprisonment and Death (c. 17-20). 17. For Herod himself had sent forth, and laid hold upon John, and bound him in prison—in the castle of Machærus, near the southern extremity of Herod's dominions, and adjoining the Dead Sea. (JOSEPHUS, Antiquities, 18. 5. 2, for Herodias' sake. She was the grand-daughter of Herod the Great, his brother Philip's wife—and therefore the niece of both brothers. This Philip, however, was not the tetrarch of that name mentioned in Luke, 3. 1 (see there), but one whose distinctive name was 'Herod Philip,' another son of Herod the Great, who was disinherited by his father. Herod Antipas' own wife was the daughter of Aretas, king of Arabia; but he prevailed on Herodias, his half-brother Philip's wife, to forsake her husband and live with him, on condition, says JOSEPHUS (Antiquities, 18. 5. 1), that he should put away his own wife. This involved him afterwards in war with Aretas, who totally defeated him and destroyed his army, from the effects of which he was never able to recover himself. 18. For John had said unto Herod, It is not lawful for thee to have thy brother's wife. Noble fidelity! It was not lawful, because Herod's wife and Herodias' husband were both living; and further, because the parties were within the forbidden degrees of consanguinity (see Leviticus, 20. 21); Herodias being the daughter of Aristobolus, the brother of both Herod and Philip (JOSEPHUS, 18. 5. 4). 19. Therefore Herodias had a quarrel against him—rather, as in the margin, 'had a grudge against him.' Probably she was too proud to speak to him; still less would she quarrel with him, and would have killed him; but she could not: 20. For Herod feared John—but, as BENOEZ notes, John feared not Herod, knowing that he was a just man and an holy. Cf. the case of Elijah with Ahab, after the murder of Naboth (1 Kings, 21. 20), and observed him—rather, as in the margin, 'kept' or 'saved him,' i.e., from the wicked designs of Herodias, who had been watching for some pretext to get Herod entangled and committed to despatch him, and when she heard him, he did many things—many good things under the influence of the Baptist on his conscience; and heard him gladly—a striking statement this, for which we are indebted aphic Evangelist alone; illustrating the contrary principles in the slaves of passion only shows how far Herodias must fight upon him, as Jezebel upon Ahab, that at length agree to what his awakened conscience long from executing. 21. And when that day (for the purposes of Herodias) was Herod—rather, 'A convenient day being a Herod,' on his birth day, made a supper to high captains, and chief (estates) of Galilee. The minuteness of detail adds much to the tragic narrative. 22. And when the said Herodias—i.e., her daughter by husband, Herod Philip; Her name was SEPHUS, Ib.) came in, and danced, and seduced them that sat with him, the king said unto her—'the girl' (See on ch. 6. 43.) Ask of me thou wilt, and I will give it thee. 23. The king, so called, but only by courtesy (see verse unto her. Whosoever thou shalt ask of a half of my kingdom. Those in whom passion have destroyed self-command will in its moment say and do what in their cool they bitterly regret. 24. And she said, The Baptist. Abandoned women are more and heartless than men. The Baptist's word the pleasures of Herodias, and this offered an opportunity of getting rid of him. 25. I will that thou give me by and by—'in a charger—or large flat 'trencher' of John the Baptist. 26. And the king was sorry. With his feelings regarding John, the king so told upon his conscience from her's lips, and after so often and carefully from his paramour's gaze, it must have ailing to find himself at length entrapped; rash folly, yet for his sake. See if no principle, but troublesome conscience, at breaking a rash oath, while yielding to passion of the worst crimes! and for their sake sat with him—under the influence of that oath, which could not brook being thought of with religious or moral scruples. To do this has proved a fatal snare! he would regret. 27. And immediately the king sent an officer—one of the guards in attendance. The man, denoting one of the Imperial Guard, ordered his head to be brought; and he went and was in the prison—after, it would seem, more than months' imprisonment. Blessed martyr! cheerless was the end reserved for thee: on hast thy Master's benediction, "Blessed never shall not be offended in Me" (Matthew, 23. 12). But where are they in whose hands thy blood? 28. And brought his head and gave it to the damsel; and the damsel gave it to Herodias; and she did shed the blood of reprover; she only got it done, and then regret it, as it streamed from the trunkless head. And when his disciples heard of it—i.e., the seven disciples, they came and took up his head and laid it in a tomb—'and went and told the brethren, 14. 12. If these disciples had, up to now, stood apart from Him, as adherents of the law, 11. 2, perhaps they now came to without some secret reflection on Him for neglect of their master; but perhaps, too, to cast in their lot henceforth with the apostles. How Jesus felt, or what He said, regarding this intelligence, is not recorded; but in it was said, as He stood by the grave of Lazarus, "Jesus wept," was not likely much intelligence without deep emotion. Reason why He might not be unwilling that a small body of John's disciples should cling to him to the last, might be to provide some attached friends who should do for his precious body, on a small scale, what was afterwards to be done for His own.

Five Thousand Miraculously Fed (v. 30-44). 30. And the apostles gathered themselves together—probably at Capernaum, on returning from their mission (v. 7-13)—and told him all things, both what they had done, and what they had taught. Observe the various reasons He had for crossing to the other side. First, Matthew (14. 13) says, that "when Jesus heard" of the murder of His faithful forerunner—from those attached disciples of his who had taken up his body and laid it in a sepulchre (see on v. 20)—"He departed by ship unto a desert place apart;" either to avoid some apprehended consequences to Himself, arising from the Baptist's death (Matthew, 10. 23), or more probably to be able to indulge in those feelings which that affecting event had doubtless awakened, and to which the bustle of the multitude around Him was very unfavourable. Next, since He must have heard the report of the Twelve with the deepest interest, and probably with something of the emotion which He experienced on the return of the Seventy (see on Luke, 10. 17-23). He sought privacy for undisturbed reflection on this begun preaching and progress of His kingdom. (Once more, He was wearied with the multitude of "comers and goers"—depriving Him even of leisure enough to take His food—and wanted rest: "Come ye yourselves apart into a desert place, and rest a while," &c. Under the combined influence of all these considerations, our Lord sought this change. 32. And they departed into a desert place by ship privately—"over the sea of Galilee, which is the sea of Tiberias," says John (6. 1), the only one of the Evangelists who so fully describes it; the others having written when their readers were supposed to know something of it, while the last wrote for those at a greater distance of time and place. This "desert place" is more definitely described by Luke (9. 10) as "belonging to the city called Bethsaida." This must not be confounded with the town so called on the western side of the lake (see on Matthew, 11. 21). This town lay on its north-eastern side, near where the Jordan empties itself into it; in Gaulonitis, out of the dominions of Herod Antipas, and within the dominions of Philip the Tetrarch (Luke, 3. 1), who raised it from a village to a city, and called it Julias, in honour of Julia, the daughter of Augustus (Josephus, Antiquities, 18. 2. 1). 33. And the people—the multitudes—saw them departing, and many knew him. The true reading would seem to be: "And many saw them departing, and knew or recognised them!"—and ran afoot. Here, perhaps, it should be rendered "by land"—running round by the head of the lake, and taking one of the fords of the river, so as to meet Jesus, who was crossing with the Twelve by ship, thither out of all cities, and overtook them—got before them, and came together unto him. How exceedingly graphic is this! every touch of it betokening the presence of an eye-witness. John (6. 3) says, that "Jesus went up into a mountain"—somewhere in that hill range, the green table-land which skirts the eastern side of the lake. 34. And Jesus, when he came out of the ship—'having gone on shore.' saw much people—a great multitude, and was moved with compassion toward them, because they were as sheep not having a shepherd. At the sight of the multitudes who had followed Him by land and even got before Him, He was so moved, as was His wont in such cases, with compassion, because they were like shepherdless sheep, as to forego both privacy and rest that He might minister to them. Here we have an important piece of information from the Fourth Evangelist (John, 6, 4). "And the passover, a feast of the Jews, was nigh"—rather, 'Now the passover, the feast of the Jews, was nigh.' This accounts for the multitudes that now crowded around Him. They were on their way to keep that festival at Jerusalem. But Jesus did not go up to this festival, as John expressly tells us (ch. 7, 1)—remaining in Galilee, because the ruling Jews sought to kill Him. 35. And when the day was now far spent—"began to wear away" or "decline," says Luke (8, 12). Matthew (14, 16) says, "when it was evening;" and yet he mentions a later evening of the same day (v. 23). This earlier evening began at three o'clock P.M.; the later began at sunset. 36. Send them away, that they may go into the country round about, and into the villages, and buy themselves bread: for they have nothing to eat. John tells us (6, 5, 6) that "Jesus said to Philip, Whence shall we buy bread, that these may eat? (And this He said to prove him: for He Himself knew what He would do.)" The subject may have been introduced by some remark of the disciples; but the precise order and form of what was said by each can hardly be gathered with precision, nor is it of any importance. 37. He answered and said unto them, "They need not depart" (Matthew, 14, 16). Give ye them to eat—doubtless said to prepare them for what was to follow. And they say unto him, Shall we go and buy two hundred pennyworth of bread, and give them to eat? "Philip answered Him, Two hundred pennyworth of bread is not sufficient for them, that every one of them may take a little" (John, 6, 7). 38. He saith unto them, How many loaves have ye? go and see. And when they know, they say, Five, and two fishes. John is more precise and full. "One of his disciples, Andrew, Simon Peter's brother, saith unto Him, There is a lad here which hath five barley loaves and two small fishes; but what are they among so many?" (John, 6, 8, 9) Probably this was the whole stock of provisions then at the command of the disciples—no more than enough for one meal to them—and entrusted for the time to this lad. "He said, Bring them hither to me" (Matthew, 14, 18). 39. And he commanded them to make all sit down by companies upon the green grass—or "green hay;" the rank grass of those bushy wastes. For, as John (6, 10) notes, "there was much grass in the place." 40. And they sat down in ranks, by hundreds, and by fifties. Doubtless this was to show at a glance the number fed, and to enable all to witness in an orderly manner this glorious miracle. 41. And when he had taken the five loaves and the two fishes, he looked up to heaven. Thus would the most distant of them see distinctly what He was doing, and blessed. John says, "And when He had given thanks." The sense is the same. This thanksgiving for the meat, and benediction of it as the food of thousands, was the crisis of the miracle, and broke the loaves, and gave them to his disciples to set before them—thus virtually holding forth these men as His future ministers, and the two fishes divided he among them all. 42. And they did all eat, and were filled. All the four Evangelists mention this; and John (6, 11) adds, "and likewise of the fishes, as much as they would"—to show that vast as was the multitude, and scanty the provisions, the meal to each and all of them was a plentiful one. "When they were filled, He said unto His disciples, Gather up the fragments that remain, that nothing be lost" (John, 6, 12). This was designed to bring out the whole extent of the miracle. 43. And they took up twelve baskets full of the fragments, and of the fishes. "Therefore (says John, 6, 13), they gathered them together, and filled twelve baskets with the fragments of the five barley loaves, which remained over and above unto them that had eaten." The article here rendered "baskets" in all the four narratives was part of the luggage taken by Jews on a journey—to carry, it is said, both their provisions and hay to sleep on, that they might not have to depend on Gentiles, and so run the risk of ceremonial pollution. In this we have a striking corroboration of the truth of the four narratives. Internal evidence renders it clear, we think, that the first three Evangelists wrote independently of each other, though the fourth must have seen all the others. But here, each of the first three Evangelists uses the same word to express the apparently insignificant circumstance, that the baskets employed to gather up the fragments were of the kind which even the Roman satirist JUVENAL, knew by the name of capitanea; while in both the narratives of the feeding of the Four Thousand the baskets used are expressly said to have been of the kind called spuria. (See on ch. 8, 12, 30.) 44. And they that did eat of the loaves were (about) five thousand men—"besides women and children" (Matthew, 14, 21). Of these, however, there would probably not be many; as only the males were obliged to go to the approaching festival.

Jesus Re-crosses to the Western Side of the Lake, Walking on the Sea (v. 45-50). One very important particular given by John alone (6, 15) introduces this portion: "When Jesus therefore perceived that they would take Him by force, to make Him a king, He departed again into a mountain Himself alone." 45. And straightway he constrained his disciples to get into the ship, and to go to the other side before—Him—unto Bethsaida—Bethsaida of Galilee (John, 12, 21). John says they "went over the sea towards Capernaum"—the wind, probably, occasioning this slight deviation from the direction of Bethsaida, while he sent away the people—the multitude." His object in this was to put an end to the misdirected excitement in His favour (John, 6, 15), into which the disciples themselves may have been somewhat drawn. The word "constrained" implies reluctance on their part, perhaps from unwillingness to part with their Master and embark at night, leaving Him alone on the mountain. 46. And when he had sent them away, he departed into a mountain to pray—thus at length getting that privacy and rest which He had vainly sought during the earlier part of the day; opportunity also to pour out His soul in connection with the extraordinary excitement in His favour that evening—which appears to have marked the zenith of His reputation, for it began to decline the very next day; and a place whence He might watch the disciples on the lake, pray for them in their extrinuity, and observe the right time for coming to them, in a new manifestation of His glory, on the sea. 47. And when even was come—the latter evening (see on v. 35). It had come even when the disciples embarked (Matthew, 14, 22; John, 6, 16), the ship was in the midst of the sea, and he alone on the land. John says (6, 17), "It was now dark, and Jesus was not come to them." Perhaps they made no great effort to push across at first, having a lingering hope that their Master would yet join them, and so allowed the darkness to come on. "And the sea arose (told the beloved disciple, 6, 18), by reason of a great wind that blew." 48. And he saw them toiling in rowing; for the wind was contrary to them—putting forth all their strength to buffet the waves and bear on against a head-wind, but to little effect. He "saw" this from His mountain-top, and through the darkness of the night, for His heart was all with them: yet would He not go to their relief till His own time came. And about the fourth watch of the night, the Jews, who used to divide the night into three watches, latterly adopted the Roman division into four watches, as here. So that, if the rate of three hours to each, the fourth watch, reckoning from six P.M., would be three o'clock in the morning. "So when they had rowed about five or twenty or thirty furlongs" (John, 6, 19)—rather more than half-way across. The lake is about seven miles broad at its widest part. So that in eight or ten hours they had only made some three and a-half miles. By this time, therefore, they must have been in a state of exhaustion and despondency bordering on despair; and now at length, having tried their best enough, he cometh unto them, walking upon the sea—"and drawing nigh unto the ship" (John, 6, 19). It would have passed by them—but only in the sense of Luke, 24, 25; Genesis, 32, 30; cf. Genesis, 18, 3, 5; 42, 7. But when they saw him walking upon the sea, they supposed it had been a spirit, and cried out—"for fear" Matthew, 14, 26. He would appear to them at first like a dark moving speck upon the waters; then as a vague figure; but in the dark tempestuous sky, and as dreading that it could be their Lord, they take it for a spirit. Cf. Luke, 24, 37, 50. For they all saw him, and were troubled. And immediately he talked with them, and said unto them, Be of good cheer: It is I; be not afraid, here is something in these two little words—given by Matthew, Mark, and John—"This I," which from its mouth that spake it and the circumstances in which it was uttered, passes the power of language to express. Here were they in the midst of a raging sea, their little bark the sport of the elements, and with as much of light to desecrate an object on the waters as high only aggravated their fears. But Jesus deems enough to dispel all apprehension to let them know that He was there. From other lips that "I am" could have merely meant that the person speaking as such a one and not another person. That, surely, could have done little to calm the fears of men existing every minute, it may be, to go to the bottom. It spoken by One who at that moment was "treading upon the waves of the sea," and was about to dash the raging elements with His word, what was it that the Voice which cried of old in the ears of Israel, even from the days of Moses, "I AM;" "I, EVEN I, & HE!" Cf. John, 18, 5, 6; 8, 58. Now, that word "made flesh, and dwells among us," uttering itself on beside us in dear familiar tones—"It is the Voice of my Beloved!" How far was this apprehended by the frightened disciples? There was one, we know, the boat who outstripped all the rest in susceptibility to such sublime appeals. It was not the depressed writer of the Fourth Gospel, who, though he used to soar beyond all the apostles, was as yet too young for prominence, and all unripe. It was Simon-peter. Here follows a very remarkable and instructive episode, recorded by Matthew alone:—Peter ventures to Walk upon the Sea (Matthew, 14, 29, 30). "And Peter answered Him, and said, Lord, if thou wilt, bid me come unto thee on the water:" "It let me, but 'give me the word of command'—'command,' or 'order me to come unto Thee upon the waters.'" "And He said, Come." Sublime word, issuing from One conscious of power over the living element, to bid it serve both Himself and himsoever else He pleased! "And when Peter was some down out of the ship, he walked upon the water"—"waters"—"to come to Jesus." "It was a old spirit," says BISHOP HALL, "that could wish it, more bold that could act it—not fearing either the softness or the roughness of that uncouth passage." 30. "But when he saw the wind boisterous, he was afraid; and beginning to sink, he cried, saying, Lord, save me." The wind was as boisterous before, but Peter "saw" it not; seeing only the power of Christ, in the lively exercise of faith. Now he "sees" the fury of the elements, and immediately the power of Christ to bear him up fades before his view, and this makes him "afraid"—as how could he be otherwise, without any felt power to keep him up? He then "begins to sink;" and finally, conscious that his experiment had failed, he casts himself, in a sort of desperate confidence, upon his "Lord" for deliverance! 31. "And immediately Jesus stretched forth His hand, and caught him, and said unto him, O thou of little faith, wherefore didst thou doubt?" This rebuke was not administered while Peter was sinking, nor till Christ had him by the hand; first re-invigorating his faith and then with it enabling him again to walk upon the crested wave. Bootless else had been this loving reproof, which owns the faith that had ventured on the deep upon the bare word of Christ, but asks why that distrust which so quickly marred it? 32. "And when they were come into the ship (Jesus and Peter), the wind ceased." 51. And he went up unto them into the ship. John (6, 21) says, "Then they willingly received him into the ship"—or rather, "Then were they willing to receive Him" (with reference to their previous terror); but implying also a glad welcome, their first fears now converted into wonder and delight. "And immediately," adds the beloved disciple, "they were at the land whither they went," or 'were bound.' This additional miracle, for as such it is manifestly related, is recorded by the Fourth Evangelist alone. As the storm was suddenly calmed, so the little bark—propelled by the secret power of the Lord of nature now sailing in it—glided through the now unruffled waters, and, while they were wrapt in wonder at what had happened, not heeding their rapid motion, was found at port, to their still further surprise.

"Then are they glad, because at rest

And quiet now they be;

So to the haven He them brings

Which they desired to see."

Matthew (14, 33) says, "Then they that were in the ship came (i.e., ere they got to land) and worshipped him, saying, Of a truth Thou art the Son of God." But our Evangelist is wonderfully striking, and the wind ceased; and they were sore amazed in themselves beyond measure, and wondered. The Evangelist seems hardly to find language strong enough to express their astonishment. 52. For they considered not the miracle of the leaves; for their heart was hardened. What a singular statement! The meaning seems to be that if they had but "considered (or reflected upon) the miracle of the leaves," wrought but a few hours before, they would have wondered at nothing which He might do within the whole circle of power and grace.

Incidents on Landing (v. 53-59). The details here are given with a rich vividness quite peculiar to this charming Gospel. 53. And when they had passed over, they came into the land of Gennesaret—from which the lake sometimes takes its name, stretching along its western shore. Capernaum was their landing-place (John, 6, 24, 25), and drew to the shore—a nautical phrase, nowhere else used in the New Testament. 54. And when they were come out of the ship, straightway they knew him—"immediately they recognised Him;" i.e., the people did. 55. and began to carry about in beds those that were sick, where they heard he was. At this period of our Lord's ministry the popular enthusiasm in His favour was at its height.

56. and besought him that they might touch if it were but the border of his garment—having heard, no doubt, of what the woman with the issue of blood experienced on doing so (ch. 5, 25-29), and perhaps of other unrecorded cases of the same nature, and as many as touched [him]—or 'it'—the border of His garment, were made whole. All this they continued to do and to experience while our Lord was in that region. The time corresponds to that mentioned (John, 7, 1), when He "walked in Galilee," instead of appearing in Jerusalem at the Passover, "because the Jews," i.e., the rulers, "sought to kill Him"—while the people sought to enthroned Him!

CHAPTER VII.

VER. 1-23. DISCOURSE ON CEREMONIAL POLLUTION. (=Matthew, 15, 1-20.) See op Matthew, 15, 1-20.

24-37. THE SYROPHENICIAN WOMAN AND HER DAUGHTER—A DEAF AND DUMB MAN HEALED. (=Matthew, 15, 21-31.)

The Syrophenician Woman and her Daughter (v. 24-30). The first words of this narrative show that the incident followed, in point of time, immediately on what precedes it. 24. And from thence he arose, and went into, or 'unto,' the borders of Tyre and Sidon—the two great Phœnician sea-ports, but here denoting the territory generally, to the frontiers of which Jesus now came. But did Jesus actually enter this heathen territory? The whole narrative, we think, proceeds upon the supposition that He did. His immediate object seems to have been to avoid the wrath of the Pharisees at the withering exposure He had just made of their traditional religion, and entered into an house, and would have no man know it—because He had not come there to minister to heathens. But though not, sent but to the lost sheep of the house of Israel" (Matthew, 15, 24). He hindered not the lost sheep of the vast Gentile world from coming to Him, nor put them away when they did come—as this incident was designed to show, but he could not be hid. Christ's fame had early spread from Galilee to this very region (ch. 3, 8; Luke, 6, 17). 25. For a certain woman, whose young daughter had an unclean spirit—or, as in Matthew, "was badly demonized," heard of him—one wonders how; but distress is quick of hearing; and fell at his feet: 26. The woman was a Greek—i.e., 'a Gentile,' as in the margin; a Syrophenician by nation—so called as inhabiting the Phœnician tract of Syria. JUVENAL uses the same term, as was remarked by JUSTIN MARTYR and TERTULLIAN. Matthew calls her "a woman of Canaan"—a more intelligible description to his Jewish readers (cf. Judges, 1, 30, 32, 33), and she besought him that he would cast forth the devil out of her daughter—"She cried unto him, saying, Have mercy on me, O Lord, Son of David; my daughter is grievously vexed with a devil" (Matthew, 15, 25). Thus, though no Israelite herself, she salutes Him as Israel's promised Messiah. Here we must go to Matthew, 15, 23-25, for some important links in the dialogue omitted by our Evangelist. 23. "But he answered her not a word." The design of this was first, perhaps, to show that He was not sent to such as she. He had said expressly to the Twelve, "Go not into the way of the Gentiles" (Matthew, 10, 5); and being now amongst them Himself, He would, for consistency's sake, let it be seen that He had not gone thither for missionary purposes. Therefore He not only kept silence, but had actually left the house and—as will presently appear—was proceeding on His way back, when this woman accosted Him. But another reason for keeping silence plainly was to try and to whet her faith, patience, and perseverance. And it had the desired effect: "She cried after them," which shows that He was already on His way from the place. "And His disciples came and besought Him, saying, Send her away; for she crieth after us." They thought her troublesome with her importunate cries, just as they did the people who brought young children to be blessed of Him, and they ask their Lord to "send her away," i.e., to grant her request and be rid of her; for we gather from His reply that they meant to solicit favour for her, though not for her sake so much as their own. 24. "But He answered and said, I am not sent but unto the lost sheep of the house of Israel"—a speech evidently intended for the disciples themselves, to satisfy them that, though the grace He was about to show to this Gentile believer was beyond His strict commission, He had not gone spontaneously to dispense it. Yet did even this speech open a gleam of hope, could she have discerned it. For thus might she have spoken: 'I am not sent, did He say? Truth, Lord, Thou comest not hither in quest of us, but I come in quest of Thee; and must I go empty away? So did not the woman of Samaria, whom when Thou foundest her on Thy way to Galilee, Thou sentest away to make many rich? But this our poor Myrophenician could not attain to. What, then, can she answer to such a speech? Nothing. She has reached her lowest depth, her darkest moment; she will just utter her last cry: 25. "Then came she and worshipped Him, saying, Lord, help me!" This appeal, so artless, wrung from the depths of a believing heart, and reminding us of the Publican's "God be merciful to me a sinner," moved the Redeemer at last to break silence—but in what style? Here we return to our own Evangelist. 27. But Jesus said unto her, Let the children first be filled. 'Is there hope for me here?' 'Filled first?' 'Then my turn, it seems, is coming!—but then, "THE CHILDREN first!" Ah! when, on that rule, shall my turn ever come? But ere she has time for these ponderings of His word, another word comes to supplement it, for it is not meet to take the children's bread, and to cast it unto the dogs. Is this the death of her hopes? Nay, but it is life from the dead. Out of the eater shall come forth meat (Judges, 14, 14). At evening time it shall be light (Zechariah, 14, 7). 'Hail! I have it now. Had He kept silence, what could I have done but go unblest? but He hath spoken, and the victory is mine.' 28. And she answered and said unto him, Yes, Lord—or, as the same word is rendered in Matthew, 15, 27, "Truth, Lord," yet the dogs eat of the children's crumbs—"which fall from their master's table" (Matthew). 'I thank Thee, O blessed One, for that word! That's my whole case. Not of the children? True. A dog? True also: Yet the dogs under the table are allowed to eat of the children's crumbs—the droppings from their master's full table: Give me that, and I am content: One crumb of power and grace from Thy table shall cast the devil out of my daughter.' O what lightning-quickness, what reach of instinctive ingenuity, do we behold in this heathen woman! 29. And he said unto her—"O woman, great is thy faith" (Matthew, 15, 28). As BENJEL beautifully remarks, Jesus "marvelled" only at two things—faith and unbelief (see on Luke, 7, 9). For this saying go thy way; the devil is gone out of thy daughter. That moment the deed was done. 30. And when she was come to her house, she found the devil gone out, and her daughter laid upon the bed. But Matthew is more specific: "And her daughter was made whole from that very hour." The wonderfulness of this case in all its features has been felt in every age of the Church, and the balm it has administered, and will yet administer, to millions will be known only in that day that shall reveal the secrets of all hearts.

Deaf and Dumb Man Healed (v. 31-37). 31. And again, departing from the coasts of Tyre and Sidon, he of Galilee—or, according to what has to be regarded as the true text, departing from the coasts of Tyre, Sidon to the sea of Galilee.' The of this reading, though not the most sightly, while the versions agreeing are the most ancient; and all the and commentators adopt it. In understand that our Lord, having the Holy Land the length of Tyre, north as Sidon, though without as appears, in those parts, and steps in a south-easterly direction. y a difficulty in the supposition of without any missionary object; and this sufficient to cast the balance veolved reading. Be this as it may, these coasts of Tyre, He passed of the coasts—or frontiers—of Deca-Jordan, therefore, and approaching side. Here Matthew, who omits cure of this deaf and dumb man, particulars, from which we learn one of a great number. "And Evangelist (15. 29-31), "departed came nigh unto the sea of Galilee, a mountain"—the mountain-range on the north-east, in Decapolis; ludes came unto Him, having with dumb, maimed"—not 'mutilated,' onary sense of the word, but 'de-ay others, and cast them down at e healed them: inasmuch that the e multitudes"—"wondered, when mb to speak, the maimed to e to walk, and the blind to see; and d God of Israel"—who, after so long eence of visible manifestation, had s His people as of old (cf. Luke. is it not clear from the Evangelist's e people saw into the claims of Jesus. es Mark here singles out one, whose e peculiar in it. 32. And they bring was deaf. . . and they beseech him to im. And looking up e acknowledging His Father, even was seen to flow from Himself e, he signed—"over the wreck," says e sin had brought about, and the eved in deforming the fair features of eation." But, we take it, there was ul impression of that "evil thing and bitter" whence all our ills have sprung, and which, when "Himself took our infirmities and bare our sicknesses" (Matthew, 8. 17), became mysteriously His own.

"In thought of these His brows benign, Not even in healing, doubtless shine."—Kabb.

and saith unto him, Ephphatha, that is, Be opened. Our Evangelist, as remarked on ch. 8. 41, loves to give such wonderful words just as they were spoken. 35. And straightway his ears were opened. This is mentioned first, as the source of the other derangement, and the string of his tongue was loosed, and he spake plain. The cure was thus alike instantaneous and perfect. 36. And he charged them that they should tell no man. Into this very region He had sent the man out of whom had been cast the legion of devils, to proclaim "what the Lord had done for him" (ch. 8. 19). Now He will have them "tell no man." But in the former case there was no danger of obstructing His ministry by "blazing the matter" (ch. 1. 45), as He Himself had left the region; whereas now He was sojourning in it, but the more he charged them, so much the more a great deal they published it. They could not be restrained; nay, the prohibition seemed only to whet their determination to publish His fame. 37. And were beyond measure astonished, saying, He hath done all things well—reminding us, says TRENCH, of the words of the first creation (Genesis, 1. 31, LXX.), upon which we are thus not unsuitably thrown back, for Christ's work is in the truest sense "a new creation." he maketh both the deaf to hear, and the dumb to speak—"and they glorified the God of Israel" (Matthew, 15. 31). See on p. 31 of this chapter.

CHAPTER VIII.

VER. 1-26. FOUR THOUSAND MIRACULOUSLY FED—A SIGN FROM HEAVEN SOUGHT AND REFUSED—THE LEAVENS OF THE PHARISEES AND SADDUCEES—A BLIND MAN AT BETHSAIDA RESTORED TO SIGHT. (=Matthew, 15. 32-16. 12.) This Section of miscellaneous matter evidently follows the preceding one in point of time, as will be seen by observing how it is introduced by Matthew.

Feeding of the Four Thousand (v. 1-9). 1. In those days the multitude being very great. . . 2. I have compassion on the multitude—an expression of that deep emotion in the Redeemer's heart which always preceded some remarkable interposition for relief. (See Matthew, 14. 14; 20. 34; Mark, 1. 41; Luke, 7. 13; also Matthew, 9. 36, before the mission of the Twelve; cf. Judges, 2. 18; 10. 16.) because they have now been with me, in constant attendance, three days, and have nothing to eat: 3. And if I send them away fasting to their own houses, they will faint by the way. In their eagerness they seem not to have thought of the need of provisions for such a length of time; but the Lord thought of it. In Matthew (15. 32) it is, "I will not send them away fasting"—or rather, "To send them away fasting I am unwilling." 4. From whence can a man satisfy these men with bread here in the wilderness? Though the question here is the same as when He fed the five thousand, they evidently now meant no more by it than that they had not the means of feeding the multitude; modestly leaving the Lord to decide what was to be done. And this will the more appear from His not now trying them, as before, by saying, "They need not depart, give ye them to eat;" but simply asking what they had, and then giving His directions. 5. And he asked them, How many loaves have ye? And they said, Seven. It was important in this case, as in the former, that the precise number of the loaves should be brought out. Thus also does the distinctness of the two miracles appear. 9. And they that had eaten were about four thousand; and he sent them away. Had not our Lord distinctly referred, in this very chapter and in two successive sentences to the feeding of the Five and of the Four Thousand, as two distinct miracles, many critics would have insisted that they were but two different representations of one and the same miracle, as they do of the two expulsions of the buyers and sellers from the temple, at the beginning and end of our Lord's ministry. But even in spite of what our Lord says, it is painful to find such men as NEANDER endeavouring to identify the two miracles. The localities, though both on the eastern side of the lake, were different: the time was different: the preceding and following circumstances were different: the period during which the people continued fasting was different—in the one case not one entire day, in the other three days: the number fed was different—five thousand in the one case, in the other four thousand: the number of the loaves was different—five in the one case, in the other seven: the number of the fishes in the one case is definitely stated by all the four Evangelists—two; in the other case both give them indefinitely—"a few small fishes:" in the one case the multitude were commanded to sit down "upon the green grass;" in the other, "on the ground;" in the one case the number of the baskets taken up filled with the fragments was twelve; in the other seven: but more than all, perhaps, because apparently quite incidental, in the one case the name given to the kind of baskets used is the same in all the four narratives—the cophinus (see on ch. 6. 43); in the other case the name given to the kind of baskets used, while it is the same in both the narratives, is quite different—the spuria, a basket large enough to hold a man's body, for Paul was let down in one of these from the wall of Damascus (Acts, 9. 25). That decidedly the best supported, and has also evidence on its side is this: 'I see men; (them) as trees walking'—i.e., he could sh them from trees only by their motion; a mark of truth in the narrative, as ALFORD describing how hazy objects had appeared being that gradual failing of sight which had blindness. 25. CHAPTER IX.

1. JESUS IS TRANSFIGURED—CONVERSATION WITH ELIAH. (=M. 16. 28-17. 13; Luke, 9. 30-35; See on Luke, 9. 27-36.)

2. HEALING OF A DEMONIAK BOY—SECOND EXPLICIT ANNOUNCEMENT OF HIS APPROACHING DEATH AND RESURRECTION. (=Matthew, 17. 14-23; 17. 24-27.)

Healing of the Demoniac Boy (c. 14-29). 14. And as he came to his disciples, he saw a great multitude about him, and the scribes questioning with them. This "on the next day, when they were come down from the hill" (Luke, 9. 37). The Transfiguration appears to have taken place at night. In the morning, he came down from the hill on which it took with Peter, and James, and John—on approaching the other nine, He found them surrounded great multitude, and the scribes disputing or asking with them. No doubt these cavillers tempting the apostles of Jesus with their inability to cure the demoniac boy of whom we are told to bear, and insinuating doubts even of their Master's ability to do it; while they, zealous for their Master's honour, would no doubt refer to His past miracles in proof of the contrary. 15. And straightway all the people—"the multitude"—when they beheld him, were greatly amazed—or "were astounded"—and running to him saluted him. The singularly strong expression of surprise, the sudden arrest of the discussion, and the rush of the multitude towards Him, can be accounted for by nothing less than something amazing in His appearance. There can hardly be any doubt that His countenance still retained traces of His transfiguration-glory. (See Exodus, 34. 29, 30.) So BENGEL, DE WETTE, MEYER, TRENCH, ALFORD. No wonder, if this was the case, that they not only ran to Him, but saluted Him. Our Lord, however, takes no notice of what had attracted them, and probably it gradually faded away as He drew near; but addressing Himself to the scribes, He demands the subject of their discussion, ready to meet them where they had pressed hard upon His half-instructed, and as yet timid apostles. 16. And he asked the scribes, What question ye with them? Ere they had time to reply, the father of the boy, whose case had occasioned the dispute, himself steps forward and answers the question; telling a piteous tale of deafness, and dumbness, and fits of epilepsy—ending with this, that the disciples, though entreated, could not perform the cure. 17. And one of the multitude answered and said, Master, I have brought unto thee my son—"mine only child" (Luke, 9. 38), which bath a dumb spirit—a spirit whose operation had the effect of rendering his victim speechless, and deaf also (c. 25). In Matthew's report of the speech (17. 15), the father says "he is lunatic;" this being another and most distressing effect of the possession. 18. And whosoever he taketh him, he teach him; and he foameth, and gnasheth with his teeth, and pineth away—rather, 'becomes withered,' 'dried up,' or 'paralyzed;' as the same word is everywhere else rendered in the New Testament. Some additional particulars are given by Luke, and by our Evangelist below. "Lo," says he in Luke, 9. 39, "a spirit taketh him, and he suddenly crieth out; and it teareth him that he foameth again, and bruising him hardly (or with difficulty) departeth from him." and I spake to thy disciples that they should cast him out; and they could not. Our Lord replies to the father by a severe rebuke to the disciples. As if wounded at the exposure before such a multitude, of the weakness of His disciples' faith, which doubtless He felt as a reflection on Himself, He puts them to the blush before all, but in language fitted only to raise expectation of what Himself would do. 19. He answereth him, and saith, O faithless generation—"and perverse," or 'perverted' (Matthew, 17. 17; Luke, 9. 41), how long shall I be with you? how long shall I suffer you?—language implying that it was a shame to them to want the faith necessary to perform this cure, and that it needed some patience to put up with them. It is to us surprising that some interpreters, as CHRYSOSTOM and CALVIN, should represent this rebuke as addressed, not to the disciples at all, but to the scribes who disputed with them. Nor does it much, if at all, mend the matter to view it as addressed to both, as most expositors seem to do. With BENGEL, DE WETTE, and MEYER, we regard it as addressed directly to the nine apostles who were unable to expel this evil spirit. And though, in ascribing this inability to their 'want of faith' and the 'perverted turn of mind' which they had drunk in with their early training, the rebuke would undoubtedly apply, with vastly greater force, to those who twitted the poor disciples with their inability; it would be to change the whole nature of the rebuke to suppose it addressed to those who had no faith at all, and were wholly perverted. It was because faith sufficient for curing this youth was to have been expected of the disciples, and because they should by that time have got rid of the perversity in which they had been reared, that Jesus exposes them thus before the rest. And who does not see that this was fitted, more than anything else, to impress upon the bystanders the severe loftiness of the training He was giving to the Twelve, and the unsophisticated footing He was on with them? Bring him unto me. The order to bring the patient to Him was instantly obeyed; when, lo! as if conscious of the presence of his divine Tormentor, and expecting to be made to quit, the foul spirit rages and is furious, determined to die hard, doing all the mischief he can to this poor child while yet within his grasp. 20. And they brought him unto him; and when he saw him, straightway the spirit tare him. Just as the man with the legion of demons, "when he saw Jesus, ran and worshipped Him" (ch. 5. 6), so this demon, when he saw Him, immediately "tare him." The feeling of terror and rage was the same in both cases, and he fell on the ground, and wallowed foaming. Still Jesus does nothing, but keeps conversing with the father about the case—partly to have its desperate features told out by him who knew them best, in the hearing of the spectators; partly to let its virulence have time to show itself; and partly to deepen the exercise of the father's soul, to draw out his faith, and thus to prepare both him and the bystanders for what He was to do. 21. And he asked his father, How long is it ago since this came unto him? And he said, Of a child, &c. Having told briefly the affecting features of the case, the poor father, half dispirited by the failure of the disciples and the aggravated virulence of the malady itself in presence of their Master, yet encouraged too by what he had heard of Christ, by the severe rebuke He had given to His disciples for not having faith enough to cure the boy, and by the dignity with which He had ordered him to be brought to Him—in this mixed state of mind, he closes his description of the case with these touching words: but if thou canst do any thing, have compassion on us, and help us—"us," says the father: for it was a sore family affliction. (Y. the language of the Myrophenician woman regarding her daughter, "Lord, help me." Still, nothing is done; the man is but struggling into faith: it must come a step farther. But he had to do with Him who breaks not the bruised reed, and who knew how to inspire what He demanded. The man had said to Him, "If Thou canst do." 23. Jesus—retorting upon him, said unto him, If thou canst believe: The man had said, "If Thou canst do any thing;" Jesus replies, all things are possible to him that believeth—"My doing all depends on thy believing." To impress this still more, He redoubles upon the believing: "If thou canst believe, all things are possible to him that believeth." Thus the Lord helps the birth of faith in that struggling soul; and now, though with pain and sore travail, it comes to the birth, as TRENCH, borrowing from OLIVARIAN, expresses it. Seeing the case stood still, waiting not upon the Lord's power but his own faith, the man becomes immediately conscious of conflicting principles, and rises into one of the noblest utterances on record. 24. And straightway the father of the child cried out, and said with tears, Lord, I believe; help thou mine unbelief;—q. d., "Tis useless concealing from Thee, O Thou mysterious, mighty Healer, the unbelief that still struggles in this heart of mine; but that heart bears me witness that I do believe in Thee; and if distrust still remains, I disown it, I wrestle with it, I seek help from Thee against it." Two things are very remarkable here: First, The felt and owned presence of unbelief, which only the strength of the man's faith could have so revealed to his own consciousness.

Second, His appeal to Christ for help against his felt unbelief—a feature in the case quite unparalleled, and showing, more than all protestations could have done, the insight he had attained into the existence of a power in Christ more glorious than any he had besought for his poor child. The work was done; and as the commotion and confusion in the crowd was now increasing, Jesus at once, as Lord of spirits, gives the word of command to the dumb and deaf spirit to be gone, never again to return to his victim. 25. And the spirit cried, and rent him sore, and came out of him; and he was as one dead; inasmuch that many said, He is dead. The malignant, cruel spirit, now conscious that his time was come, gathers up his whole strength, with intent by a last stroke to kill his victim, and had nearly succeeded. But the Lord of life was there; the Healer of all maladies, the Friend of sinners, the Seed of the woman, "the Stronger than the strong man armed," was there. The very faith which Christ declared to be enough for everything being now found, it was not possible that the serpent should prevail. Fearfully is he permitted to bruise the heel, as in this case; but his own heel shall go for it—his works shall be destroyed (1 John, 3. 8. 37. But Jesus took him by the hand, and lifted him up; and he arose. 28. Why could not we cast him out? 29. And he said unto them, This kind can come forth by nothing but by prayer and fasting;—i. e., as nearly all good interpreters are agreed, 'this kind of evil spirits cannot be expelled, or so desperate a case of demoniacal possession cannot be cured, but by prayer and fasting.' But since the Lord Himself says that His disciples could not fast while He was with them, perhaps this was designed, as ALFORD hints, for their after guidance—unless we take it as but a definite way of expressing the general truth, that great and difficult duties require special preparation and self-denial. But the answer to their question, as given by Matthew (17.), is more full: "And Jesus said unto them, Because of your unbelief. For verily I say unto you, If ye have faith as a grain of mustard seed, ye shall say unto this mountain, Remove hence to yonder place, and it shall remove; and nothing shall be impossible unto you" (c. 20). See on ch. 11. 23. "Howbeit this kind goeth not out but by prayer and fasting" (c. 21); i. e., though nothing is impossible to faith, yet such a height of faith as is requisite for such triumphs is not to be reached either in a moment or without effort—either with God in prayer or with ourselves in self-denying exercises. Luke (9. 43) adds, "And they were all amazed at the mighty power of God"—at the majesty or 'mightiness of God,' in this last miracle, in the transfiguration, &c.; or, at the divine grandeur of Christ rising upon them daily.

Second Explicit Announcement of His Approaching Death and Resurrection (v. 30-32). 30. And they departed thence, and passed—were passing along through Galilee; and he would not that any man should know it. By comparing Matthew, 17. 23, 24, and Luke, 9. 43, 44, with this, we gather, that as our Lord's reason for going through Galilee more privately than usual on this occasion, was to reiterate to them the announcement which had so shocked them at the first mention of it, and thus familiarize them with it by little and little, so this was His reason for enjoining silence upon them as to their present movements. 31. For he taught his disciples, and said unto them—"Let these sayings sink down into your ears" (Luke, 9. 44): not what had been passing between them as to His grandeur, but what He was now to utter, "for" The Son of man is delivered. The use of the present tense expresses how near at hand He would have them to consider it. As BENZEL says, steps were already in course of being taken to bring it about. into the

This remarkable antithesis—"the Son will be delivered into the hands of men"—of notice, is in all the three Evangelists. It kills him—q. d. 'Be not carried off your feet that grandeur of Mine which ye have used, but bear in mind what I have said, and now distinctly repeat, that whose beams ye now rejoice is soon to night gloom;' and after he is killed, he is buried. 32. But they understood not—and it was hid from them, (so) that "it was hid from them, (so) that they did not" (Luke, 9. 49), and were afraid to hear their most cherished ideas were so combed by such announcements, that they of laying themselves open to rebuke by any questions. But "they were exceedingly faithful, 17. 23." While the other Evangelists & WILKINSON remark, notice note and their fear, St. Matthew, who was 12, retains a vivid recollection of their

LIFE AMONG THE TWELVE WHO SHOULD STAY IN THE KINGDOM OF HEAVEN, WITH TEACHING—INCIDENTAL REBUKE OF EXCLUSIVENESS. (=Matthew, 18. 1-9; 6.)

Among the Twelve, with Relative Teaching 13. What was it that ye disputed among ye the way? From this we gather that sinful communication He had made to Redeemer had allowed them to travel so a way by themselves; partly, no doubt, might have privacy for Himself to dwell on fore Him, and partly that they might be weigh together and prepare themselves these events which He had announced to if so, how different was their occupation! 'held their peace: for by the way they had engaged themselves, who should be the greatest. 18. 1. we should infer that the subordinated, not by our Lord, but by the disciples, who came and asked Jesus who rearest. Perhaps one or two of them held the matter to Jesus, who put them off until all be assembled together at Capernaum all the while "perceived the thought not" (Luke, 9. 47; but now that they were "in the house." He questions them if they are put to the blush, conscious of towards each other which it had kindled. the whole question afresh, and at this Evangelist takes it up. The subject was the recent announcement of the Kingdom, 16. 19-28, the transfiguration of their especially the preference given to three that scene. 35. If any man desire to be a shall be last of all, and servant of all—i. e., 'such: he must be prepared to take the rear place. See on ch. 10. 42-45. 36. And did—"a little child" (Matthew, 18. 2); but the same in both places, as also in Luke, 14. 10, him in the midst of them; and when he had his arms. This beautiful trait is men- tioned by the Evangelist alone. he said unto them, "let us go to Matthew (18. 3, 4) for the first answer:—"Verily I say unto you, except ye be converted, and become as little children, ye shall not enter into the kingdom of Heaven:"—q. d., "must be thorough; not only must the need to God in general, and from earthly things, but in particular, except ye be born that carnal ambition which still dwells in you, into that freedom from all such things ye see in this child, ye have neither part nor lot in it." in the kingdom at all; and he who in this feature has most of the child, is highest there.' Whosoever, therefore, shall "humble himself as this little child, the same is greatest in the kingdom of heaven;" for he that is (willing to be) least among you all, the same shall be great" (Luke, 9. 49). And Whosoever shall receive one of such children—so manifesting the spirit unconsciously displayed by this child, in my name—from love to Me, receiveth me; and whosoever shall receive me, receiveth not me, but him that sent me. See on Matthew, 10. 40.

Incidental Rebuke of John for Exclusiveness (v. 38-41). 38. And John answered him, saying, Master, we saw one casting out devils in thy name, and he followeth not us; and we forbade him, because he followeth not us: The link of connection here with the foregoing context lies, we apprehend, in the emphatic words which our Lord had just uttered, "in My name." 'O, interposes John—young, warm, but not sufficiently apprehending Christ's teaching in these matters—'that reminds me of something that we have just done, and we should like to know if we did right. We saw one casting out devils "in Thy name," and we forbade him, because he followeth not us. Were we right, or were we wrong?' Answer—'Ye were wrong! 'But we did it because he followeth not us?' 'No matter.' 39. But Jesus said, Forbid him not; for there is no man which shall do a miracle in my name, that can lightly—or, 'soon,' i. e., 'readily,' speak evil of me. 40. For he that is not against us is on our part. Two principles of immense importance are here laid down: 'First, No one will readily speak evil of Me who has the faith to do a miracle in My name; and Second, If such a person cannot be supposed to be against us, ye are to hold him for us.' Let it be carefully observed that our Lord does not say this man should not have "followed them," nor yet that it was indifferent whether he did or not; but simply teaches how such a person was to be regarded, although he did not—viz., as a reverer of His name and a promoter of His cause. 41. For whosoever shall give you a cup of water to drink in my name, because ye belong to Christ, verily I say unto you, he shall not lose his reward. See on Matthew, 10. 42.

Continuation of Teaching suggested by the Disciples' Strife (v. 42-50). What follows appears to have no connection with the incidental reproof of John, immediately preceding. As that had interrupted some important teaching, our Lord hastens back from it, as if no such interruption had occurred. 42. And whosoever shall offend one of these little ones that believe in me—or, shall cause them to stumble; referring probably to the effect which such unsavoury disputes as they had held would have upon the inquiring and hopeful who came in contact with them, leading to the belief that after all they were no better than others, it is better for him that a millstone were hanged about his neck. The word here is simply 'millstone,' without expressing of which kind. But in Matthew, 18. 6. it is the 'ass-turned' kind, far heavier than the small hand-mill turned by female slaves, as in Luke, 17. 35. It is of course the same which is meant here, and he were cast into the sea—meaning, that if by such a death that stumbling were prevented, and so its eternal consequences averted, it would be a happy thing for them. Here follows a striking verse in Matthew, 18. 7, "Woe unto the world because of offences!"—"There will be stumblings and falls and loss of souls enough from the world's treatment of disciples, without any addition from you; dreadful will be its doom in consequence; see that ye share not in it." "For it must needs be that offences come; but woe to that man by whom the offence cometh!" 'The struggle between light and darkness will inevitably cause stumblings, but not less guilty is he who wilfully makes any to stumble.' 43. And if thy hand offend thee, cut it off: it is better for thee to enter into life maimed, than having two hands to go into hell. See Matthew, 5. 29, 30. The only difference between the words there and here is, that there they refer to impure inclinations; here, to an ambitious disposition, an irascible or quarrelsome temper, and the like: and the injunction is, to strike at the root of such dispositions and cut off the occasions of them. 47. And if thine eye offend thee, pluck it out: it is better for thee to enter into the kingdom of God with one eye, than having two eyes to be cast into hell-fire: 48. Where their worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched. See on Matthew, 5. 20; and on the words "hell" and "hell-fire," or 'the hell of fire:' see on Matthew, 5. 22. The "unquenchableness" of this fire has already been brought before us, see on Matthew, 3. 12; and the awfully vivid idea of an undying worm, everlastingly consuming an unconsumable body, is taken from the closing words of the Evangelical prophet, Isaiah, 66. 24, which seem to have furnished the later Jewish Church with its current phraseology on the subject of future punishment (see LIGHTFOOT). 49. For every one shall be salted with fire, and every sacrifice shall be salted with salt. A difficult verse, on which much has been written—some of it to little purpose. "Every one" probably means 'Every follower of mine;' and the "fire" with which he "must be salted" probably means 'a fiery trial' to season him. (Y. Malachi, 3. 2. &c.) The reference to salting the sacrifice is of course to that maxim of the Levitical law, that every acceptable sacrifice must be sprinkled with salt, to express symbolically its soundness, sweetness, wholesomeness, acceptability. But as it had to be roasted first, we have here the further idea of a salting with fire. In this case, "every sacrifice," in the next clause, will mean, 'Every one who would be found an acceptable offering to God;' and thus the whole verse may perhaps be paraphrased as follows: 'Every disciple of Mine shall have a fiery trial to undergo, and every one who would be found an odour of a sweet smell, a sacrifice acceptable and well-pleasing to God, must have such a salting, like the Levitical sacrifices.' Another, but, as it seems to us, far-fetched as well as harsh, interpretation—suggested first, we believe, by MICHAELIS, and adopted by ALEXANDER—takes the "every sacrifice which must be salted with fire" to mean those who are "cast into hell," and the preservative effect of this salting to refer to the preservation of the lost not only in but by means of the fire of hell. Their reason for this is that the other interpretation changes the meaning of the "fire," and the characters too, from the lost to the saved, in these verses. But as our Lord confessedly ends His discourse with the case of His own true disciples, the transition to them in the preceding verse is perfectly natural; whereas to apply the preservative salt of the sacrifice to the preserving quality of hell-fire, is equally contrary to the symbolical sense of salt and the Scripture representations of future torment. Our Lord has still in His eye the unseemly jarrings which had arisen among the Twelve, the peril to themselves of allowing any indulgence to such passions, and the severe self-sacrifice which salvation would cost them. 50. Salt is good; but if the salt have lost his saltiness—its power to season what it is brought into contact with, wherewith will ye season it? How is this property to be restored? See on Matthew, 5. 13. Have salt in yourselves—'See to it that ye retain in yourselves those precious qualities that will make you a blessing to one another, and to all around you;' and—with respect to the miserable strife out of which all this discourse has sprung, in one concluding word—have peace one with another. This is repeated in 1 Thessalonians, 5. 13.

Third Announcement of His approaching Suffering, Death, and Resurrection (v. 32-34). 32. And they were in the way—or on the road, going up to Jerusalem—in Perea, and probably somewhere between Ephraim and Jericho, on the farther side of the Jordan, and to the north-east of Jerusalem. and Jesus went before them—as GROTIUS says, in the style of an intrepid Leader, and they were amazed—or 'struck with astonishment' at His courage in advancing to certain death, and as they followed, they were afraid—for their own safety. These artless, life-like touches—not only from an eye-witness, but one whom the noble carriage of the Master struck with wonder and awe—are peculiar to Mark, and give the second Gospel a charm all its own; making us feel as if we ourselves were in the midst of the scenes it describes. Well might the poet exclaim,

'The Saviour, what a noble fame

Was kindred in His breast,

When, hastening to Jerusalem,

He march'd before the rest!—Comper.

And he took again the twelve—referring to His previous announcements on this sad subject, and began to tell them what things should happen unto him—'were going to befall Him.' The word expresses something already begun but not brought to a head, rather than something wholly future. 33. Saying, Behold, we go up to Jerusalem—for the last time, and—"all things that are written by the prophets concerning the Son of man shall be accomplished" (Luke, 18. 31. the Son of man shall be delivered unto the chief priests, and unto the scribes; and they shall condemn him to death, and shall deliver him to the Gentiles. This is the first express statement that the Gentiles would combine with the Jews in His death; the two grand divisions of the human race for whom He died thus taking part in crucifying the Lord of Glory, as WEBSTER & WILKINSON observe. 34. And they shall mock him, and shall scourge him, and shall spit upon him, and shall kill him; and the third day he shall rise again. Singularly explicit as this announcement was, Luke (18. 34) says "they understood none of these things; and this saying was hid from them, neither knew they the things which were spoken." The meaning of the words they could be at no loss to understand, but their import in relation to His Messianic kingdom they could not penetrate; the whole prediction being right in the teeth of their preconceived notions. That they should have clung so tenaciously to the popular notion of an un suffering Messiah, may surprise us; but it gives inexpressible weight to their after-testimony to a suffering and dying Saviour.

Ambition Request of James and John—The Reply (v. 35-45). 35. And James and John, the sons of Zebedee, come unto him, saying, Matthew (20. 20) says their "mother came to Him with her sons, worshipping Him and desiring." &c. (Cf. Matthew, 27. 56, with ch. 18. 40) Salome was her name (ch. 18. 1). We cannot be sure with which of the parties the movement originated; but as our Lord, even in Matthew's as the two places of highest honour in the Kingdom. The semblance of a plea for so royal a request might possibly have been in the fact that one of the two usually leaned east of Jesus, or sat next Him at meals, other was one of the favoured three. 38. said unto them, Ye know not what ye ask, is the reply to such a request, preferred at once, after the sad announcement just made of the cup that I drink of? To 'drink of' in Scripture a figure for getting one's fill good (Psalm 16. 6; 23. 5; 114. 13; Jeremiah, 31. 13; Revelation, 17. 6; John, 18. 11; Revelation, 19. 10; Revelation, 22. 17; Revelation, 22. 17). Cf. for the baptism that I am baptised with? (Cf. for the Psalm 42. 7.) The object of this question have been to try how far those two men were of the dignity to which they aspired; in the principle that he who is able to suffer his sake will be the nearest to Him in His Kingdom. And they said unto him, We can. Here we own their mother's petition for them; and doubtless they were perfectly professing their willingness to follow their Lord, they shall have to do it. As for James, he was of the apostles who was honoured, and was able to be baptised with his Master's blood (Acts, 12. 1. 3; while John, after all the persecutions to which the church was exposed from the Jews, and the struggles and sufferings occasioned by the triumph of the Gospel among the Gentiles, was the victim, after all the rest had got to bitter persecution in the evening of his life, the word of God and for the testimony of Christ. Yes, they were dear believers and knew it; and perhaps the foresight of would have to pass through, and the testimony He would yet receive from the cause of that gentleness which we wonder at in His reproof. And Jesus said Ye shall indeed drink of the cup that I drink of the baptism that I am baptised withal shall is not Mine to give, save to them for whom it is prepared.' When therefore He says, "It is not mine to give" the meaning is, "I cannot give it as a favour to whomsoever I please, or on a principle of favouritism; it belongs exclusively to those for whom it is prepared," &c. And if this be His meaning, it will be seen how far our Lord is from disclaiming the right to assign to each his proper place in His Kingdom; that on the contrary, He expressly asserts it, merely announcing that the principle of distribution is quite different from what these petitioners supposed. Our Lord, it will be observed, does not deny the petition of James and John, or say they shall not occupy the place in His Kingdom which they now improperly sought:—for aught we know, that may be their true place. All we are sure of is, that their asking it was displeasing to Him "to whom all judgment is committed," and so was not fitted to gain their object, but just the reverse. (See what is taught in Luke, 14. 8-11.) One at least of these brethren, as ALFORD strikingly remarks, saw on the right and on the left hand of their Lord, as He hung upon the tree, the crucified thieves; and bitter indeed must have been the remembrance of this ambitious prayer at that moment. 41. And when the ten heard it, they began to be much displeased with James and John—or "were moved with indignation," as the same word is rendered in Matthew, 20. 24. The expression "began to be," which is of frequent occurrence in the Gospels, means that more passed than is expressed, and that we have but the result. And can we blame the ten for the indignation which they felt? Yet there was probably a spice of the old spirit of rivalry in it, which in spite of our Lord's recent lengthened, diversified and most solemn warnings against it, had not ceased to stir in their breasts. 42. But Jesus called them to him, and saith unto them, Ye know that they which are accounted to rule—are recognised or acknowledged as rulers, over the Gentiles exercise lordship over them; and their great ones exercise authority upon them—as superiors exercising an acknowledged authority over inferiors. 43. But so shall it not be among you; but whosoever will be great among you, shall be your minister—a subordinate servant. 44. And whosoever of you will be the chiefest—or of right a place above all! As "the Word in the beginning with God." He was ministered unto; and as the risen Redeemer in our nature He now is ministered unto, "angels and authorities and powers being made subject unto Him" (1 Peter, 3. 22); but not for this came He hither. The Servant of all came to be the Servant of all; and His last act was the grandest Service ever beheld by the universe of God—"HE GAVE HIS LIFE A RANSOM FOR MANY!" "Many" is here to be taken, not in contrast with few or with all, but in opposition to one—the one Son of man for the many sinners.

CHAPTER XI.

Ver. 1-11. CHRIST'S TRIUMPHAL ENTRY INTO JERUSALEM, ON THE FIRST DAY OF THE WEEK. (=Matthew, 21. 1-9; Luke, 19. 29-40; John, 12. 12. 19.) See on Luke, 19. 29-40.

11-22. THE BARREN FIG TREE CURSED, WITH LESSONS FROM IT—SECOND CLEANSING OF THE TEMPLE, ON THE SECOND AND THIRD DAYS OF THE WEEK. (=Matthew, 21. 12-22; Luke, 19. 45-48.) 11. And Jesus entered into Jerusalem, and into the temple; and when he had looked round about upon—or 'surveyed' all things, and now the even-tide was come, he went out unto Bethany with the twelve. Thus briefly does our Evangelist dispose of this His first day in Jerusalem, after the triumphal entry. Nor do the Third and Fourth Gospels give us more light. But from Matthew (21. 19, 11, 14-16) we learn some additional and precious particulars, for which see on Luke, 19. 45-48. It was not now safe for the Lord to sleep in the City, nor, from the day of His Triumphal Entry, did He pass one night in it, save the last fatal one.

13-16. And his disciples heard it—and marked it. This is introduced as a connecting link, to explain plain what was afterwards to be said on the subject, as the narrative has to proceed to the other transactions of this day.

Second Cleansing of the Temple (v. 15-18). For exposition of this portion, see on Luke, 19. 45-48.

Lessons from the Cursing of the Fig Tree (v. 19-20). And in the morning—of Tuesday, the third of the week; He had slept, as during all this week at Bethany, as they passed by—going into Jerusalem again, they saw the fig tree dried up from the root; no partial blight, leaving life in the root; it was now dead, root and branch. In Matthew, it is said it withered away as soon as it was cursed. But the full blight had not appeared probably at once; and in the dusk perhaps, as they returned to Bethany, they had not observed it. The period with which Mark distinguishes the days is not served by Matthew, intent only on holding up truths which the incident was designed to teach. Matthew the whole is represented as taking place at once, just as the two stages of Jairus' daughter—dying and dead—are represented by him as one. The only difference is between a more summary and more detailed narrative, each of which only contrasts the other. 21. And Peter calling to remembrance unto him—satisfied that a miracle so very peculiar, not of blessing, as all His other miracles of cursing, could not have been wrought but some higher reference, and fully expecting to something weighty on the subject: Master, behold the fig tree which thou cursedst is withered away—connecting the two things as to show that he traced the death of the tree entirely to the curse of his ICES THE SCRIBES. (=Matthew, 22, 15-46; 26-47.) The time of this Section appears to be the third day of Christ's last week—Tuesday, and introduces the subject by saying (22, 15), went the Pharisees and took counsel how they might entangle Him in His talk." 13. And they are to Him certain of the Pharisees—"their disciples; Matthew; probably young and zealous in that hardening school, and of the Herodians. See on Matthew, 23, 16. In Luke, 20, 20, the tools are called "spies, which should smother themselves just for 'righteous' men, that they might hold of His words, that so they might entangle Him unto the power and authority of the Law." Their plan, then, was to entrap Him in an expression which might be construed as an affront to the Roman government; and so themselves being notoriously discontented with the Roman yoke.

14. And when they were saying unto him, Master—or 'teacher'—we know thee to be a Jew, and carest for no man; for thou regardest the person of men, but teachest the way of God in vain. By such flattery—though they said only that they hoped to throw Him off His guard. Is it a tribute to Caesar, or not? It was the civil tax paid by all enrolled in the 'Census.' See on Matthew, 17, 25. 15. Shall we give, or shall we not give? knowing their hypocrisy—"their wickedness" (Matthew, 22, 18; "their craftiness" Luke, 20, 23). The wiles of their hearts took the form of craft, and they did not feel—an anxious desire to avoid a matter which to a scrupulous Jew seemed a question of some difficulty. See Luke through this, He said unto them, Why say ye me—"hypocrites!" bring me a penny that I may give thee the tribute money" (Matthew, 22, 19). They brought it. And he saith unto them, Whose image is stamped upon the coin, and superscribed words encircling it on the obverse side? He said unto him, Caesar's. 17. And Jesus answered them, Render to Caesar the things that are Caesar's.

Putting it in this general form, it was intended for sedition itself to dispute it, and yet it was the snare, and to God the things that are His. How much is there in this profound but to the tantalizing addition to the maxim, and how arguable is the whole for fulness, brevity, clearness! and they marvelled at him—"at His wisdom, and held their peace" (Luke, 20, 26, "and they went their way" (Matthew, 22, 22).

18. Then come unto him Sadducees, which say there is no resurrection—nor angel nor spirit" (Acts, 23, 7). They were materialists of the day. See on Acts, 23, 7, and read him saying, 19-22. Master, Moses wrote unto Aaron, saying, 23, 5, If a man's brother die, and he have no wife, thou shalt marry unto him, and he shall beget unto him, that his name may not be blotted out of Israel. And the seven had her, as seed; last of all the woman died also. 23. In resurrection therefore when they shall rise... 24. Do not therefore err, because ye know not the Scriptures—nor the power of God? For in the resurrection, neither is marriage, nor is given in marriage—neither can they be married (Luke, 20, 36). Marriage is ordained to continue the human family, but as there will be no more death in the future state, this too will cease. But as are the angels which are spirits. In Luke it is "equal unto the angels;" but subject to death and resurrection, we are not equal to extend the equality here taught between one point—the immortality of their nature. The final clause is added in Luke—"and are the children of God"—not in respect of character, which is not here spoken of, but of nature—"being the children of the resurrection," as rising to an undecaying existence (Romans, 8, 21, 23), and so being the children of their Father's immortality (1 Timothy, 6, 16). 26. And as touching the dead, that they rise; have ye not read in the book of Moses—"even Moses" (Luke, 20, 37), whom they had just quoted for the purpose of entangling Him, how in the bush God spake unto him—either 'at the bush,' as the same expression is rendered in Luke, 20, 37, i.e., when he was there; or 'in the (section of his history regarding the) bush.' The structure of our verse regarding the latter sense, which is not unusual, saying (Exodus, 3, 6, I am the God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob? 27. He is not the God of the dead, but (the God) of the living—not 'the God of dead but (the God) of living persons.' The word in brackets is almost certainly an addition to the genuine text, and critical editors exclude it. "For all live unto Him" (Luke, 20, 38)—'in His view,' or 'in His estimation.' This last statement—found only in Luke—though adding nothing to the argument, is an important additional illustration. It is true, indeed, that to God no human being is dead or ever will be, but all mankind sustain an abiding conscious relation to Him; but the "all" here mean "those who shall be accounted worthy to obtain that world." These sustain a gracious covenant-relation to God which cannot be dissolved. (Of Romans, 6, 10, 11.) In this sense our Lord affirms that for Moses to call the Lord the "God" of His patriarchal servants, if at that moment they had no existence, would be unworthy of Him. He "would be ashamed to be called their God, if He had not prepared for them a city" (Hebrews, 11, 16). It was concluded by some of the early Fathers, from our Lord's resting His proof of the Resurrection on such a passage as this, instead of quoting some much clearer testimonies of the Old Testament, that the Sadducees, to whom this was addressed, acknowledged the authority of no part of the Old Testament but the Pentateuch; and this opinion has held its ground even till now. But as there is no ground for it in the New Testament, so Josephus is silent upon it; merely saying that they rejected the Pharisaic traditions. It was because the Pentateuch was regarded by all classes as the fundamental source of the Hebrew Religion, and all the succeeding books of the Old Testament but as developments of it, that our Lord would show that even there the doctrine of the Resurrection was taught. And all the rather does He select this passage, as being not a bare annunciation of the doctrine in question, but as expressive of that glorious truth out of which the Resurrection springs. "And when the multitude heard this (says Matthew, 22, 33), they were astonished at His doctrine." "Then (adds Luke, 20, 36, 40) certain of the scribes answering said, Master—"Teacher," "thou hast well said"—enjoying His victory over the Sadducees. "And after that they durst not ask Him any [question at all]—neither party could; both being for the time utterly foiled.

The Great Commandment (v. 28-34). "But when the Pharisees had heard that He had put the Sadducees to silence, they were gathered together" (Matthew, 22, 34). 28. And one of the scribes—"a lawyer," says Matthew (22, 35); i.e., a teacher of the law, came, and having heard them reasoning together, and perceiving that he had answered them well, asked him—manifestly in no bad spirit. When Matthew therefore says he came "tempting," or "trying him," as one of the Pharisaic party who seemed to enjoy the defeat He had given to the Sadducees, we may suppose that though somewhat priding himself upon his insight into the law, and not indisposed to measure his knowledge with One in whom he had not yet learned to believe, he was nevertheless an honest-hearted, fair disputant. Which is the first commandment of all—first in importance; the primary, leading commandment, the most fundamental one. This was a question which, with some others, divided the Jewish teachers into rival schools. Our Lord's answer is in a strain of respect very different from what He showed to cavillers—ever observing His own direction. "Give not that which is holy to the dogs, neither cast ye your pearls before swine; lest they trample them under their feet, and turn again and rend you" (Matthew, 7. 6). 29. And Jesus answered him, The first of all the commandments is. The readings here vary considerably. TISCHENDORF and TREVELLER read simply, 'the first is' and they are followed by MEYER and ALFORD. But though the authority for the precise form of the received text is slender, a form almost identical with it seems to have most weight of authority. Our Lord here gives His explicit sanction to the distinction between commandments of a more fundamental and primary character, and commandments of a more dependent and subordinate nature; a distinction of which it is confidently asserted by a certain class of critics that the Jews knew nothing, that our Lord and his apostles nowhere lay down, and which has been invented by Christian divines. (Cf. Matthew, 23. 23.) Hear, O Israel; the Lord our God is one Lord. This every devout Jew recited twice every day, and the Jews do it to this day; thus keeping up the great ancient national protest against the polytheisms and pantheisms of the heathen-world: it is the great utterance of the national faith in One Living and Personal God—"ONE JEHOVAH!" 30. And thou shalt. We have here the language of law, expressive of God's claims. What then are we here bound down to do? One word is made to express it. And what a word! Had the essence of the divine law consisted in deeds, it could not possibly have been expressed in a single word; for no one deed is comprehensive of all others embraced in the law. But as it consists in an affection of the soul, one word suffices to express it—but only one. Fear, though due to God and enjoined by Him, is limited in its sphere and distant in character. Trust, Hope, and the like, though essential features of a right state of heart towards God, are called into action only by personal necessity, and so are—in a good sense, it is true, but still are properly—selfish affections; that is to say, they have respect to our own well-being. But LOVE is an all-inclusive affection, embracing not only every other affection proper to its Object, but all that is proper to be done to its Object; for as love spontaneously seeks to please its Object, so, in the case of men to God, it is the native well-spring of a voluntary obedience. It is, besides, the most personal of all affections. One may fear an event, one may hope for an event, one may rejoice in an event; but one can love only a Person. It is the tenderest, the most useful, the most divine of all affections. Such, then, is the affection in which the essence of the divine law is declared to consist—Thou shalt love. We now come to the glorious Object of that demanded affection. Thou shalt love the Lord, thy God—i. e. Jehovah, the Self-Existent One, who has revealed Himself as the "I AM," and there is "none else;" who, though by his name JEHOVAH apparently at an unapproachable distance from His finite creatures, yet bears to Thee a real and definite relationship, out of which arises His claim and Thy duty—of LOVE. But with what are we to love Him? Four things are here specified. First, "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God" with thy heart. This sometimes means 'the whole inner man' (as Proverbs, 4. 23); but that cannot be meant here; for then the other three particulars would be superfluous. Very often it means 'our emotional nature'—the seat of feeling as distinguished from our intellectual nature or the seat of thought, commonly called the "mind" (as in Philipians, 4. 7). But neither can this be the sense of it here; for here the heart is distinguished both from the "mind" and the "soul." The "heart," then, must here mean the sincerity of both the thoughts and the feelings; in other words, 'uprightness' or 'true-heartedness,' as opposed to a hypocritical or divided affection. But next, "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God" with thy soul. This is designed to command our emotional nature: 'Thou shalt put feeling or strength into thine affection.' Further, "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God" with thy mind. This commands our intellectual nature: 'Thou shalt put intelligence into thine affection'—in opposition to a blind devotion, or mere devotionism. Lastly, "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God" with thy strength. This commands our energies: 'Thou shalt put industry into thine affection'—"Do it with thy might" (Ecclesiastes, 9. 10). Taking these four things together, the command of the Law is, 'Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy powers—with a sincere, a fervent, an intelligent, an energetic love.' But this is not all that the Law demands. God will have all these qualities in their most perfect exercise. "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God," says the Law, "with all thy heart," or, with perfect sincerity; "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy soul," or, with the utmost fervour; "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy mind," or, in the fullest exercise of an enlightened reason; and "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy strength," or, with the whole energy of our being! So much for the First Commandment. 31. And the second is like—"unto it" (Matthew, 22. 39); as demanding the same affection, and only the extension of it, in its proper measure, to the creatures of Him whom we thus love—our brethren in the participation of the same nature, and neighbours, as connected with us by ties that render each dependent upon and necessary to the other. Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself. Now, as we are not to love ourselves supremely, this is virtually a command, in the first place, not to love our neighbour with all our heart and soul and mind and strength. And thus it is a condemnation of the idolatry of the creature. Our supreme and uttermost affection is to be reserved for God. But as accuracy as ourselves we are to love all mankind, and with the same readiness to do and suffer for them as we should reasonably desire them to show to us. The golden rule Matthew, 7. 12 is here our best interpreter of the nature and extent of these claims. There is none other commandment greater than these—or, as in Matthew, 22. 40, "On these two commandments hang all the Law and the Prophets" (see on Matthew, 5. 17). It is as if He had said, "This is all Scripture in a nutshell; the whole law of human duty in a portable, pocket form." Indeed, it is so simple that a child may understand it, so brief that all may remember it, so comprehensive as to embrace all possible cases. And from its very nature it is unchangeable. It is inconceivable that God should require from his rational creatures anything less, or in substance anything else, under any dispensation, in any world, at any period throughout eternal duration. He cannot but claim this—all this—alike in heaven, on earth, and in hell! And this incomparable summary of the Divine Law belonged to the Jewish Religion! As it shines in its own self-evidencing splendour, so it reveals its own true source. The Religion from which the world has received it could be none other than a God-given Religion! 32. And the scribes said unto him, Well, Master—Teacher, thou hast said the truth: for there is one [God]; and there is none other but he.

line text here seems clearly to have been, is one." without the word "God," and so all critical editors and expositors read. 33. We give him with all the heart... and to love his name as himself, is more than all whole burnt offerings—more, &c., than all positive institutions—hereby showing insight into the essential difference between what is moral and in its own enjoyable, and what is obligatory only enjoined and only so long as enjoined. 34. And Jesus saw that he answered discreetly—rather, ably, or "sensibly;" not only in a good spirit, a promising measure of insight into spiritual things said unto him, Thou art not far from the kingdom—for he had but to follow out a little further seemed sincerely to own, to find his way to the Kingdom. He needed only the experience of eminent scribe who at a later period said, now that the law is spiritual, but I am carnal, fleshly: who exclaimed, "O wretched man that I am! Who shall deliver me?" but who added, "O God through Jesus Christ!" (Romans, 7, 14). Perhaps among the "great company of the Jews and other Jewish ecclesiastics who were gathered to the faith," almost immediately after the Pentecost (Acts, 2, 7) this upright lawyer was one of the first to enter the Kingdom of God. It may be never entered it. And no man after that time asked any question—all feeling that they were asking for Him, and that it was vain to enter the Kingdom of God without Him.

Rebukes the Pharisees regarding David (v. 25-37). Jesus answered and said, while he taught in the temple, "while the Pharisees were gathered round him." (Matthew, 22, 41). How say the scribes that the son of David?—How come they to give it to the Messiah is to be the son of David? In 27, Jesus asks them, "What think ye of the son of the promised and expected Messiah? son is He (to be)? They say unto Him, of David." The sense is the same. "He to whom, How then doth David in spirit call him?" (Matthew, 22, 42, 43.) 36. For David said by the Holy Ghost (Psalm 110, 1), The Lord said, Sit thou on my right hand, till I make thine enemies thy footstool. 37. David therefore himself inquired, and whence is he then his son? There is no solution of this difficulty. Messiah is superior to David as his son according to the Kingdom of God; David is himself a subject, not the sovereign. The Human and Divine natures of Christ, spirituality of His kingdom—of which the earthly sovereigns are honoured if they be worthy to be its subjects—furnish the only solution of this puzzle. And the common people—or, 'the crowd,' heard Him gladly. "And no man would answer Him a word; neither durst any man that day forth ask Him any more question." (Matthew, 22, 46).

Rebukes Denounced (v. 38-40). 38. And he said in his doctrine—rather, 'in His teaching;' that this was but a specimen of an extended series, which Matthew gives in full (ch. 23, 1-36). (29, 45) this was "in the audience of all he said unto his disciples." Beware of the high love—or 'like' to go in long clothing (see Rev. 19, 8), and (love) salutations in the market. And the chief seats in the synagogues, and the chief rooms, or positions, at feasts. See on distinction, Luke, 14, 7; and on Matthew, 23, 6-7. Which devour widows' houses, and for a pretence long prayers: these shall receive greater damnation. They took advantage of their helpless condition, of a confident character, to obtain possession of their property, while by their "long prayers" they made them believe they were raised far above "filthy lucre." So much the "greater damnation" awaited them. (Cf. Matthew, 23, 33.) A life-like description of the Roman clergy, the true successors of "the scribes."

CHAPTER XIII.

Ver. 1-37. CHRIST'S PROPHECY OF THE DESTRUCTION OF JERUSALEM, AND WARNINGS SUGGESTED BY IT TO PREPARE FOR HIS SECOND COMING. (=Matthew, 24, 1-51; Luke, 21, 5-36.) Jesus had uttered all His mind against the Jewish ecclesiastics, exposing their character with withering plainness, and denouncing, in language of awful severity, the judgments of God against them for that unfaithfulness to their trust which was bringing ruin upon the nation. He had closed this His last public Discourse (Matthew, 23,) by a passionate Lamentation over Jerusalem, and a solemn Farewell to the Temple. "And (says Matthew, 24, 1) Jesus went out, and departed from the temple"—never more to re-enter its precincts, or open His mouth in public teaching. With this act ended His public ministry. As He withdrew, says OLSHAUSEN, the gracious presence of God left the sanctuary; and the Temple, with all its service, and the whole theocratic constitution, was given over to destruction. What immediately followed is, as usual, most minutely and graphically described by our Evangelist. 1. And as he went out of the temple, one of his disciples said unto him. The other Evangelists are less definite. "As some spake," says Luke: "His disciples came to Him," says Matthew. Doubtless it was the speech of one, the mouth-piece, likely, of others. Master—'Teacher,' see what manner of stones and what buildings are here—wondering, probably, how so massive a pile could be overthrown, as seemed implied in our Lord's last words regarding it. JOSEPHUS, who gives a minute account of the wonderful structure, speaks of stones forty cubits long (Jewish War, v. 5, 1.), and says the pillars supporting the porches were twenty-five cubits high, all of one stone, and that the whitest marble (ib., v. 5, 2). Six days' battering at the walls, during the siege, made no impression upon them (ib., vi. 4, 1). Some of the under-building, yet remaining, and other works, are probably as old as the first temple. 2. And Jesus answering said unto him, Seeest thou these great buildings? 'Ye call my attention to these things? I have seen them. Ye point to their massive and durable appearance: now listen to their fate.' there shall not be left—"left here" (Matthew, 24, 2). one stone upon another, that shall not be thrown down. Titus ordered the whole city and temple to be demolished (JOSEPHUS, J. W., vii. 1, 1.); Eleazar wished they had all died before seeing that holy city destroyed by enemies' hands, and before the temple was so profanely dug up (ib., vii. 8, 7). 3. And as he sat upon the mount of Olives, over against the temple. On their way from Jerusalem to Bethany they would cross mount Olivet; on its summit He seats Himself, over against the temple, having the city all spread out under His eye. How graphically is this set before us by our Evangelist. Peter and James and John and Andrew asked him privately. The other Evangelists tell us merely that "the disciples" did so. But Mark not only says it was four of them, but names them; and they were the first quaternion of the Twelve. 4. Tell us, when shall these things be? and what shall be the sign when all these things shall be fulfilled?—"and what shall be the sign of thy coming, and of the end of the world?" They no doubt looked upon the date of all these things as one and the same, and their notions of the things themselves were as confused as of the times of them. Our Lord takes His own way of meeting their questions.

Prophecies of the Destruction of Jerusalem v. 1-31: 5. And Jesus answering them began to say, Take heed lest any man deceive you: 6. For many shall come in my name, saying, I am [Christ] (see Matthew, 24. 5:—"and the time draweth nigh" Luke, 21. 8:—"that is, the time of the kingdom in its full splendour. and shall deceive many." "Go ye not therefore after them" (Luke, 21. 8). The reference here seems not to be to pretended Messiahs, deceiving those who rejected the claims of Jesus, of whom indeed there were plenty—for our Lord is addressing His own genuine disciples—but to persons pretending to be Jesus Himself, returned in glory to take possession of His kingdom. This gives peculiar force to the words, "Go ye not therefore after them." 7. And when ye shall hear of wars and rumours of wars, be ye not troubled—see on v. 13. and compare Isaiah, 8. 11-14, for such things must needs be; but the end shall not be yet. In Luke (21. 9:—"the end is not by and by," or 'immediately.' Worse must come before all is over. 8. These are the beginnings of sorrows—"of travail-pangs," to which heavy calamities are compared. (See Jeremiah, 4. 31, &c.) The annals of Tacitus tell us how the Roman world was convulsed, before the destruction of Jerusalem, by rival claimants of the imperial purple. 9. But take heed to yourselves: for—"before all these things" (Luke, 21. 12; i.e., before these public calamities come, they shall deliver you up to councils; and in the synagogues ye shall be beaten. These refer to ecclesiastical proceedings against them, and ye shall be brought before rulers and kings—before civil tribunals next, for my sake, for a testimony against them—rather "unto them"—to give you an opportunity of bearing testimony to Me before them. In the Acts of the Apostles we have the best commentary on this announcement. (Cf. Matthew, 10. 17, 18.) 10. And the gospel must first be published among all nations—"for a witness, and then shall the end come" (Matthew, 24. 14:—"God never sends judgment without previous warning; and there can be no doubt that the Jews, already dispersed over most known countries, had nearly all heard the Gospel "as a witness," before the end of the Jewish state. The same principle was repeated and will repeat itself "the end." 11. But when they shall lead you, and deliver you up, take no thought beforehand—"be not anxious beforehand," what ye shall speak, neither do ye premeditate: "Be not filled with apprehension, in the prospect of such public appearances for Me, lest ye should bring discredit upon My name, nor think it necessary to prepare beforehand what ye are to say," but whatsoever shall be given you in that hour, that speak ye: for it is not ye that speak, but the Holy Ghost. See on Matthew, 10. 19, 20. 13. And ye shall be hated of all men for my name's sake. Matthew 24. 12 adds this important intimation: "And because iniquity shall abound, the love of many"—of the many, or "of the most," i.e., of the generality of professed disciples—"shall wax cold." Sad illustrations of the effect of abounding iniquity in cooling the love even of faithful disciples we have in the Epistle of James, written about the period here referred to, and too frequently ever since, but he that shall endure unto the end, the same shall be saved. See on Matthew, 10. 21, 22; and cf. Hebrews, 10. 35, 39, which is a manifest allusion to these words of Christ; also Revelation, 2. 10. Luke adds these re-assuring words: "But there shall not an hair of your heads perish" 3. 18. Our Lord had just said (Luke, 21. 16) that they should be put to death; showing that this precious promise is far above immunity from mere bodily harm, and furnishing a key to the right interpretation of Psalm 91, and such like. 14. But when ye shall see—"Jerusalem compassed by armies"—by encamped armies; in other words, when ye shall see it besieged, and the abomination of desolation, spoken of by Daniel the prophet, standing where it ought not—i.e., as explained in Matthew (24. 15), "standing in the holy place," (let him that readeth—readeth that prophecy, understand.) That "the abomination of desolation" here alluded to was intended to point to the Roman ensigns, as the symbols of an idolatrous, and so unclean Pagan power, may be gathered by comparing what Luke says in the corresponding verse (21. 20; and commentators are agreed on it. It is worthy of notice, as confirming this interpretation, that in 1 Maccabees, 1. 54—which, though Apocryphal Scripture, is authentic history—the expression of Daniel is applied to the idolatrous profanation of the Jewish altar by Antiochus Epiphanes, then is: them that be in Judaea flee to the mountains. The ecclesiastical historian, Eusebius, early in the fourth century, tells us that the Christians fled to Pella, at the northern extremity of Perea, being "prophetically directed"—perhaps by some prophetic intimation more explicit than this, which would be their chart—and that thus they escaped the predicted calamities by which the nation was overwhelmed. 15. And let him that is on the house-top not go down into the house, neither enter therein, to take any thing out of his house:—i.e., let him take the outside flight of steps from the roof to the ground; a graphic way of denoting the extreme urgency of the case, and the danger of being tempted, by the desire to save his property, to delay till escape should become impossible. 16. And let him that is in the field not turn back again for to take up his garment. 17. But was to them—or, 'alas for them,' that are with child, and to them that give suck in those days—in consequence of the aggravated suffering which those conditions would involve. 18. And pray ye that your flight be not in the winter—making escape perilous, or tempting you to delay your flight. Matthew (24. 20) adds, "neither on the Sabbath day," when, from fear of a breach of its sacred rest, they might be induced to remain. 19. For in those days shall be affliction, such as was not from the beginning of the creation which God created unto this time, neither shall be. Such language is not unusual in the Old Testament with reference to tremendous calamities. But it is matter of literal fact, that there was crowded into the period of the Jewish War an amount and complication of suffering perhaps unparalleled; as the narrative of JOSEPHUS, examined closely and arranged under different heads, would show. 20. And except that the Lord and shortened these days, no flesh—i.e., no human life—should be saved; but for the elect's sake, whom he hath chosen, he hath shortened the days. But for this merciful "shortening," brought about by a remarkable concurrence of causes, the whole nation would have perished, in which there yet remained a remnant to be afterwards gathered out. This portion of the prophecy closes, in Luke, with the following vivid and important glance at the subsequent fortunes of the chosen people: "And they shall fall by the sword, and shall be led away captive into all nations: and Jerusalem shall be trodden down of the Gentiles, until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled" Luke, 21. 24). The language as well as the idea of this remarkable statement is taken from Daniel, 9. 10, 13. What, then, is its import here? It implies, first, that a time is coming when Jerusalem shall cease to be "trodden down of the Gentiles;" which it was then by Pagan, and since and till now is by Mohammedan unbelievers; and next, it implies that the period when this treading down of Jerusalem by the Gentiles is to cease will be when "the times of the Gentiles are fulfilled" or "completed." But what does this mean? We may gather the meaning of it from Romans, 11. in which the divine purposes and procedure towards the chosen people from first to last are treated in detail. In v. 25 of that chapter, these words of our Lord are thus reproduced: "For I would not, brethren, that ye should be ignorant of this mystery, lest ye should be wise in your own conceits; that blindness in part is happened to Israel, until the fulness of the Gentiles be come in." See the exposition of that verse, from which it will appear that—"till the fulness of the Gentiles be come in"—or, in our Lord's phraseology, "till the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled"—does not mean 'till the general conversion of the world to Christ,' but 'till the Gentiles have had their full time of that place in the Church which the Jews had before them.' After that period of Gentilium, as before of Judæiam, "Jerusalem" and Israel, no longer "trodden down by the Gentiles" but "grafted into their own olive tree," shall constitute, with the believing Gentiles one Church of God, and fill the whole earth. What a bright vista does this open up! 21. And thus, if any man shall say to you, lo, here is Christ: or, lo, [he is] there; believe him not. So Luke, 17. 23. No one can read Josephus's account of what took place before the destruction of Jerusalem without seeing how strikingly this was fulfilled. To assume, if it were possible, even the elect—implying that this, though all but done, will prove impossible. What a precious assurance! 1. Thessalonians, 2. 9-12. 23. But take ye heed: behold, I have foretold you all things. He had just told them that the seduction of the elect would prove impossible; but since this would be all but accomplished, He bids them be on their guard, as the proper means of averting that catastrophe. In Matthew (24. 26-28) we have some additional particulars: "Wherefore, if they shall say unto you, Behold, He is in the desert; go not forth: behold, He is in the secret chambers; believe it not. For as the lightning cometh out of the east, and shineth even unto the west; so shall also the coming of the Son of man be." See on Luke, 17. 24, 25. "For wheresoever the carcass is, there will the eagles be gathered together." See on Luke, 17. 37. 24. But in those days, after that tribulation—"Immediately after the tribulation of those days" (Matthew, 24. 29); the sun shall be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light. 25. And the stars of heaven shall fall—"and upon the earth distress of nations, with perplexity: the sea and the waves roaring; men's hearts failing them for fear, and for looking after those things which are coming on the earth" (Luke, 21. 25, 26), and the powers that are in heaven shall be shaken. Though the grandeur of this language carries the mind over the head of all periods but that of Christ's Second Coming, nearly every expression will be found used of the Lord's coming in terrible national judgments: as of Babylon (Isaiah, 13. 9-13); of Idumea (Isaiah, 34. 1, 2, 4, 8-10); of Egypt (Ezekiel, 32. 7, 8); compare also Psalms 18. 7-15; Isaiah, 24. 1, 17-19; Joel, 2. 10, 11, &c. We cannot therefore consider the mere strength of this language a proof that it refers exclusively or primarily to the precursors of the final day, though of course in "that day" it will have its most awful fulfilment. 26. And then shall they see the Son of man coming in the clouds with great power and glory. In Matthew, 24. 30, this is given most fully: "And then shall appear the sign of the Son of man in heaven; and then shall all the tribes of the earth mourn, and they shall see the Son of man," &c. That this language finds its highest interpretation in the Second Personal Coming of Christ, is most certain. But the question is, whether that be the primary sense of it as it stands here? Now if the reader will turn to Daniel, 7. 13, 14, and connect with it the preceding verses, he will find, we think, the true key to our Lord's meaning here. There the powers that oppressed the Church—symbolized by rapacious wild beasts—are summoned to the bar of the great God, who as the Ancient of days seats Himself, with His scepter, on a burning Throne; thousand thousands ministering to Him, and ten thousand times ten thousand standing before Him. "The judgment is set, and the books are opened." Who that is guided by the mere words would doubt that this is a description of the Final Judgment? And yet nothing is clearer than that it is not, but a description of a vast temporal judgment, upon organized bodies of men, for their incurable hostility to the kingdom of God upon earth. Well, after the doom of these has been pronounced and executed, and room thus prepared for the unobstructed development of the kingdom of God over the earth, what follows? "I saw in the night visions, and behold, one like the SON OF MAN came with the clouds of heaven, and came to the Ancient of days, and they (the angelic attendants) brought Him near before Him." For what purpose? To receive investiture in the kingdom, which, as Messiah, of right belonged to Him. Accordingly, it is added, "And there was given him dominion, and glory, and a kingdom, that all peoples, nations, and languages should serve Him: His dominion is an everlasting dominion, which shall not pass away, and His kingdom that which shall not be destroyed." Comparing this with our Lord's words, He seems to us, by "the Son of man" (on which phrase, see on John, 1. 51) coming in the clouds with great power and glory," to mean, that when judicial vengeance shall once have been executed upon Jerusalem, and the ground thus cleared for the unobstructed establishment of His own kingdom, His true royal claims and rights would be visibly and gloriously asserted and manifested. See on Luke, 9. 28 (with its parallels in Matthew and Mark), in which nearly the same language is employed, and where it can hardly be understood of anything else than the full and free establishment of the kingdom of Christ on the destruction of Jerusalem. But what is that "sign of the Son of man in heaven?" Interpreters are not agreed. But as before Christ came to destroy Jerusalem some appalling portents were seen in the air, so before His Personal appearing it is likely that something analogous will be witnessed, though of what nature it would be vain to conjecture. 27. And then shall he send his angels—"with a great sound of a trumpet" (Matthew, 24. 31), and shall gather together his elect, &c. As the tribes of Israel were anciently gathered together by sound of trumpet Exodus, 19. 15, 16, 19; Leviticus, 23. 24; Psalms 81. 3-5), so any mighty gathering of God's people, by divine command, is represented as collected by sound of trumpet (Isaiah, 27. 13; cf. Revelation, 11. 15); and the ministry of angels, employed in all the great operations of Providence, is here held forth as the agency by which the present assembling of the elect is to be accomplished. LIGHTFOOT thus explains it: "When Jerusalem shall be reduced to ashes, and that wicked nation cut off and rejected, then shall the Son of man send His ministers with the trumpet of the Gospel, and they shall gather hither the several nations, from the four corners of heaven: so that God shall not want a Church, although that ancient people of His be rejected and cast off; but that ancient Jewish Church being destroyed, a new Church shall be called out of the Gentiles." But though something like this appears to be the primary sense of the verse, in relation to the destruction of Jerusalem, no one can fail to see that the language swells beyond any gathering of the human family into a Church upon earth, and forces the thoughts onward to that gathering of the Church "at the last trump," to meet the Lord in the air, which is to wind up the present scene. Still, this is not in our judgment, the direct subject of the prediction; for the next verse limits the whole prediction to the generation then existing. 28. Now learn a parable of the fig tree—"Now from the fig tree learn the parable," or the high lesson which this teaches: When her branch is yet tender, and putteth forth leaves—"its leaves.' 29. So ye, in like manner, when ye shall see these things come to pass—rather, 'coming to pass,' know that it—"the kingdom of God" (Luke, 21. 31), is nigh, even at the doors—that is, the full manifestation of it; for till then, it admitted of no full development. In Luke (21. 28) the following words precede these: "And when these things begin to come to pass, then look up, and lift up your heads; for your redemption draweth nigh"—their redemption, in the first instance certainly, from Jewish oppression (1 Thessalonians, 2. 14-16; Luke, 11. 52); but in the highest sense of these words, redemption from all the oppressions and miseries of the present state at the Second Appearing of the Lord Jesus. 30. Verily I say unto you, that this generation shall not pass till all these things be done—or "fulfilled" (Matthew, 24. 34; Luke, 21. 32). Whether we take this to mean that the whole would be fulfilled within the limits of the generation then current, or, according to a usual way of speaking, that the generation then existing would not pass away without seeing a beginning fulfilment of this prediction, the facts entirely correspond. For either the whole was fulfilled in the destruction accomplished by Titus, as many think; or if we stretch it out, according to others, till the thorough dispersion of the Jews a little later, under Adrian, every requirement of our Lord's words seems to be met. 31. Heaven and earth shall pass away; but my words shall not pass away—the strongest possible expression of the divine authority by which He spake; not as Moses or Paul might have said of their own inspiration, for such language would be unsuitable in any merely human mouth.

Warnings to Prepare for the Coming of Christ Suggested by the foregoing Prophecy (v. 32-37). It will be observed that, in the foregoing prophecy, as our Lord approaches the crisis of the day of vengeance on Jerusalem, and redemption for the Church—at which stage the analogy between that and the day of final vengeance and redemption waxes more striking—His language rises and swells beyond all temporal and partial vengeance, beyond all earthly deliverances and enlargements, and ushers us resistlessly into the scenes of the final day. Accordingly, in these six concluding verses it is manifest that preparation for "THAT DAY" is what our Lord designs to inculcate. 32. But of that day and that hour—i.e., the precise time, knoweth no man—it, 'no one,' no, not the angels which are in heaven, neither the Son, but the Father. This very remarkable statement regarding "the Son" is peculiar to Mark. Whether it means that the Son was not at that time in possession of the knowledge referred to, or simply that it was not among the things which He had received to communicate—has been matter of much controversy even amongst the firmest believers in the proper Divinity of Christ. In the latter sense it was taken by some of the most eminent of the ancient Fathers, and by LUTHER, MELANCTHON, and most of the elder Lutherans; and it is so taken by BENGL, LANGE, WEBSTER & WILKINSON, CHRYSOSTOM, and others understood it to mean that as Man our Lord was ignorant of this. It is taken literally by CALVIN, GROTIUS, DE WETTE, MEYER, FRITZSCHE, STIER, ALFORD, and ALEXANDER. 33. Take ye heed, watch and pray; for ye know not when the time is. 34. [For the Son of man is] as a man taking a far journey, &c. The idea thus far is similar to that in the opening part of the parable of the talents (Matthew, 25. 14, 16), and commanded the porter—or 'the gate-keeper,' to watch—pointing to the official duty of the ministers of religion to give warning of approaching danger to the people. 35. Watch ye therefore; for ye know not when the master of the house cometh, at even, or at midnight, or at the cock-crowing, or in the morning—an allusion to the four Roman watches of the night. 36. Last, coming suddenly, he find you sleeping. See on Luke, 12.

35-40, 42-46. 37. And what I say unto you—this Discourse, it will be remembered, was delivered in private, I say unto all, Watch—anticipating and requiring the diffusion of His teaching by them amongst all His disciples, and its perpetuation through all time.

CHAPTER XIV.

Ver. 1-11. THE CONSPIRACY OF THE JEWISH AUTHORITIES TO PUT JESUS TO DEATH—THE SUFFER AND THE ANOINTING AT BETHANY—JUDAS AGREES WITH THE CHIEF PRIESTS TO BETRAY HIS LORD. (= Matthew, 26. 1-16; Luke, 22. 1-6; John, 12. 1-11.) The events of this Section appeared to have occurred on the fourth day of the Redeemer's Last Week—the Wednesday.

Conspiracy of the Jewish Authorities to Put Jesus to Death (v. 1, 2). 1. After two days was the feast of the passover, and of unleavened bread. The meaning is, that two days after what is about to be mentioned the Passover would arrive; in other words, what follows occurred two-days before the feast, and the chief priests and the scribes sought how they might take him by craft, and put him to death. From Matthew's fuller account (ch. 26.) we learn that our Lord announced this to the Twelve as follows, being the first announcement to them of the precise time: "And it came to pass, when Jesus had finished all these sayings"—referring to the contents of ch. 24., 25., which He delivered to His disciples; His public ministry being now closed: from His prophetic He is now passing into His Priestly office, although all along Himself took our infirmities and bare our sicknesses—"He said unto His disciples, Ye know that after two days is [the feast of] the Passover, and the Son of man is betrayed to be crucified." The first and the last steps of his final sufferings are brought together in this brief announcement of all that was to take place. The Passover was the first and the chief of the three great annual festivals, commemorative of the redemption of God's people from Egypt, through the sprinkling of the blood of a lamb divinely appointed to be slain for that end; the destroying angel, "when he saw the blood, passing over" the Israelitish houses, on which that blood was seen, when he came to destroy all the first born in the land of Egypt (Exodus, 12.)—bright typical foreshadowing of the great sacrifice, and the Redemption effected thereby. Accordingly, "by the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God, who is wonderful in counsel and excellent in working," it was so ordered that precisely at the Passover-season, "Christ our Passover should be sacrificed for us." On the day following the Passover commenced "the feast of unleavened bread," so called because for seven days only unleavened bread was to be eaten (Exodus, 12. 18-20). See on 1 Corinthians, 5. 6-8. We are further told by Matthew (23. 3) that the consultation was held in the palace of Caiaphas the high priest, between the chief priests, (the scribes), and the elders of the people, how "they might take Jesus by subtlety and kill Him." 2. But they said, Not on the feast [day]—rather, 'not during the feast'; not until the seven days of unleavened bread should be over. lest there be an uproar of the people. In consequence of the vast influx of strangers, embracing all the male population of the land who had reached a certain age, there were within the walls of Jerusalem at this festival some two millions of people; and in their excited state, the danger of tumult and bloodshed among "the people," who for the most part took Jesus for a prophet, was extreme. (See JOSEPHUS, Antiquities, xx. 6. 3.) What plan, if any, these ecclesiastics fixed upon for seizing our Lord, does not appear. But the proposal of Judas being at once and eagerly gone into, it is probable they were till then at some loss for a plan sufficiently quiet and yet effectual. So, just at the least time shall it be Solomon, 1. 12.) very precious—"very costly" (2. 3), and she brake the box, and poured it on his head and anointed," adds John, "the feet of Jesus, and His feet with her hair: and the house was th the odour of the ointment." And Jesus her alone; why trouble ye her! she hath wrought ck on me. It was good in itself, and so was world, in this "Verily I say unto you." 10. And Judas Iscariot, one of the twelve, went unto the chief priests, to betray him unto them—i.e., to make his proposals, and to bargain with them, as appears from Matthew's fuller statement (ch. 26), which says, he "went unto the chief priests, and said, What will ye give me, and I will deliver Him unto you? And they covenanted with him for thirty pieces of silver" (v. 16). The thirty pieces of silver were thirty shekels, the fine paid for man or maid-servant accidentally killed (Exodus, 21. 32), and equal to between four and five pounds sterling—"a goodly price that I was prized at of them" (Zechariah, 11. 13.) 11. And when they heard it, they were glad, and promised to give him money. Matthew alone records the precise sum, because a remarkable and complicated prophecy, which he was afterwards to refer to, was fulfilled by it. And he sought how he might conveniently betray him—or, as more fully given in Luke (22. 6), "And he promised, and sought opportunity to betray Him unto them in the absence of the multitude." That he should avoid an "uproar" or "riot" among the people, which probably was made an essential condition by the Jewish authorities, was thus assented to by the traitor; into whom, says Luke (22. 3), "Satan entered," to put him upon this hellish deed.

12-26. PREPARATION FOR AND LAST CELEBRATION OF THE PASSOVER—ANNOUNCEMENT OF THE TRAITOR—INSTITUTION OF THE SUPPER. (= Matthew, 26. 17-30; Luke, 22. 7-23, 30; John, 13. 21-30.) See on Luke, 22. 7-23, 29; and on John, 13. 10, 11, 19, 21-30.

27-31. THE DESERTION OF JESUS BY HIS DISCIPLES, AND THE FALL OF PETER, FORETOLD. (= Matthew, 26. 31-35; Luke, 22. 31-35; John, 13. 36-38.) See on Luke, 22. 31-46.

32-42. THE AGONY IN THE GARDEN. (= Matthew, 26. 39-46; Luke, 22. 39-46.) See on Luke, 22. 39-46.

63-72. JESUS ARRIGNED BEFORE THE SANHE- DRIM, CONDEMNED TO DIE, AND SHAMEFULLY EN- TREATED—THE FALL OF PETER. (= Matthew, 26. 67-75; Luke, 22. 64-71; John, 18. 19-18, 24-27.) Had we only the first three Gospels, we should have concluded that our Lord was led immediately to Caiaphas, and

Jesus is brought privately before Annas, the Father-in-law of Caiaphas (John, 18, 13, 14). "And they led Him away to Annas first; for he was father-in-law to Caiaphas, which was the high priest that same year." This successful Annas, as ELLICOTT remarks, was appointed high priest by Quirinus A. D. 12, and after holding the office for several years, was deposed by Valerius Gratus, Pilate's predecessor in the procuratorship of Judea (JOS. ANT. Antiquities, xvii. 2, 1, &c). He appears, however, to have possessed vast influence, having obtained the high priesthood, not only for his son Eleazar, and his son-in-law Caiaphas, but subsequently for four other sons, under the last of whom James, the brother of our Lord, was put to death (ib., xx. 9, 1). It is thus highly probable that, besides having the title of "high priest," merely as one who had filled the office, he to a great degree retained the powers he had formerly exercised, and came to be regarded practically as a kind of rightful high priest. 14. "Now Caiaphas was he which gave counsel to the Jews that it was expedient that one man should die for the people." See on John, 11, 60. What passed between Annas and our Lord during this interval the beloved disciple reserves till he has related the beginning of Peter's fall. To this, then, as recorded by our own Evangelist, let us meanwhile listen.

Peter obtains Access within the Quadrangle of the High Priest's Residence, and Warns Himself at the Fire (v. 53, 54, 55). And they led Jesus away to the high priest; and with him were assembled—or rather, "there gathered together unto him," all the chief priests and the scribes and the scribes. It was then a full and formal meeting of the Sanhedrim. Now, as the first three Evangelists place all Peter's denials of his Lord after this, we should naturally conclude that they took place while our Lord stood before the Sanhedrim. But besides that the natural impression is that the scene around the fire took place over-night, the second crowing of the cock, if we are to credit ancient writers, would occur about the beginning of the fourth watch, or between three and four in the morning. By that time, however, the Council had probably convened, being warned, perhaps, that they were to prepare for being called at any hour of the morning, should the Prisoner be successfully secured. If this be correct, it is pretty certain that only the last of Peter's three denials would take place while our Lord was under trial before the Sanhedrim. One thing more may require explanation. If our Lord had to be transferred from the residence of Annas to that of Caiaphas, one is apt to wonder that there is no mention of His being marched from the one to the other. But the building, in all likelihood, was one and the same; in which case He would merely have to be taken, perhaps across the court, from one chamber to another. 54. And Peter followed him afar off, even into—or from afar, even to the interior of, the place of the high priest. "An Oriental house," says ROBINSON, "is usually built around a quadrangular interior court; into which there is a passage (sometimes arched) through the front part of the house, closed next the street by a heavy folding gate, with a smaller wicket for scribe persons, kept by a porter. The interior court, often paved or flagged, and open to the sky, is the hall, which our translators have rendered "palace," where the attendants made a fire; and the passage beneath the front of the house, from the street to this court, is the porch. The place where Jesus stood before the high priest may have been an open room, or place of audience on the ground-floor, in the rear or on one side of the court; such rooms, open in front, being customary. It was close upon the court, for Jesus heard all that was going on around the fire, and turned and looked upon Peter—Luke, 22, 61. And he sat with the servants, and warmed himself at the fire. The graphic details, here omitted, are supplied in the other Gospels. John, 18, 18. "And the servants and officers stood there (that is, in the hall, within the quadrangle, open to the sky), who had made a fire of coals," or "charcoal" (in a brazier probably), "for it was cold." John alone of all the Evangelists mentions the material, and the coldness of the night, as WEBSTER & WILKINSON remark. The elevated situation of Jerusalem, observes THOLUCK, renders it so cold about Easter, as to make a watch-fire at night indispensable. "And Peter stood with them and warmed himself." "He went in (says Matthew, 26, 68), and sat with the servants to see the end." These two minute statements throw an interesting light on each other. His wishing to "see the end," or issue of these proceedings, was what led him into the palace, for he evidently feared the worst. But once in, the serpent-evil is drawn closer; it is a cold night, and why should not he take advantage of the fire as well as others? Besides, in the talk of the crowd about the all-engrossing topic, he may pick up something which he would like to hear. Poor Peter! But now, let us leave him warming himself at the fire, and listening to the hum of talk about this strange case by which the subordinate officials, passing to and fro and crowding around the fire in this open court, would while away the time; and, following what appears the order of the Evangelical Narrative, let us turn to Peter's Lord.

Jesus is Interrogated by Annas—His Dignified Reply—Is Treated with Indignity by one of the Officials—His Mock Rebuke (John, 18, 19-23). We have seen that it is only the Fourth Evangelist who tells us that our Lord was sent to Annas first, over-night, until the Sanhedrim could be got together at earliest dawn. We have now, in the same Gospel, the deeply instructive scene that passed during this non-official interview. 19. "The high priest (Annas) then asked Jesus of His disciples and of His doctrine"—probably to entrap Him into some statements which might be used against Him at the trial. From our Lord's answer it would seem that "His disciples" were understood to be some secret party. 20. "Jesus answered him, I spake openly to the world"—cf. ch. 7, 4. He speaks of His public teaching as now a past thing—as now all over. "I ever taught in the synagogue and in the temple, whither the Jews always resort," courting publicity, though with sublime noiselessness, "and in secret have I said nothing"—rather, "spoke I nothing;" that is, nothing different from what He taught in public; all His private communications with the Twelve being but explanations and developments of His public teaching. (Cf. Isaiah, 45, 19; 45, 16; 21. "Why askest thou Me? ask them which heard Me what I have said to them"—rather, "what I said unto them: "behold, they know what I said." From this mode of replying, it is evident that our Lord saw the attempt to draw Him into self-implication, and resented it by falling back upon the right of every accused party to have some charge laid against Him by competent witnesses. 22. "And when He had thus spoken, one of the officers which stood by struck Jesus with the palm of his hand, saying, Answerest thou the high priest so?" (see Isaiah, 50, 6.) It would seem, from Acts, 23, 2, that this summary and unadorned way of punishing what was deemed insolence in the accused had the sanction even of the high priests themselves. 23. "Jesus answered him, If I have spoken evil"—rather, "If I spake evil," in reply to the high priest, "bear witness of the evil; but if well, why smitest thou Me?" He does not say, "if not evil," as if His reply had been merely unobjectionable; but "if evil," which seems to challenge something altogether fitting in the remonstrance He had addressed to the high priest. From our Lord's procedure here, by the way, it is evident enough that His own precept in the Sermon on the Mount—that when smitten on the one

YEK, LUCKE, THOLUCK. But there are objections to this view. First, We cannot at the natural sense of the whole passage, 13, 14 and 19-21, is that of a preliminary hearing before "Annas first," the particulars are accordingly recorded; and then of a second hearing before "Annas and Caiaphas." The other view, it is not easy to see why it should not have inserted v. 24 immediately; or rather, how he could well have inserted it. As it stands, it is not only quite out of place, but comes in most perplexingly. We take it as a simple statement of fact, Annas had finished his interview with Jesus, recorded in v. 19-23, he transferred him to be formally tried, all is clear and natural. The pluperfect sense "had sent" is in the only; the sense of the original word being "sent." And though there are cases where the pluperfect has the sense of an English pluperfect, it is not to be put upon it unless it be indisputable. Here that is so far from being the case, that the pluperfect 'had sent' is rather a stable interpretation than a simple translation; informing the reader that, according to our translators, our Lord "had been" sent before the interview just recorded by us; whereas, if we translate the verse as it stands, we get just the information we expect, having merely 'preannounced' the prisoner, and sent something out of Him. "sent Him to be formally tried before the proper trial is the view of CHRYSOSTOM and AUGUSTINE the Fathers; and of the moderns, of SCHLEIERMACHER, NEANDER, EBERARD, LANGER, LUTHERARDT. This brings us back to our second Gospel, and in it to the trial and Condemnation of the Lord Sanhedrim (s. 55-64). But let the reader though this is introduced by the Evangelists, the denials of Peter are recorded, and reasons for concluding that probably denials took place while our Lord was in the temple, and the last only during the trial before him, for there is no record of any trial before him. He whose Witness He was and whose work He was doing was keeping him as the apple of His eye, and while He was making the wrath of man to praise Him, was restraining the remainder of that wrath. (Psalm 76: 10. 57. And there arose certain, and bare false witness against him. Matthew 26: 69) is more precise here: "At the last came two false witnesses." As no two had before agreed in anything, they felt it necessary to secure a duplicate testimony to something, but they were long of succeeding. And what was it, when at length it was brought forward, saying, 59. We heard him say, I will destroy this temple that is made with hands, and within three days I will build another made without hands. On this charge, observe, first, that eager as His enemies were to find criminal matter against our Lord, they had to go back to the outset of His ministry, His first visit to Jerusalem, more than three years before this. In all that He said and did after that, though ever increasing in boldness, they could find nothing: Next, that even then, they fix only on one speech, of two or three words, which they dared to adduce against Him: Further, they most manifestly pervert the speech of our Lord. We say not this because in Mark's form of it, it differs from the report of the words given by the Fourth Evangelist (John, 2: 18-22)—the only one of the Evangelists who reports it all, or mentions even any visit paid by our Lord to Jerusalem before his last—but because the one report bears truth, and the other falsehood, on its face. When our Lord said on that occasion, "Destroy this temple, and in three days I will raise it up" they might, for a moment, have understood Him to refer to the temple out of whose courts He had swept the buyers and sellers. But after they had expressed their astonishment at His words, in that sense of them, and reasoned upon the time it had taken to rear the temple as it then stood, since no answer to this appears to have been given by our Lord, it is hardly conceivable that they should continue in the persuasion that this was really His meaning. But finally, even if the more ignorant among them had done so, it is next to certain that the ecclesiastics, who were the prosecutors in this case, did not believe that this was His meaning. For in less than three days after this they went to Pilate, saying, "Sir, we remember that that deceiver said, while see that a very slight turn, either way, given to such words, would make them either something like indictable matter, or else a ridiculous ground for a criminal charge—would either give them a colourable pretext for the charge of impiety which they were bent on making out, or else make the whole saying appear, on the worst view that could be taken of it, as merely some mystical or empty boast. 60. Answerest thou nothing? what is it which these witness against thee? Clearly, they felt that their case had failed, and by this artful question the high priest hoped to get from his own mouth what they had in vain tried to obtain from their false and contradictory witnesses. But in this, too they failed. 61. But he held his peace, and answered nothing. This must have nonplussed them. But they were not to be easily balked of their object. Again the high priest—arose (Matthew, 26, 62), matters having now come to a crisis, and asked him, and said unto him, Art thou the Christ, the Son of the Blessed? Why our Lord should have answered this question, when He was silent as to the former, we might not have quite seen, but for Matthew, who says (26, 63) that the high priest put Him upon solemn oath, saying, "I adjure thee by the living God, that thou tell us whether thou be the Christ, the Son of God." Such an adjuration was understood to render an answer legally necessary (Leviticus, 5, 1). 62. And Jesus said, I am—or, as in Matthew, 26, 64, "Thou hast said [it]." In Luke, however (22, 70), the answer, "Ye say that I am," should be rendered—as DE WETTE, MEYER, ELLIOTT, and the best critics agree that the preposition requires—"Ye say [it], for I am [so]." Some words, however, were spoken by our Lord before giving His answer to this solemn question. These are recorded by Luke alone (22, 67, 68): "Art thou the Christ (they though noble, was not of such primary but to that sublime confession which administration, He witnessed before a competent tribunal on such occasions, the Ecumenical Council of God's chosen nation THE MESSIAH, and THE SON OF THE BLESSED; the former word owning His Supreme Dignity, the latter His Supreme Personal Dignity, high priest rent his clothes. On this horror at blasphemy, see 2 Kings, 18. What need we any further witnesses? 64. In the blasphemy. (See John, 10, 33.) In "For we ourselves have heard of his ostentatious affectation of religious horror, what a verdict is to be." And they all to be guilty of death—or of a capital crimes against God was according to the law (Leviticus, 24, 16). Yet not absolutely of Arimathæus, "a good man and a just man that Council, and 'he was not a counsellor of the counsel and deed of them,'" for the sense of the words of Luke, 23, 50, 51, absented himself, and Nicodemus also, being of the Council, the temper of which I know too well to expect their voice to add in that case, the words of our Lord taken strictly, that, without one dissenting voice, "all (present) condemned Him to be crucified." The Blessed One is now Shamefully Executed.

 Every word here must be carefully observed, several accounts put together, that we of the awful indignities about to be done to our Lord. And some began to spit on him—or, as in Luke, "to spit in [or 'into'] His face." Luke adds, "And the men that held Jesus areth— with Jesus the Nazarene, or, Galilee" (Matthew, 26. 69). The sense in John's report of it (18. 17), "Art not of this man's disciples?" i.e. thou as their disciple," whom she knew to be; challenge, perceiving that he was a man. In Luke (22. 66) it is given as a maid to one of the bystanders—also with Him." If so expressed in—drawing upon him the eyes of every it (as we know it did, Matthew, 26. 70), him to answer to it—that would extent forms of the report naturally; such a case this is of no real importance denied—"before all" (Matthew, 26. saw not, neither understand I what thou, "I know Him not." And he went to—the vestibule leading to the street—g the fire-place too hot for him; possible hope of escaping—but that was not as he dreaded that too. Doubtless, mind would be getting into a sea of would fluctuate every moment in its THE COCK CREW. See on Luke, 22. was the First Denial.

D DENIAL of his Lord (v. 69. 70). There is difference among the Evangelists; some information which has been of be quite extricated. 69. And a maid or, 'a girl.' It might be rendered 'the would not necessarily mean the same but might, and probably does, mean who had charge of the door or gate or now was. Accordingly, in Matthew, readily called "another [maid]." But was servant: "And after a little while of the first denial another"—i.e., as is, 'another male' servant. But there ulty, as the challenge, probably, after y one was reiterated by another. John, it is, "They said therefore unto if more than one challenged him at a to say to them that stood by. This is one n Matthew, 26. 71—"This [fellow] was the Nazarene." 70. And he denied it accused if what he was now to say was not true, and to swear—or to take a solemn oath, saying, I know not this man of whom ye speak. 72. And THE SECOND TIME THE COCK CREW. The other three Evangelists, who mention but one crowing of the cock—and that not the first, but the second and last one of Mark—all say the cock crew "immediately," but Luke says, "Immediately, while he yet spake, the cock crew" (22. 60). Alas!—But now comes the wonderful sequel.

The Redeemer's Look upon Peter, and Peter's Bitter Tears (v. 73; Luke, 22. 61, 62). It has been observed that while the beloved disciple is the only one of the four Evangelists who does not record the repentance of Peter, he is the only one of the four who records the affecting and most beautiful scene of his complete restoration. (John, 21. 16-17.) Luke, 22. 61: "And the Lord turned and looked upon Peter." How it will be asked. We answer, From the chamber in which the trial was going on, in the direction of the court where Peter then stood—in the way already explained. See on v. 63. Our Second Evangelist makes no mention of this look, but dwells on the warning of his Lord about the double crowing of the cock, which would announce his triple fall, as what rushed stingingly to his recollection and made him dissolve in tears. And Peter called to mind the word that Jesus said unto him, Before the cock crow twice, thou shalt deny me thrice. And when he thought thereon, he wept. To the same effect is the statement of the First Evangelist (Matthew, 26. 75), save that like "the beloved physician," he notices the "bitterness" of the weeping. The most precious link, however, in the whole chain of circumstances in this scene is beyond doubt that "look" of deepest, tenderest import reported by Luke alone. Who can tell what lightning flashes of wounded love and piercing reproach shot from that "look" through the eye of Peter into his heart! "And Peter remembered the word of the Lord, how He had said unto him, Before the cock crow, thou shalt deny Me thrice. And Peter went out and wept bitterly." How different from the sequel of Judas's act! Doubtless the hearts of the two men towards the Saviour were perfectly different from the first: and the treason of Judas was but the

to work in it "repentance unto salvation not to be repented of," and at length, under other healing touches, to "restore his soul?" (See on Mark, 16. 7.)

CHAPTER XV.

VER. 1-20. JESUS IS BROUGHT BEFORE PILATE—AT A SECOND HEARING, PILATE, AFTER SEEKING TO RELEASE HIM, DELIVERS HIM UP—AFTER BEING CRUELLY ENTREATED, HE IS LED AWAY TO BE CRUCIFIED. (=Matthew, 26. 1, 2, 11-31; Luke, 23. 1-6, 13-25; John, 18. 28—19. 16.) See on John, 18. 28—19. 16.

21-27. CRUCIFIXION AND DEATH OF THE LORD JESUS. (=Matthew, 27. 32-50; Luke, 23. 26-46; John, 19. 17-30.) See on John, 19. 17-30.

38-47. SIGNS AND CIRCUMSTANCES FOLLOWING THE DEATH OF THE LORD JESUS.—HE IS TAKEN DOWN FROM THE CROSS AND BURIED—THE SEPULCHRE IS GUARDED. (=Matthew, 27. 51-66; Luke, 23. 45, 47-56; John 19. 31-42.) See on Matthew, 27. 51-56; and on John, 19. 31-42.

CHAPTER XVI.

VER. 1-20. ANGELIC ANNOUNCEMENT TO THE WOMEN ON THE FIRST DAY OF THE WEEK, THAT CHRIST IS RISEN—HIS APPEARANCES AFTER HIS RESURRECTION—HIS ASCENSION—TRIONPHANT PROCLAMATION OF HIS GOSPEL. (=Matthew, 28. 1-10. 16-20; Luke, 24. 1-51; John, 20. 1, 2, 11-29.)

The Resurrection Announced to the Women (v. 1-8).
1. And when the sabbath was past—that is, at sunset of our Saturday, Mary Magdalene—see on Luke, 8. 2, and Mary the mother of James—James the Less see on ch. 15. 40, and Salome—the mother of Zebedee's sons cf. ch. 16. 40 with Matthew, 27. 56, had bought sweet spices, that they might come and anoint him. The word is simply 'bought.' But our translators are perhaps right in rendering it here 'had bought,' since it would appear, from Luke, 23. 56, that they had purchased them immediately after the Crucifixion, on the Friday evening, during the short interval that remained to them before sunset, when the Sabbath rest began; and that they had only deferred using them to anoint the body till the Sabbath rest should be over. On this "anointing," see on John, 19. 40. 2. And very early in the morning—see on Matthew, 28. 1, the first day of the week, they came unto the sepulchre at the rising of the sun—not quite literally, but 'at earliest dawn' according to a way of speaking not uncommon, and occurring sometimes in the Old Testament. Thus our Lord rose on the third day; having lain in the grave part of Friday, the whole of Saturday, and part of the following First day. 3. And they said among themselves—as they were approaching the sacred spot, Who shall roll us away the stone from the door of the sepulchre?...for it was very great. 4. In reaching it they find their difficulty gone—the stone already rolled away by an unseen hand. And are there no others who, when advancing to duty in the face of appalling difficulties, find their stone also rolled away? 5. And entering into the sepulchre, they saw a young man. In Matthew, 28. 2, he is called "the angel of the Lord;" but here he is described as he appeared to the eye, in the bloom of a life that knows no decay. In Matthew he is represented as sitting on the stone outside the sepulchre; but since even there he says, "Come, see the place where the Lord lay" (28. 6., he seems, as ALFORD says, to have gone in with them from without; only awaiting their arrival to accompany them into the hallowed spot, and instruct them about it. Sitting on the right side—having respect to the position in which His Lord had lain there. This trait is peculiar to Mark; but cf. Luke, 1. 11. clothed in a long white garment. On its length, see Isaiah, 6. 1; and on its whiteness, see on Matthew, 28. 3. and they were all afraid. 6. And he saith unto them, Be not affrighted—a stronger word than "Fear not" in Matthew. Ye seek Jesus of Nazareth, which was crucified—the Nazarene, the Crucified,' he is risen; he is not here. See on Luke, 24. 5, 6, behold the place where they laid him. See on Matthew, 28. 6, 7. But go your way, tell his disciples and Peter. This Second Gospel, being drawn up—as all the earliest tradition states—under the eye of Peter, or from materials chiefly furnished by him, there is something deeply affecting in the preservation of this little clause by Mark alone, that he goeth before you into Galilee: there shall ye see him, as he said unto you. See on Matthew, 26. 7. 8. And they went out quickly, and fled from the sepulchre: for they trembled and were amazed—'for tremor and amazement seized them,' neither said they any thing to any man: for they were afraid. How intensely natural and simple is this!

Appearances of Jesus After His Resurrection (v. 9-18).
9. Now when Jesus was risen early the first day of the week, he appeared first to Mary Magdalene, out of whom he had cast seven devils. There is some difficulty here, and different ways of removing it have been adopted. She had gone with the other women to the sepulchre v 1., parting from them, perhaps, before their interview with the angel, and on finding Peter and John she had come with them back to the spot; and it was at this second visit, it would seem, that Jesus appeared to this Mary, as detailed in John, 20. 11-18. To a woman was this honour given to be the first that saw the risen Redeemer; and that woman was NOT his virgin-mother. 11. And they, when they had heard that he was alive, and had been seen of her, believed not. This, which is once and again repeated of them all, is most important in its bearing on their subsequent testimony to His resurrection at the risk of life itself. 12. After that he appeared in another form (cf. Luke, 24. 16) unto two of them, as they walked, and went into the country. The reference here, of course, is to His manifestation to the two disciples going to Emmaus, so exultantly told by the third Evangelist (see on Luke, 24. 13, &c.). 13. And they went and told it unto the residue: neither believed them...15. And he said unto them, Go ye into all the world, and preach the Gospel to every creature. See on John, 20. 19-23; and on Luke, 24. 36-49. 16. He that believeth and is baptized. Baptism is here put for the external signature of the inner faith of the heart, just as "confessing with the mouth" is in Romans, 10. 10; and there also as here this outward manifestation, once mentioned as the proper fruit of faith, is not repeated in what follows. Romans, 10. 11). shall be saved; but he that believeth not shall be damned. These awful issues of the reception or rejection of the Gospel, though often recorded in other connections, are given in this connection only by Mark. 17. And these signs shall follow them that believe... 18. They shall take up serpents, &c. These two verses also are peculiar to Mark.

The Ascension and Triumphant Proclamation of the Gospel there after (v. 19-20). 19. So then, after the Lord—an epithet applied to Jesus by this Evangelist only in the two concluding verses, when He comes to His glorious Ascension and its subsequent fruits. It is most frequent in Luke, had spoken unto them, he was received up into heaven. See on Luke, 21. 50, 51. and sat on the right hand of God. This great truth is here only related as a fact in the Gospel History. In that exalted attitude He appeared to Stephen (Acts, 7. 55, 56); and it is thereafter perpetually referred to as His proper condition in glory. 20. And they went forth, and preached every where, the Lord working with them, and confirming the word with signs following. Amen. We have in this closing verse a most important link of connection with the Acts of the Apostles, where He who directed all the movements of the infant Church is perpetually styled "THE LORD;" thus illustrating His own promise for the founding and building up of the Church. "Lo, I AM WITH YOU always!"

CHAPTER I.

appears from the Acts of the Apostles and the Epistles, that the earliest preaching consisted of a brief summary of the facts of earthly history, with a few words of exhortation to the parties addressed. Of these facts, notes would naturally be taken and circulated. It is to such that Luke refers in terms of studied respect, as narrations "believed surely," or "on sure ground," by Christians, and drawn up from the eye-witnesses and ministering servants.

But when he adds that "it seemed good to write in order, having traced down exactness from their first rise," it is as if for his own gospel to supersede these narratives. Accordingly, while not one of them is traced to the wreck of time, this and the other gospels live, and shall live, the only ones of those life-bringing facts which have never been renewed. Apocryphal or spurious gospels, which are unfriendly to the truths exhibited in the true gospels, have not perished; but those which are substantially correct narratives here and only while better were not to be had, were consented to be allowed to merge in the four canonical gospels which from age to age, and with increasing unanimity, have been accepted as the true record of all Christianity. 1. to set forth in simple, "to draw up a narrative," from that is, of His public ministry, as it is at follows, from the very first—that is, the earliest events; referring to those preceding the birth and early life, not only of our Lord's forerunner, which we owe to Luke 1:—or "consecutively"—in contrast, precise and disjointed productions to which he refers. But this must not be pressed too far; referring it with the other gospels, we see that the strict chronological order is not observed in this gospel. Most excellent—or a title of rank applied by this same Luke to Felix and once to Festus (Acts, 25: 26); it is likely, therefore, that "Theophilus" (the name of some city in Greece or Asia) is the name of some city in Greece or Asia (see WEBSTER & WILKINSON) that thou mightest know thoroughly. has been instructed—teaching—ML., "catechized" or "catechetical" first as a catechumen or candidate for baptism.

ASCENTMENT OF THE FORERUNNER. 5. Matthew, 2, 1. course of a day—or Abiathar of the twenty-four orders or courses which divided the priests. See 1 Chron. 24. Of these courses only four returned to the temple (Exra, 2, 36-39), which were again of twenty-four—retaining the ancient name of each. They took the whole temple-charge each. his wife was of the daughters of priests might marry into any tribe, but commendable of all to marry one of the (LIGHTFOOT.) 6. commandments and ordinances expressing their moral—the other obedience. [CALVIN & BENGL.] 20; Hebrews, 9, 1. It has been denied that distinction was known to the Jews and their writers. But Mark, 12, 33, and other passages beyond all reasonable doubt. 7. So and Sarah, Isaac and Rebekah, Elkah, Manoah and his wife. 9. his lot to burn incense—The part assigned to each priest in his week of service was decided by lot. Three were employed at the offering of incense—to remove the ashes of the former service; to bring in and place on the golden altar the pan filled with hot burning coals taken from the altar of burnt-offering; and to sprinkle the incense on the hot coals; and, while the smoke of it ascended, to make intercession for the people. This was the most distinguished part of the service (Revelation, 8, 3), and this was what fell to the lot of Zacharias at this time. [LIGHTFOOT.] 10. praying without—outside the court in front of the temple, where stood the altar of burnt-offering; the men and women in separate courts, but the altar visible to all. the time of incense—which was offered along with the morning and evening sacrifice of every day; a beautiful symbol of the acceptableness of the sacrifice offered on the altar of burnt-offering, with coals from whose altar the incense was burnt (Leviticus, 16, 12, 13). This again was a symbol of the "living sacrifice" of themselves and their services offered daily to God by the worshippers. Hence the language of Psalm 141, 2; Revelation, 8, 3. But that the acceptance of this daily offering depended on the expiatory virtue pre-supposed in the burnt-offering, and pointing to the one "sacrifice of a sweet-smelling savour" (Ephesians, 5, 2), is evident from Isaiah, 6, 6, 7. 11. right side—the south side, between the altar and the candlestick, Zacharias being on the north side, in front of the altar, while offering incense. [WEBSTER & WILKINSON] But why there? The right was the favourable side, Matthew, 25, 33 [SCHOTTGEN & WETSTEIN in MAYER], cf. Mark, 16, 5. 13. thy prayer is heard—doubtless for offspring, which by some presentiment he even yet had not despaired of. John—the same as "Johanan," so frequent in the Old Testament, meaning "Jehovah's gracious gift." 14. shall rejoice—so they did (v. 55, 66; but the meaning rather is, shall have cause to rejoice—it would prove to many a joyful event. 15. great in the sight of the Lord—nearer to Him in official standing than all the prophets. See on Matthew, 11, 10, 11. drink neither wine, &c.—i.e., shall be a Nazarite, or "separated one," Numbers, 6, 2, &c. As the leper was the living symbol of sin, so was the Nazarite of holiness: nothing inflaming was to cross his lips; no razor to come on his head; no ceremonial defilement to be contracted. Thus was he to be "holy to the Lord (ceremonially) all the days of his separation." This separation was in ordinary cases temporary and voluntary: only Samson (Judges, 13, 7), Samuel (1 Samuel, 1, 11), and John Baptist, were Nazarites from the womb. It was fitting that the utmost severity of legal consecration should be seen in Christ's forerunner. He was the REALITY and PERFECTION of the Nazarite without the symbol, which perished in that living realization of it—"Such an High Priest became us, who was SEPARATE FROM SINNERS" (Hebrews, 7, 26), filled with the Holy Ghost from...womb—a holy vessel for future service. 16, 17. A religious and moral reformer, Elijah-like, he should be (Malachi, 4, 5, where the "turning of the people's heart to the Lord" is borrowed from 1 Kings, 18, 37). In both cases their success, though great, was partial—the nation was not gained. before him—before "the Lord their God," v. 16. By comparing this with Malachi, 3, 1, and Isaiah, 40, 3, it is plainly "Jehovah" in the flesh of Messiah [CALVIN & OLSHAUSEN] before whom John was to go as a herald to announce his approach, and a pioneer to prepare his way, in the spirit—after the model, and power of Elias—not his miraculous power, for "John did no miracle" (John, 10, 41), but his power

Both fell on degenerate times; both witnessed fearlessly for God; neither appeared much save in the direct exercise of their ministry; both were at the head of schools of disciples: the success of both was similar. fathers to the children—taken literally, this denotes the restoration of parental fidelity [MEYER, &c.], the decay of which is the beginning of religious and social corruption—one prominent feature of the coming revival being put for the whole. But what follows, explanatory of this, rather suggests a figurative sense. If "the disobedient" be "the children," and to "the fathers" belongs "the wisdom of the just" [BENGEL], the meaning will be, "he shall bring back the ancient spirit of the nation into their degenerate children." [CALVIN, &c.] So Elijah invoked "the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Israel," when seeking to "turn their heart back again" (1 Kings, 18, 36, 37). to make ready, &c.—more clearly, 'to make ready for the Lord a prepared people,' to have in readiness a people prepared to welcome Him. Cesar Augustus—the first of the Roman emperors. all the world—so the vast Roman Empire was termed. taxed—"enrolled," or 'register themselves.' 2. first...when Cyrenius, &c.—a very perplexing verse. Inasmuch as Cyrenius, or Quirinus, appears not to have been governor of Syria for about ten years after the birth of Christ, and the "taxing" under his administration was what led to the insurrection mentioned in Acts, 5, 37. That there was a taxing, however, of the whole Roman Empire under Augustus, is now admitted by all; and candid critics, even of sceptical tendency, are ready to allow that there is not likely to be any real inaccuracy in the statement of our evangelist. Many superior scholars would render the words thus, 'This registration was previous to Cyrenius being governor of Syria'—as the word "first" is rendered in John, 1, 15; 16, 18. In this case, of course, the difficulty vanishes. But it is perhaps better to suppose, with others, that the registration may have been ordered with a view to the taxation, about the time of our Lord's birth, though the taxing itself—an obnoxious measure in Palestine—was not carried out till the time of Caligula. 3. went to

when the Virgin was about to present Him to the Lord. 29, took him up in his arms—immediately recognizing in the child, with unhesitating certainty, the promised Messiah, without needing Mary to inform him of what had happened to her. [ORAUERS.] The remarkable act of taking the babe in his arms must not be overlooked. It was as if he had said, "This is all my salvation and all my desire" (Samuel, 23, 5). 29.

him "God's Salvation." This estimate of an object of sight, an unconscious, helpless babe, was pure faith.

it was prior faith rewarded by present sight. 31, 32, a more comprehensive view of the kingdom of Christ than that of Zacharias, though the kingdom they sing of is one. 34, 35, set—appointed, fall and rising again the former of these clauses expresses the two stages of Nothing is more difficult than to fix the precise order in which the visit of the Magi, with the flight into and return from Egypt (Matthew, 2), are to be taken, in relation to the circumcision and presentation of Christ in the temple, here recorded. So far from entertaining such a thought as laying claim to the honours of Messiahship, the meaneast services I can render to that "Mightier than me that is coming after me," are too high an honour for me. 21, 22. BAPTISM OF AND DESCENT OF THE SPIRIT UPON JESUS. See on Matthew, 3. 13-17. when all the people were baptized—that He might not seem to be merely one of the crowd. Thus, as He rode into Jerusalem upon an ass, "scherone yet never man sat" (ch. 19. 30), and lay in a sepulchre "scherone yet never man yet laid" (John, 19. 41), so in His baptism He would be "separate from sinners."

23-28. GENEALOGY OF JESUS. 23. he began to be about thirty—i. e., 'was about entering on his thirtieth year.' So our translators have taken the word (and so CALVIN, BEZA, BLOOMFIELD, WEBSTER & WILKINSON, &c.); but 'was about thirty years of age when he began [his ministry],' makes better Greek, and is probably the true sense. [BENGEL, OLSHAUSEN, DE WETTE, MEYER, ALFORD, &c.] At this age the priests entered on their office (Numbers, 4. 3). being, as was supposed, the son of Joseph, &c.—Have we in this genealogy, as well as Matthew's, the line of Joseph? or is this the line of Mary?—a point on which there has been great difference of opinion and much acute discussion. Those who take the former opinion contend that it is the natural sense of this verse, and that no other would have been thought of but for its supposed improbability and the uncertainty which it seems to throw over our Lord's real descent. But it is liable to another difficulty, viz., that in this case Matthew makes "Jacob," while Luke makes "Heli," to be Joseph's father; and though the same man had often more than one name, we ought not to resort to that supposition, in such a case as this, without necessity. And then, though the descent of Mary from David would be liable to no real doubt, even though we had no table of her line preserved to us (see, for example, ch. 1, 2-32, and on ch. 2, 5), still it does seem unlikely—we say not incredible—that two genealogies of our Lord should be preserved to us, neither of which gives his real descent. Those who take the latter opinion, that we have here the line of Mary, as in Matthew that of Joseph—here his real, there his reputed line—explain the statement about Joseph, that he was "the son of Heli," to mean that he was his son-in-law, as the husband of his daughter Mary (as in Ruth, 1, 11, 12), and believe that Joseph's name is only introduced instead of Mary's, in conformity with the Jewish custom in such tables. Perhaps this view is attended with fewest difficulties, as it certainly is the best supported. However we decide, it is a satisfaction to know that not a doubt was thrown out by the bitterest of the early enemies of Christianity as to our Lord's real descent from David. On comparing the two genealogies, it will be found that Matthew, writing more immediately Mark, 6, 1-6), we take to be not a late same with this first one; because we see the Nazarenes, after being so enraged by the play of wisdom as to attempt His death on a second display of the same, would how He came by it, as if they had never before, as his custom was—Cf. Acts, 17 to read—Others besides rabbins were dress the congregation. See Acts, 13 have fixed on any passage announcing (as Isaiah, 53.) would have been in early stage of His ministry. The quotation is in Septuagint version, used in the synoptic year—an allusion to the Jubilee (Lev. 25, 10), a year of universal release from property. See also Isaiah, 49, 8; 2 Corin the maladies under which humanity set forth under the names of poverty, war, bondage, blindness, &c.

familiar with his every-day demeanour in life. A most important principle, to which will pay due regard. (See also Matthew 7, 6, on our Lord himself ever acted.) 25-27. But I tell falling back for support on the well-known of Elijah and Elisha (Eliaseus), whose miracle, passing by those who were near, exacted on those at a distance, yea on heathens, great prophets who stand at the commencement of prophetic antiquity, and whose miracles prefigured those of our Lord. As He intended us to feed the poor and cleanse the lepers, He shows these miracles of mercy, and not to the five lepers and the bears that tore the mockers.' 28. three years and six months.—So James, 5, 17, perhaps the six months after the last fall of Jerusalem there would be little or none at any rate; (in 1 Kings, 18, 1, which says the rain returned the third year, that period is probably not reckoned... saying—"but only." (cf. Mark, 15, 32, "Septuaginta" Zarephath, 1 Kings, 17, 9, a heathen between Tyre and Sidon. (See Mark, 7, 26, when they heard these things—these allude to the heathens, just as afterwards with Paul 1 Cor. 10, 18, rose up—broke up the service irreverently of roused forth, thrust him—with violence, as were in their hands. brow, &c.—Nazareth, not built on the ridge of a hill, is in part surely one to the west, having several such precipices; 1 Chronicles, 25, 12; 2 Kings, 9, 33. It was a punishment not unusual among the Jews and others.) This was the first insult which was of God received, and it came from "them of a household" (Matthew, 10, 36.) 30, passing the midst, &c.—evidently in a miraculous way, perhaps quite noiselessly, leading them to afterwards what spell could have come over them they allowed him to escape. PETER'S MOTHER-IN-LAW, AND MANY HEALED. See on Matthew, 8, 14-17. 41, of them set to speak—the marginal reading here is "Our Lord ever refused testimony from devils, a very reason why they were eager to give it, because and they would thus seem to be one interest, enemies actually alleged. (See on Matthew, 12, 10. See also Acts, 16, 16-18.)

JESUS, SOUGHT OUT AT MORNING PRAYER, OBSTINATE TO STAY, DECLINES FROM THE DEUTY OF HIS WORK. See on Mark, 1, 35-39, where we see how early He retired, and how He was endeavoured when they came seeking Him, stayed with them staying him, or sought to do it. What a mission to the Gadarenes! The nature of His mission of Him to keep moving, that all might hear the Gospel. (Matthew, 8, 34.) I must, &c.—but duty will move Him to deny entreaties so grateful to us.

CHAPTER V.

THE MIRACULOUS DRAUGHT OF FISHERY.—PETER, JAMES, AND JOHN.—Not their first ever, recorded John, 1, 35-42; nor their second, Matthew, 4, 18-22; but their third and last ever appointment to the apostleship. That they were all distinct and progressive, seems quite similar stages are observable in other eminent servants of Christ.) 3, taught out of the ship—see on Matthew, 13, 2, 4, for a draught—munificent recompense for the use of his boat. 5, Master—betokening not surely a first acquaintance, but a relationship already formed, all night—the usual time of fishing then (John, 21, 3), and even now Peter, as a fisherman, knew how hopeless it was to "let down his net" again, save as a mere act of faith, "at His word" of command, which carried in it, as it ever does, assurance of success. (This shows he must have been already and for some time a follower of Christ.) 6, net brake—rather "was breaking," or "beginning to break," as v. 7, "beginning to sink." 8, depart, &c.—Did Peter then wish Christ to leave him? Verily no. His all was wrapt up in Him. (John, 6, 68.) 'Twas rather, 'Woe is me, Lord! How shall I abide this blaze of glory? A sinner such as I am is not fit company for Thee.' (cf. Isaiah, 6, 5.) 10, fear not, Simon—this shows how the Lord read Peter's speech. The more highly they deemed of Him, ever the more grateful it was to the Redeemer's spirit. Never did they pain Him by manifesting too lofty conceptions of Him. from henceforth—marking a new stage of their connection with Christ. The last was simply, "I will make you fishers." fishers of men—'What wilt thou think, Simon, overwhelmed by this draught of fishes, when I shall bring to thy net what will beggar all this glory?' See on Matthew, 4, 18. 11, forsok all—They did this before (Matthew, 4, 20; now they do it again; and yet after the Crucifixion they are at their boats once more. (John, 21, 3.) In such a business this is easily conceivable. After Pentecost, however, they appear to have finally abandoned their secular calling.

12-16, LEPER HEALED.—See on Matthew, 8, 2-4. 15, but so, &c.—See on Mark, 1, 45.

17-26, PARALYTIC HEALED.—See on Matthew, 9, 1-8, 17. Pharisees and doctors, sitting by—the highest testimony yet borne to our Lord's growing influence, and the necessity increasingly felt by the ecclesiastics throughout the country of coming to some definite judgment regarding Him. power of the Lord present—with Jesus, to heal them—the sick people. 18, house-top—the flat roof, through the tiling... before Jesus—See on Mark, 2, 2, 24, take up thy couch—sweet saying! The bed had borne the man; now the man shall bear the bed.' [BENJEL.]

27-32, LEVI'S CALL AND FEAST.—See on Matthew, 9, 9-13; and Mark, 2, 14, 30, their scribes—a mode of expression showing that Luke was writing for Gentiles.

33-39, FASTING.—See on Matthew, 9, 14-17. The incongruities mentioned in v. 36-38 were intended to illustrate the difference between the genius of the old and the new economies, and the danger of mixing up the one with the other. As, in the one case supposed, "the rent is made worse," and in the other, "the new wine is spilled," so by a mongrel mixture of the ascetic ritualism of the old with the spiritual freedom of the new economy, both are disfigured and destroyed. The additional parable in v. 39, which is peculiar to Luke, has been variously interpreted. But the "new wine" seems plainly to be the evangelical freedom which Christ was introducing; and the old, the opposite spirit of Judaism; men long accustomed to the latter could not be expected "straightway"—all at once—to take a liking for the former. q. d., "These inquiries about the difference between my disciples and the Pharisees," and even John's, are not surprising; they are the effect of a natural revulsion against sudden change, which time will cure; the new wine will itself in time become old, and so acquire all the added charms of antiquity. What lessons does this teach, on the one hand, to those who unreasonably cling to what is getting antiquated; and, on the other, to hasty reformers who have no patience with the timidity of their weaker brethren!

CHAPTER VI.

Ver. 1-5. FLOCKING CORN EARS ON SABBATH. See on Matthew, 12. 1-8; and Mark, 2. 23-28. 1. Second sabbath after the first—an obscure expression, occurring here only, generally understood to mean, the first Sabbath after the second day of unleavened bread. The reasons cannot be stated here, nor is the opinion itself quite free from difficulty. 5. Lord also—rather 'even,' as Matthew, 12. 8. of the Sabbath—as naked a claim to all the authority of Him who gave the law at Mount Sinai as could possibly be made. q.d. 'I have said enough to vindicate the men ye carp at on my account; but in this place is the Lord of the law, and they have His sanction.' See on Mark, 2. 28.

6-11. WITHERED HAND HEALED. See on Matthew, 12. 9-16; and Mark, 3. 1-7. watched whether, &c.—in Matthew this is put as an ensnaring question of theirs to our Lord, who accordingly speaks to the state of their hearts, v. 9, just as if they had spoken it out. 9. good or evil, save or destroy—By this novel way of putting His case, our Lord teaches the great ethical principle, that to neglect any opportunity of doing good is to incur the guilt of doing evil; and by this law He bound His own spirit. (See on Mark, 3. 4.) 11. filed with madness—the word denotes senseless rage—at the confusion to which our Lord had put them, both by word and deed. what to do with Jesus—not so much whether to get rid of Him, but how to compass it. (see on Matthew, 3. 6.)

12-19. THE TWELVE APOSTLES CHOSEN—GATHERING MULTITUDES—GLORIOUS HEALINGS. 12, 13. went out—probably from Capernaum all night in prayer... and when day, as called, &c.—the work with which the next day began shows what had been the burden of this night's devotions. As He directed His disciples to pray for "labourers" just before sending themselves forth (see on Matthew, 9. 37; 10. 1), so here we find the Lord Himself in prolonged communion with His Father in preparation for the solemn appointment of those men who were to give birth to His Church, and from whom the world in all time was to take a new mould. How instructive is this! 13-16. See on Matthew, 10. 2-4. 17. in the pain—by some rendered 'on a level place,' i.e., a piece of high table-land, by which they understand the same thing, as "on the mountain," where our Lord delivered the sermon recorded by Matthew (6. 1), of which they take this following discourse of Luke to be but an abridged form. But as the sense given in our version is the more accurate, so there are weighty reasons for considering the discourses different. This one contains little more than a fourth of the other; it has verses of its own, as well as the beatitudes common to both; but, above all, that of Matthew was plainly delivered a good while before, while this was spoken after the choice of the twelve, and as we know that our Lord delivered some of His weightiest sayings more than once, there is no difficulty in supposing this to be one of His more extended repetitions; nor could anything be more worthy of it. 19. healed—kept healing, denoting successive acts of mercy till it went over "all" that needed. There is something unusually grand and pictorial in this touch of description. 20, 21. In the Sermon on the Mount the benediction is pronounced upon the "poor in spirit" and those who "hunger and thirst after righteousness." (Matthew, 5. 3, 6.) Here it is simply on the "poor" and the "hungry now." In this form of the discourse, then, our Lord seems to have had in view "the poor of this world, rich in faith, and heirs of the kingdom which God hath promised to them that love him," as these very beatitudes are paraphrased by James (2. 5). laugh—how charming is the liveliness of this word, to express what in Matthew is called being "comforted" separate you—whether from their Church, by excommunication, or from their society; both hard to flesh and blood. 23. for the Son of Man's sake—cf. Matthew, 6. 11. "for MY SAKE"; and immediately before, "for righteousness' sake" (v. 10.) Christ thus binds up the cause of righteousness in the world with the redemption of Himself. 23. leap for joy—a livelier word than "be exceeding glad" or 'exult.' Matthew, 6. 12. 24, 25. rich... full... laugh—who have all their good things and joyous feelings here and now, in perishable objects, received your consolation—see on ch. 16. 25. shall hunger—their inward craving strong as ever, but the materials of satisfaction for ever gone. 26. all speak well of you—alluding to the court paid to the false prophets of old. (Micah, 2. 11.) For the principle of this woe, and its proper limits, see John, 15. 19. 27-36. See on Matthew, 5. 44-48; 7. 19; and 14. 12-14. 37, 38. See on Matthew, 7. 1. 2; but this is much fuller and more graphic. 39. can the blind, &c.—not in the Sermon on the Mount, but recorded by Matthew in another and very striking connection, ch. 14. 14. 40. the disciple, &c.—q.d. 'The disciple's aim to come up to his master, and he thinks himself complete when he does so: if you then be blind leaders of the blind, the perfection of one's training under you will only lead him the more certainly in one common ruin with yourselves.' 41-49. See on Matthew, 7. 2-6, 18-27.

CHAPTER VII.

Ver. 1-10. CENTURION'S SERVANT HEALED. See on Matthew, 8. 5-13. 4. he was worthy, &c.—a testimony most precious, coming from those who probably were strangers to the principle from which he acted. (Ecclesiastes, 7. 1.) loveth our nation—having found that "salvation was of the Jews," he loved them for it, built, &c.—his love took this practical and appropriate form.

11-17. WIDOW OF NAIN'S SON RAISED TO LIFE. (In Luke only.) 11. Nain—a small village not elsewhere mentioned in scripture, and only this once probably visited by our Lord; it lay a little to the south of mount Tabor, about twelve miles from Capernaum. 12. carried out—was being carried out; dead bodies, being ceremonially unclean, were not allowed to be buried within the cities (though the kings of David's house were buried in the city of David), and the funeral was usually on the same day as the death. only son, &c.—affecting particulars, told with delightful simplicity. 13, 14. the Lord—This sublime appellation is more usual with Luke and John than Matthew; Mark holds the mean. (BENGEL.) saw her, had compassion, &c.—What consolation to thousands of the bereaved has this single verse carried from age to age. 14, 15. What mingled majesty and grace shines in this scene! The Resurrection and the Life in human flesh, with a word of command, bringing back life to the dead body; Incarnate Compassion summoning its absolute power to dry a widow's tears! 16. visited his people—more than bringing back the days of Elijah and Elisha. (1 Kings, 17. 17-24; 2 Kings, 4. 32-37; and see on Matthew, 15. 31.)

18-35. THE BAPTIST'S MESSAGE, THE REPLY, AND CONSEQUENT DISCOURSE. See on Matthew, 11. 2-14. 29, 30. and all the people that heard—on bearing this; These are the observations of the evangelist, not of our Lord, and the publicans—a striking clause. justified God, being baptized, &c.—rather, 'having been baptized.' The meaning is, They acknowledged the Divine wisdom of such a preparatory ministry as John's, in leading them to Him who now spake to them (see ch. 1. 16, 17); whereas the Pharisees and lawyers, true to themselves in refusing the baptism of John, set at naught also the merciful design of God in the Saviour himself, to their own destruction. 31-35. the Lord said, &c.—As cross, capricious children, invited by their playmates to join them in their amusements, will play with them neither at weddings nor funerals (juvenile imitations of the joyous and mournful scenes of life, so that gene-him rejected both John and his Master: the one cause he was too unsocial—more like a demonic or a rational man; the other, because he was too rich the reverse, given to animal indulgences, and sporting with the lowest classes of society. But the Disciples of Wisdom recognise and honour her whether the austere carb of the Baptist or in the more attractive style of his Master, whether in the Law or in the Gospel, whether in rags or in royalty: for "the full soul flesh as honeycomb, but to the hungry soul every her thing is sweet." (Proverbs, 27. 7.)

650. CHRIST'S FEET WASHED WITH TEARS. 37, a sinner—one who had led a profligate life. N.B.—there is no ground whatever for the popular notion that the woman was Mary Magdalene, nor do we know at her name was. See on ch. 8. 2. an alabaster box ointment—a perfume-vessel, in some cases very costly (see 12. 5). The ointment has here a peculiar interest, as the offering by a penitent of what had been an accessory in her unhalloved work of sin. [ALFORD.] His feet beside him—the posture at meals being a sitting one, with the feet out behind. began to wash,—to "water with a shower." The tears, which were the evangelical, poured down in a flood upon His feet, as she bent down to kiss them; and deeming him rather fouled than washed by this, she hastened to wipe them off with the only towel she had, the long sash of her own hair, "with which slaves were wont to wash their masters' feet." (STIER.) Kissed—the oil signifies "to kiss fondly," to caress, or to "kiss sin and again," which v. 45 shows is meant here. Had prompted this? Much love, springing from a sense of much forgiveness. So says He who knew her art, v. 47. Where she had met with Christ before, what words of His had brought life to her dead heart of a sense of Divine pardon to her guilty soul, we do not. But probably she was of the crowd of publicans and sinners "whom Incarnate Compassion saw so often around Him, and heard from His lips one of those words such as never man spake, "Come ye all ye that labour, &c. No personal interview of up to this time taken place between them; but she did keep her feelings no longer to herself, and having said her way to Him and entered along with him, 48, they burst forth in this surpassing yet most artistic style, as if her whole soul would go out to Him. The Pharisee—who had formed no definite opinion of our Lord, and invited Him apparently to obtain materials for a judgment, spoke within himself, &c.—that I have Him now; He plainly knows nothing of the error He allows to touch Him, and so, He can be no prophet. Not so fast, Simon; thou hast not seen enough thy Guest yet, but He hath seen through thee. 43. Like Nathan with David, our Lord conceals His message thrust under the veil of a parable, and makes his host himself pronounce upon the case. The two sisters are the woman and Simon; the criminality of the one was ten times that of the other (in the proportion of "500" to "50"); but both being equally insolent, both are with equal frankness forgiven; and mercy is made to own that the greatest debtor to redemptive mercy will cling to her Divine Benefactor with the deepest gratitude. Does our Lord then admit that Simon was a forgiven man? Let us see. 45-47. I started, no water—a compliment to guests. Was this much love? Was it any? no kiss—of salutation, low much love was here? Any at all? with oil...not saint—even common olive-oil in contrast with the woman's "ointment" or aromatic balsam. What evidence was thus afforded of active feeling which forgiveness prompts? Our Lord speaks this with delicate delicateness, as if hurt at these inattentions of His host, rich though not invariably shown to guests, were customary marks of studied respect and regard. The inference is plain—only one of the debtors was really forgiven, though in the first instance, to give room for the play of withheld feelings, the forgiveness of both is supposed in the parable. Her sins which are many—'those many sins of hers,' our Lord, who admitted how much more she owed than the Pharisee, now proclaims in naked terms the forgiveness of her guilt. for—not because, as if love were the cause of forgiveness, but 'inasmuch as,' or 'in proof of which.' The latter clause of the verse, and the whole structure of the parable, plainly shows this to be the meaning. little forgiven—loveth little—delicately ironical intimation of no love and no forgiveness in the present case. 48. said unto her, &c.—an unsought assurance, usually springing up unexpected in the midst of active duty and warm affections, while often it flies from those who hope and are paralyzed for want of it. 49, 50. they that sat...who is this? &c.—no wonder they were startled to hear One who was reclining at the same couch, and partaking of the same hospitalities with themselves, assume the awful prerogative of 'even forgiving sins.' But so far from receding from this claim, or softening it down, our Lord only repeats it, with two precious additions: one, announcing what was the one secret of the "forgiveness" she had experienced, and which carried "salvation" in its bosom; the other, a glorious dismissal of her in that "peace" which she had already felt, but is now assured she has His full warrant to enjoy! This wonderful scene teaches two very weighty truths: (1.) though there be degrees of guilt, insolency, or inability to wipe out the dishonour done to God, is common to all sinners. (2.) As Christ is the Great Creditor to whom all debt, whether great or small, contracted by sinners is owing, so to Him belongs the prerogative of forgiving it. This latter truth is brought out in the structure and application of the present parable as it is no where else. Either then Jesus was a blasphemous deceiver, or He is God manifest in the flesh.

CHAPTER VIII.

Ver. 1-3. A GALILEAN CIRCUIT, WITH THE TWELVE AND CERTAIN MINISTERING WOMEN. (In Luke only.) went—'travelled,' 'made a progress,' throughout every city and village—'through town and village,' preaching, &c.—the Prince of itinerant Preachers scattering far and wide the seed of the Kingdom. certain women healed, &c.—on whom He had the double claim of having brought healing to their bodies and new life to their souls. Drawn to Him by an attraction more than magnetic, they accompany Him on this tour as His ministering—ministering unto Him of their substance. Blessed Saviour! it melts us to see Thee living upon the love of Thy ransomed people. That they bring Thee their poor offerings we wonder not. Thou hast sown unto them spiritual things, and they think it, as well they might, a small thing that Thou shouldst reap their carnal things. (1 Corinthians, 9. 11.) But dost Thou take it at their hand, and subside upon it? 'O the depth of the riches'—of this poverty of His. Mary Magdalene—i.e., probably, of Magdala, on which see Matthew, 15. 39. went—rather 'had gone.' seven days—Mark, 16. 9.) It is a great wrong to this honoured woman to identify her with the once profligate woman of ch. 7. 37, and to call all such penitents Magdalenes. The mistake has arisen from confounding unhappy demoniacal possession with the conscious entertainment of diabolic impurity, or supposing the one to have been inflicted as a punishment for the other—for which there is not the least scriptural ground. Joanna, wife of Chusa, Herod's steward—If the steward of such a godless, cruel, and licentious wretch as Herod Antipas (see on Mark, 6. 14, &c.) differed greatly from himself, his post would be no easy or enviable one. That he was a disciple of Christ is very improbable, though he might be favourably disposed towards Him. But what we know not of him, and may fear he wanted, we are sure his wife possessed. Healed either of 'evil spirits' or of some one of the "infirmities" here referred to—the ordinary diseases of humanity—she joins in the Saviour's train of grateful, clinging followers. Of "Susanna" next mentioned, we know nothing but the name, and that here only. But her services on this memorable occasion have immortalized her name. "Whosoever this gospel shall be preached throughout the whole world, this also that she hath done," in ministering to the Lord of her substance on His Galilean tour, "shall be spoken of as a memorial of her." (Mark, 14. 9.) many others—i. e., many other healed women. What a train! and all ministering unto Him of their substance, and He allowing them to do it and subsisting upon it! He who was the support of the spiritual life of His people disdained not to be supported by them in the body. He was not ashamed to penetrate so far into the depths of poverty as to live upon the alms of love. He only fed others miraculously; for Himself, He lived upon the love of His people. He gave all things to men, His brethren, and received all things from them, enjoying thereby the pure blessing of love; which is then only perfect when it is at the same time both giving and receiving. Who could invent such things as these? It was necessary to live in this manner that it might be so recorded. [OLSHAUSEN.]

4-16. PARABLE OF THE SOWER.—See on Mark, 4. 3-9, 14-20. 16. No man, &c.—See on Matthew, 6. 15, of which this is nearly a repetition. 17. for nothing, &c.—See on ch. 12. 2. 18. how ye—in Mark, 4. 24, "what ye hear." The one implies the other. The precept is very weighty, seemeth to have—or, "thinketh that he hath." (Margin,) this "having" of Matthew, 13. 12 (on which see), and this "thinking he hath," are not different. Hanging loosely on him, and not appropriated, it is and is not his.

19-21. HIS MOTHER AND BRETHREN DESIRE TO SPEAK WITH HIM.—See on Mark, 12. 46-50.

22-25. JESUS, CROSSING THE LAKE, STILLS THE STORM.—See on Matthew, 8. 23-27, and Mark, 4. 35-41. 23. filled—fit., 'were getting filled,' i. e., those who sailed; meaning that their ship was so.

26-29. DEMONIAK OF GADARA HEALED.—See on Matthew, 8. 28-34; and Mark, 5. 1-20.

40-36. JAIRUS' DAUGHTER RAINED, AND ISSUE OF BLOOD HEALED.—See on Matthew, 9. 18-26; and Mark, 5. 21-41. 40. gladly received him, for... all waiting him.—The abundant teaching of that day in Matthew, 13; and see Mark, 4. 36.) had only whetted the people's appetite; and disappointed, as would seem, that He had left them in the evening to cross the lake, they remain hanging about the beach, having got a hint probably through some of His disciples that He would be back the same evening. Perhaps they witnessed at a distance the sudden calming of the tempest. Here at least they are, watching for His return, and welcoming Him to the shore. The tide of His popularity was now fast rising. 45. Who touched me?—'Askest Thou, Lord, who touched Thee? Father ask who touched Thee not in such a throne.' 46. somebody touched—yes, the multitude "around and pressed Him"—"they soiled against Him, but all involuntarily; they were merely carried along;" but one, one only—somebody—TOUCHED HIM," with the conscious, voluntary, dependent touch of faith, reaching forth its hand expressly to have contact with Him. This and this only Jesus acknowledges and seeks out. Even so, as the Church father AUGUSTIN long ago said, multitudes still come similarly close to Christ in the means of grace, but all to no purpose, being only sucked into the crowd. The voluntary, living contact of faith is that electric conductor which alone draws virtue out of Him. 47. declared before all—this, though a great trial to the shrinking modesty of the believing woman, was just what Christ wanted in drawing her forth, her public testimony to the facts of her case—both her disease, with her abortive efforts at a cure, and the instantaneous and perfect relief which her touch of the Great Healer had brought her. 55. give her meat—See on Mark, 6. 43.

CHAPTER IX.

VER. 1-6. MISSION OF THE TWELVE APOSTLES. See on Matthew, 10. 1-15. 1. power and authority—He both qualified and authorized them.

7-9. HEROD TROUBLED AT WHAT HE HEARS OF CHRIST, DESIRES TO SEE HIM. See on Mark, 6. 16-29. 7. perplexed—"at a loss," 'embarrassed,' said of some that John was risen—among many opinions, this was the one which Herod himself adopted, for the reason, no doubt, mentioned on Mark, 6. 14. desired to see him—but did not, till as a prisoner He was sent to him by Pilate just before His death, as we learn from ch. 23. 8. 10-17. ON THE RETURN OF THE TWELVE, JESUS RETIRES WITH THEM TO BETSaida, AND THERE MIRACULOUSLY FEEDS FIVE THOUSAND. See on Mark, 6. 31-44.

18-27. PETER'S CONFESSIOIN OF CHRIST—OUR LORD'S FIRST EXPLICIT ANNOUINCMENT OF HIS APPROACHING DEATH, AND WARNING ARISING OUT OF IT. See on Matthew, 16. 13-26; and Mark, 8. 24. 24. will save—"is minded to save," bent on saving. The pith of this maxim depends—as often in such weighty sayings (for example, "Let the dead bury their dead," Matthew, 8. 21)—on the double sense attached to the word "life," a lower and a higher, the natural and the spiritual, temporal and eternal. An entire sacrifice of the lower, or a willingness to make it, is indispensable to the preservation of the higher life; and he who cannot bring himself to surrender the one for the sake of the other shall eventually lose both. 26. ashamed of me and of my words—the sense of shame is one of the strongest in our nature, one of the social affections, founded on our love of reputation, which causes instinctive aversion to what is fitted to lower it, and was given us as a preservative from all that is properly shameful. When one is, in this sense of it, lost to shame, he is nearly past hope. (Zechariah, 3. 5; Jeremiah, 6. 15; 3. 3.) But when Christ and "His words"—Christianity, especially in its more spiritual and uncompromising features—is unpopular, the same instinctive desire to stand well with others begets the temptation to be ashamed of Him which only the "expulsive power" of a higher affection can effectually counteract. Son of Man be ashamed when he cometh, &c.—He will render to that man his own treatment; He will disgrace him before the most august of all assemblies, and put him to "shame and everlasting contempt." (Daniel, 12. 2.) "O shame, to be put to shame before God, Christ, and angels." (BENGER.) 27. not taste of death till they see the kingdom of God—"see it come with power" (Mark, 9. 1.); or see "the Son of Man coming in His kingdom" (Matthew, 16. 28). The reference, beyond doubt, is to the firm establishment and victorious progress, in the life-time of some then present, of that new Kingdom of Christ, which was destined to work the greatest of all changes on this earth, and be the grand pledge of His final coming in glory.

28-36. JESUS TRANSFIGURED. 28. as eight days after these sayings—including the day on which this was spoken and that of the Transfiguration. Matthew and Mark say "after six days," excluding these two days. As the "sayings" so definitely connected with the Transfiguration scene are those announcing His death—at which Peter and all the Twelve were so startled and scandalised, so this scene was designed to show to the eyes as well as the heart how glorious that death was in the view of Heaven.  Him, we cannot choose but tell Him that what is the depth of shame to Him is covered with glory in the eyes of heaven, that the Cross to Him is the Crown to us, that that "decease" is all our salvation and all our desire.' And who can doubt that such a scene did minister deep cheer to that spirit? 'Tis said they "talked" not to Him but "with Him," and if they told Him how glorious His decease was, might He not fitly reply, 'I know it, but your voice, as messengers from heaven come down to tell it me, is music in mine ears.'

 be 'but having kept awake.' [MEYER, ALFORD.] Perhaps 'having roused themselves up' (OLAHUSEN) may come near enough the literal sense; but from the word used we can gather no more than that they shook off their drowsiness. It was night, and the Lord seems to have spent the whole night on the mountain (v. 37, saw his glory, &c.—the emphasis lies on "saw," qualifying them to become 'eye-witnesses' of His majesty" (2 Peter, 1, 16). cately, alone. 36. Jesus found alone—Moses and Elias are gone. Their work is done, and they have disappeared from the scene, feeling no doubt with their fellow-servant the Baptist, "He must increase, but I must decrease." The cloud too is gone, and the naked majestic Christ, braced in spirit, and enshrined in the reverent affection of His disciples, is left—to suffer! kept it close—feeling, for once at least, that such things were unmeet as yet for the general gaze.

 'mightiness' of God in this last miracle, the Transfiguration, &c.; the divine grandeur of Christ rising

 Mark, 9, 30, we gather that this had been the subject of conversation between the twelve and their Master as they journeyed along. these sayings—not what was passing between them about His grandeur (MEYER, &c.), but what He was now to repeat for the second time about His sufferings. [DE WETTE, STRIET, AL-FORD, &c.] q. d. 'Be not carried off your feet by all this grandeur of Mine, but bear in mind what I have already told you, and now distinctly repeat, that that Sun in whose beams ye now rejoice is soon to set in midnight gloom.' "The Son of man," says Christ, "into the hands of men"—a remarkable antithesis (also in Matthew, 17, 22, and Mark, 9, 31), and they feared —"inasmuch that they feared." Their most cherished ideas were so completely dashed by such announcements, that they were afraid of laying themselves open to rebuke by asking Him any questions.

46-48. STRIFE AMONG THE TWELVE, WHO SHOULD BE GREATEST—JOHN REBUKED FOR EXCLUSIVENESS.
 46-48.—See on Matthew, 18, 1-5. 49, 50. John answered, &c.—The link of connection here with the foregoing context lies in the words "in My name" (v. 48). 'O, as to that [said John, young, warm, but not sufficiently apprehending Christ's teaching in these things], We saw one casting out devils "in Thy name," and we forbade him; Were we wrong?' 'Ye were wrong.'

'But we did "because he followeth not us." 'No matter. For (1.) "There is no man which shall do a miracle in my name that can lightly (or 'soon') speak evil of Me." Mark, 9, 39. And (2.) If such a person cannot be supposed to be "against us," you are to hold him "for us." Two principles of immense importance. Christ does not say this man should not have followed "with them," but simply teaches how he was to be regarded though he did not—as a reverer of His name and a promoter of His cause. Surely this condemns not only those horrible attempts by force to shut up all within one visible pale of discipleship, which have deluged Christendom with blood in Christ's name, but the same spirit in its milder form of proud ecclesiastic scowl upon all who "after the form which they call a sect as the word signifies, Acts, 24, 14, do so worship the God of their fathers." Visible unity in Christ's Church is devoutly to be sought, but this is not the way to it. See the noble spirit of Moses, Numbers, 11, 34-29.

51-6. THE PERIOD OF HIS ASSUMPTION APPROACHING, CHRIST TAKES HIS LAST LEAVE OF GALILEE—THE SAMARITANS REFUSE TO RECEIVE HIM. 51. the time was come—rather, 'the days were being fulfilled,' or approaching their fulfilment, that he should be received up—'of His assumption,' meaning His exaltation to the Father; a sublime expression, taking the sweep of His whole career, as if at one bound He was about to vault into glory. The work of Christ in the flesh is here divided into (see great stages; all that preceded this belonging to the one, and all that follows it to the other. During the one, He formally "came to His own," and "would have gathered them;" during the other, the awful consequences of "His own receiving Him not" rapidly revealed themselves. he steadfastly set his face—the "He" here is emphatic—'He Himself then.' See His own prophetic language, "I have set my face like a flint," Isaiah, 50, 7. go to Jerusalem—as His goal, but including His preparatory visits to it at the feasts of Tabernacles and of Dedication John, 7, 2, 10; and 22, 23, and all the intermediate movements and events. 52. messengers before his face—to make ready for him—He had not done this before; but now, instead of avoiding, He seems to court publicity—all now hastening to maturity. 53. did not receive Him, because, &c.—the Galileans, in going to the festivals at Jerusalem, usually took the Samaritan route JOSEPHUS, Antiquities, xx. 6, 1), and yet seem to have met with no such inhospitality. But if they were asked to prepare quarters for the Messiah, in the person of one whose "face was as though he would go to Jerusalem," their national prejudices would be raised at so marked a slight upon their claims. (See on John, 4, 20.) 54. James and John—not Peter, as we should have expected, but the "sons of thunder" Mark, 3, 17, who afterwards would have all the highest honours of the Kingdom to themselves, and the younger of whom had been rebuked already for his exclusiveness e. 19, 50. Yet this was "the disciple whom Jesus loved," while the other willingly drank of His Lord's bitter cup. See on Mark, 10, 38-40, and Acts, 12, 2. That same fiery zeal, in a mellowed and hallowed form, in the beloved disciple, we find in 2 John, 10, and 3 John, 10. fr. as Euseb.—a plausible case, occurring also in Samarita. (2 Kings, 1, 10-12, 55, 56, know not what spirit, &c.—The thing ye demand, though in keeping with the legal, is unsuited to the genius of the evangelical dispensation. The sparks of unholy indignation would seize readily enough on this example of Elias, though our Lord's rebuke (as is plain from v. 56, is directed to the principle involved rather than the animal heat which doubtless prompted the reference. "It is a golden sentence of Tillotson, Let us never do anything for religion which is contrary to religion." [WILKINSON & WILKINSON,] for the Son

THE IRRESOLUTE DISCIPLE. I will follow...but—The second disciple had a "but" too—a difficulty in the way just then. Yet the different treatment of the two cases shows how different was the spirit of the two, and to that our Lord addressed Himself. The case of Eliab (1 Kings, 19, 19-21), though apparently similar to this, will be found quite different from the "looking back" of this case, the best illustration of which is that of those Hindu converts of our day who, when once persuaded to leave their spiritual fathers in order to "bid them farewell which are at home at their house," very rarely return to them. no man, &c.—As ploughing requires an eye intent on the furrow to be made, and is marred the instant one turns about, so will they come short of salvation who prosecute the work of God with a distracted attention, a divided heart. Though the reference seems chiefly to ministers, the application is general. The expression "looking back" has a manifest reference to "Lot's wife." (Genesis, 19, 26; and see on ch. 17, 32.) It is not actual return to the world, but a reluctance to break with it.

CHAPTER X.

Ver. 1-24. MISSION OF THE SEVENTY DISCIPLES, AND THEIR RETURN. AS OUR Lord's end approaches, the preparations for the establishment of the coming Kingdom are quickened and extended. 1. the Lord—a becoming title here, as this appointment was an act truly lordly. [BERGEL.] other seventy also—rather 'others (also in number), 70,' probably with allusion to the seventy elders of Israel on whom the Spirit descended in the wilderness. (Numbers, 11, 24, 26.) The mission, unlike that of the Twelve, was evidently quite temporary. All the instructions are in keeping with a brief and hasty pioneering mission, intended to supply what of general preparation for coming events the Lord's own visit afterwards to the same "cities and places" (v. 1) would not, from want of time now suffice to accomplish; whereas the instructions to the Twelve, besides embracing all those to the seventy, contemplate world-wide and permanent effects. Accordingly, after their return from this single missionary tour, we never again read of the seventy. 2. the harvest, &c.—see on Matthew, 9, 37, 38. 3-12. See on Matthew, 10, 7-16. son of peace—inwardly prepared to embrace your message of peace. See note on "worthy," Matthew, 10, 13. 12-15. See on Matthew, 11, 20-24. fr. Socom—Tyre and Sidon were ruined by commercial prosperity; Sodom sank through its vile pollutions; but the doom of otherwise correct persons who, amidst a blaze of light, reject the Saviour shall be less endurable than that of any of these. 16. he that, &c. See on Matthew, 10, 40. 17. returned—evidently not long away. Lord, &c.—Thou hast exceeded Thy promise, for "even the devil," &c. The possession of such power, not being expressly in their commission, as in that to the Twelve (ch. 9, 1), filled them with more astonishment and joy than all else. in thy name—taking no credit to themselves, but feeling lifted into a region of unimagined superiority to the powers of evil simply through their connexion with Christ. 18. I behold—As much of the force of this glorious statement depends on the nice shade of sense indicated by the imperfect tense in the original, it should be brought out in the translation:—"I was beholding Satan as lightning falling from heaven:" q. d., 'I followed you on your mission, and watched its triumphs; while you were

ly from the particular to the general, but temporary form of satanic operation to the man of evil. (See John, 12. 31; and cf. Isaiah, 49. 1.) I give you, &c.—not for any renewal on, though probably many of them afterwards ministers of Christ; but simply as disintegrators and scorpions—the latter more veno- mous former; literally, in the first instance 18; Acts, 26. 6; but the next words, "and power of the enemy, and nothing shall by- pass you," show that the glorious power overcame the world and "quench all the wicked one," by the communication of which to his people He makes one, in what is meant. (1 John, 6. 4; Ephe- 3. 12.) Rejoice not, &c.—i.e., not so much. So adding it, He takes occasion from it to what had been passing in His own mind. But the demon was after all intoxicating. He higher joy to balance it, the joy of having in heaven's register. (2.) There it "at that time (or season)" that he spoke with a general reference to the rejection by the self-sufficient; here, "In that hour with express reference probably to the hour from which He had had to draw the similar class that had chiefly wel- come. "Rejoice" is too weak a word. "Rejoice in spirit"—evidently giving visible ex- pression to unusual emotions, while, at the same time "in spirit" are meant to convey to the hearers the fact. This is one of those rare instances where the veil is lifted from off the Redeemer's face, as, angel-like, we may "look into it" for (1 Peter, 1. 12.) Let us gaze on it with re- verence, and as we perceive what it was that brought about this mysterious ecstasy, we shall find rising in our hearts a still rapture—"O the depths!" 23, 24. So might the Samaritan have reasoned, but did not.' (TRENCH.) Nor did he say, He's a Jew, who would have had no dealings with me (John, 4. 9), and why should I with him? oil and wine—the remedies used in such cases all over the East (Isaiah, 1. 6), and else- where; the wine to cleanse the wounds, the oil to assuage their smartings, on his own beast—himself going on foot. 35. two pence—equal to two days' wages of a labourer, and enough for several days' support. 36. Which was neighbour?—a most dexterous way of putting the question: (1.) Turning the question from 'Whom am I to love as my neighbour?' to 'Who is the man that shows that love?' (2.) Compelling the lawyer to give a reply very different from what he would like—not only condemning his own nation, but those of them who should be the most exemplary. (3.) Making him commend one of a deeply-hated race. And he does it, but it is almost extorted. For he does not answer, 'The Samaritan'—that would have sounded heterodox, heretical—but "He that showed mercy on him." It comes to the same thing, no doubt, but the circumlocution is significant. 37. Go, &c.—O exquisite, match- less teaching! What new fountains of charity has not this opened up in the human spirit—rivers in the wil- derness, streams in the desert! what noble Christian Institutions have not such words founded, all un- dreamed of till that wondrous One came to bless this heartless world of ours with His incomparable love—first in words, and then in deeds which have trans- lated His words into flesh and blood, and poured the life of them through that humanity which He made His own! Both were true-hearted disciples, but the one was absorbed in the higher, the other in the lower of two ways of honouring their common Lord. Yet neither despised, or would willingly neglect, the other's occupation. The one represents the contemplative, the other the active style of the Christian character. A church full of Marias would perhaps be as great an evil as a church full of Marthas. Both are needed, each to be the complement of the other.

CHAPTER XI.

Ver. 1-13. THE DISCIPLES TAUGHT TO PRAY. 1. one, &c.—struck with either the matter or the manner of our Lord's prayers. as John, &c.—From this reference to John, it is possible that disciple had not heard the Sermon on the mount. Nothing of John's inner teaching (to his own disciples) has been preserved to us, but we may be sure he never taught his disciples to say, "Our Father." 2-4. See on Matthew, 6. 9-13. day by day, &c.—an extension of the petition in Matthew for "this day's" supply, to every successive day's necessities. The closing doxology, wanting here, is wanting also in all the best and most ancient copies of Matthew's gospel. Perhaps our Lord purposely left that part open; and as the grand Jewish doxologies were ever resounding, and passed immediately and naturally, in all their hallowed familiarity into the Christian Church, probably this Prayer was never used in the Christian assemblies but in its present form, as we find it in Matthew, while in Luke it has been allowed to stand as originally uttered. 5-8, at midnight...for a friend is come—the heat in warm countries makes evening preferable for travelling to day; but "midnight" is every where a most unreasonable hour of call, and for that very reason it is here selected. trouble me not—the trouble making him insensible both to the urgency of the case and the claims of friendship. I cannot—without exertion which he would not make, importunity—the word is a strong one—'shamelessness'; persisting, in the face of all that seemed reasonable, and refusing to take a denial. as many, &c.—his reluctance once overcome, all the claims of friendship and necessity are felt to the full. The sense is obvious: If the churlish and self-indulgent—deaf both to friendship and necessity—can after a positive refusal, be won over, by sheer persistency, to do all that is needed, how much more may the same determined perseverance in prayer be expected to prevail with Him whose very nature is "rich unto all that call upon Him" (Romans, 10. 12). 9-13. See on Matthew, 7. 7-11. the Holy Spirit—in Matthew (7. 11), "good gifts" the former, the Gift of gifts descending on the Church through Christ, and comprehending the latter.

14-26. BLIND AND DUMB DEMONIC HEALED—CHANGE OF BEING IN LEAGUE WITH HELL, AND REPLY—DEMAND OF A SIGN, AND REPLY. See on Matthew, 12. 22-45. 14. dumb—blind also, Matthew, 12. 22. 20. the finger of God—"the Spirit of God," Matthew, 12. 28; the former figuratively denoting the power of God, the latter the living Personal Agent in every exercise of it. 21. 22. strong man—meaning Satan, armed—pointing to all the subtle and varied methods by which he wields his dark power over men. keepeth—"guardeth." his palace—man, whether viewed more largely or in individual souls—how significant of what men are to Satan! in peace—undisturbed, secure in his possession. a stronger than he—Christ; Glorious title, in relation to Satan! comes upon him and overcomes him—sublimely expressing the Redeemer's approach, as the Seed of the woman, to bruise the Serpent's head, taken from him all his armour—"his panoply," "his complete armour." Vain would be the victory, were not the means of repaying his lost power wrested from him. It is this that completes the triumph and ensures the final overthrow of his kingdom. The parable that immediately follows—v. 24-26—is just the reverse of this. See on Matthew, 12. 43-45. In the one case, Satan is dislodged by Christ, and so finds, in all future assemblies, the house pre-occupied; in the other, he merely goes out and comes in again, finding the house "EMPTY" (Matthew, 12. 44), of any rival, and all ready to welcome him back. This explains the important saying that comes in between the two parables, v. 23. Neutrality in religion there is none. The absence of positive attachment to Christ involves hostility to Him. gathereth...scattereth—Referring probably to gleaners. The meaning seems to be, Whatever in religion is disconnected from Christ comes to nothing. 27, 28, as he spake these things, a woman of the company—"of the multitude," the crowd. A charming little incident and profoundly instructive. With true womanly feeling, she envies the mother of such a wonderful Teacher. Well, and higher and better than she had said as much before her, ch. 1. 28, 49; and our Lord is far from condemning it. He only holds up—as "blessed rather"—the hearers and keepers of God's word; in other words, the humblest real saint of God. See on Matthew, 12. 49, 50. How utterly alien is this sentiment from the teaching of the Church of Rome, which would communicate any one of its members that dared to talk in the spirit of this glorious saying! 29-32. See on Matthew, 12. 30-42. 33-36. See on Matthew, 6. 14-16; 6. 22, 23. But v. 36 here is peculiarly vivid, expressing what pure, beautiful, broad perceptions the clarity of the inward eye imparts.

Ver. 1-12. WARNING AGAINST HYPOCRISY. 1-3. meantime—in close connexion, probably, with the foregoing scene. Our Lord had been speaking out more plainly than ever before, as matters were coming to a head between Him and His enemies, and this seems to have suggested to His own mind the warning here. He had just Himself illustriously exemplified His own precepts, his disciples first of all—afterwards to "the multitudes," v. 54. covered—from the view, hid—from knowledge. "Tis no use concealing anything, for all will one day come out: Give fire and fearless utterance then to all the truth." (cf. 1 Corinthians, 4. 3. 5.) 4, 5. I say, &c.—"You will say, That may cost us our life." "Be it so;" but, "my friends," there their power ends." He calls them "friends" here, not in any loose sense, but, as we think, from the feeling He then had that in this "killing of the body" He and they were going to be affectingly one with each other. Fear Him...fear Him—bold striking the repetition here. Only the one fear would effectually expel the other. after he hath killed, &c.—Learn here. (1.) To play false with one's convictions to save one's life, may fall of its end after all, for God can inflict a violent death in some other and equally formidable way. (2.) There is a hell, it seems, for the body as well as the soul; consequently, sufferings adapted to the one as well as the other. (3.) Fear of hell is a divinely authorised and needed motive of action even to Christ's "friends." (4.) As Christ's "meekness and gentleness" were not compromised by such harsh notes as these, so those servants of Christ want their Master's spirit who soften down all such language to please "ears polite." See on Mark, 9. 43-48. 6, 7. five for two farthings—in Matthew, 10. 29, it is "two for one farthing;" so if one took two farthings' worth, he got one 'in addition'—of such small value were they. than many sparrows—not 'than millions of sparrows; the charm and power of our Lord's teaching (is) very much in this simplicity. 8, 9. confess... deny, &c. The point lies in doing it "before men," because one has to do it "despising the shame." But when done, the Lord holds Himself bound to repay it in kind by confessing such "before the angels of God." For the rest, see on ch. 9. 28. 10. Son of man... Holy Ghost. See on Matthew, 12. 31, 32.

13-53. COVERTNESS—WATCHFULNESS—SUPERIORITY TO EARTHLY TIES. 13. Master, &c.—q. d., 'Great Preacher of righteousness, help; there is need of Thee in this rapacious world; here am I the victim of injustice, and that from my own brother, who withholds from me my rightful share of the inheritance that has fallen to us.' In this most inopportune intrusion upon the solemnities of our Lord's teaching, there is a mixture of the absurd and the irreverent, the one however occasioning the other. The man had not the least idea that his case was not of as urgent a nature, and as worthy the attention of our Lord, as any thing else He could deal with. 14. Man, &c.—Contrast this style of address with "my friends," v. 4. Who, &c.—a question literally repudiating the office which Moses assumed. Nothing else is laid to his charge. 20, 21. this night, &c.—This sudden cutting short of his career is designed to express not only the folly of building securely upon the future, but of throwing one's whole soul into what may at any moment be gone. In this sublime sense it is "joy," before "or in the presence of the angels;" they only "catch the flying joy," sharing it with Him! The application of this to the reception of those publicans and sinners that stood around our Lord is grand in the extreme: "Ye turn from these lost ones with disdain, and because I do not the same, ye murmur at it; but a very different feeling is cherished in heaven: There, the recovery of even one such outcast is watched with interest and hailed with joy; nor are they left to come home of themselves or perish; for lo! even now the great Shepherd is going after His lost sheep, and the Owner is making diligent search for the lost property; and He is finding it too, and bringing it back with joy, and all heaven is full of it." (Let the reader mark what sublime claims for Himself our Lord covertly puts in here—as if in Him they beheld, all unknown to themselves, nothing less than heaven in the habiliments of earth, the Great Shepherd above, clothed in a garment of flesh, come "to seek and to save that which was lost!"; 11-33. The parable of "The Leaven" sets forth, perhaps, rather the inward growth of the kingdom, while "the Mustard-seed" seems to point chiefly to the outward. But this is to have an end, by the great Master of the house Himself rising and shutting the door, after which there will be no admittance. Lord, Lord—emphatic reduplication, expressive of the earnestness now felt, but too late. See on Matthew, 7, 21, 22, 26, 27. See on the similar passage, Matthew, 7, 22, 23, eaten and drunk, &c.—we have sat with Thee at the same table, taught in our streets—Do we not remember listening in our own streets to Thy teaching? Surely we are not to be denied admittance? But he shall say, &c.—No nearness of external communion with Christ will avail at the great day, in place of that "holiness without which no man shall see the Lord." Observe the style which Christ intimates that He will then assume, that of absolute Disposer of men's eternal destinies, and contrast it with His "despised and rejected" condition at that time. 28, 29. See on Matthew, 5, 11, 12.

31-35. MESSAGE TO HEROD. 31. and depart hence—and 'go forward,' push on. He was on His way out of Perea, East of Jordan, and in Herod's dominions, "journeying towards Jerusalem" (v. 22). Haunted by guilty fears, probably, Herod wanted to get rid of Him (see on Mark, 6, 14), and seems, from our Lord's answer, to have sent these Pharisees, under pretence of a friendly hint, to persuade Him that the sooner He got beyond Herod's jurisdiction the better it would be ing spirit than the "seventy-times seven" enjoined on Peter, which was occasioned by his asking if he was to stop at seven times. 'No,' is the virtual answer, 'though it come to seventy times that number, if only he ask forgiveness in sincerity.' 5. Lord—See on ch. 10. 1. Increase our faith—moved by the difficulty of avoiding and forgiving 'offences.' This is the only instance in which a spiritual operation upon their souls was solicited of Christ by the Twelve; but a kindred and higher prayer had been offered before, by one with far fewer opportunities. See on Mark. 9. 24. 6. sycamine—mulberry. See on Mark. 11. 22-24. 7-10. say unto him by and by—The "by and by" (or rather 'directly') should be joined not to the saying but the going:—"Go directly." The connection here is: 'But when your faith has been so increased as both to avoid and forgive offences, and do things impossible to all but faith, be not puffed up as though you had laid the Lord under any obligations to you. I throw as:—or, as we say, when much more is meant, "I should think not." unprofitable—a word which, though usually denoting the opposite of profit, is here used simply in its negative sense. 'We have not, as his servants, profited or benefited God at all.' (cf. Job, 22. 3. 3; Romans, 11. 35.)

11-19. TEN LEPROUS CLEANSSED. 11-13. through midst of Samaria and Galilee—probably on the confines of both. stood afar off—cf. Leviticus, 13. 45. 46. they lifted up—their common misery drawing these poor outcasts together (2 Kings, 7. 3); nay, making them forget the fierce national antipathy of Jew and Samaritan. [TRENCH.] Jesus, &c.—cf. Matthew, 20. 50-53. How quick a teacher is felt misery, even though as here the teaching may be soon forgotten! 14. show yourselves—as cleansed persons. See on Matthew, 8. 4. Thus too would the Samaritan be taught that "salva-

[A]ring...so the Son of Man—i.e., it will 'The Lord speaks here of His coming in a prophetically indefinite manner preparatory words blends into one epochs.' (STRICK.) When the whole political and ecclesiastical alike, was broken and its continuance rendered impossible by the destruction of Jerusalem, it became as if the lightning of heaven that the Kingdom ceased to exist in its old, and had entered and perfectly different form. So it is its final and greatest chance at the of Christ, of which the words in the are alone true. But first...suffer, &c.—the more immediate reference of this is to an event soon to follow the design was designed to withdraw the attention from the glare in which His had invested the approaching established kingdom. 26-30. eat...married, play ordinary occupations and enjoyments the antediluvian world and the city were awfully wicked, it is not their wickedness, their unbelief and in future, their unpreparedness, that is the warning. N.B.—These recorded events by not a few—are referred to here as take it away...remember, &c.—a warning lingering reluctance to part with which induces some to remain in the hopes of saving this and that precious summed and buried in its ruins. The posed, though different, are similar.

(two to one), he be able to stand his ground has no hope of this, he will feel that nothing for him but to make the best terms he can," says our Lord, "in the warfare you will wage as my disciples, despise not your strength, for the odds are all against you; and better see to it that, despite every disadvantage, still have wherewithal to hold out and win or else not begin at all and make the best you can of your circumstances." In this simple sense—STRONG, ALFORD, &c., go wide of the mark in making the enemy to be God, because of "visions of peace," v. 32—two things are taught: first not begin (Revelation, 3. 16., than begin and win. (2.) Though the contest for salvation be on an awfully unequal one, the human will, in case of that "faith which overcometh the world," (John, 5. 4), and nerved by power from above, as of weakness makes it strong" (Hebrews, 11. vs. 1. 5), becomes heroic and will come off as conqueror." But without absolute success, the contest is hopeless, v. 33. 34. 35. said, on Matthew, 6. 13-16; and Mark, 9. 50.

CHAPTER XV.

32. PUBLICANS AND SINNERS WELCOMED BY JESUS—THREE PARABLES TO EXPLAIN THIS. Hear all the publicans and sinners, &c.—drawn from him by the extraordinary adaptation of His to their case, who, till He appeared—at least unner—might well say, "No man careth for me," 2. murmured, saying, &c.—took it ill, were not at Him, and insinuated (on the principle as is known by the company he keeps) that have some secret sympathy with their character. O what a truth of unspeakable preciousness! As, on other occasions, unconsciously they follow three parables representing the 1.) in His stupidity; (2.) as all-unconscious of His condition; (3.) knowingly and willingly from God. [BENNETT.] The first two set forth the love of God; the last, His receiving love. 1.) 3-7. I. THE LOST SHEEP—occurring elsewhere, 18. 13-14; but there to show how precious His sheep is to the good Shepherd, here, that the shepherd, though it stray never so far, by property is over His own recovered property; but so vast and exuberant is it (Zechariah, 3. 17., that as if He could not keep it to Himself, He "calletH His friends and neighbours together"—His whole celestial family—saying, "Rejoice WITH ME, for I have found MY sheep—MY piece," &c. In this sublime sense it is "joy," before "or in the presence of the angels;" they only "catch the flying joy," sharing it with Him! The application of this to the reception of those publicans and sinners that stood around our Lord is grand in the extreme: 'Ye turn from these lost ones with disdain, and because I do not the same, ye murmur at it; but a very different feeling is cherished in heaven: There, the recovery of even one such outcast is watched with interest and hailed with joy; nor are they left to come home of themselves or perish; for lo! even now the great Shepherd is going after His lost sheep, and the Owner is making diligent search for the lost property; and He is finding it too, and bringing it back with joy, and all heaven is full of it.' (Let the reader mark what sublime claims for Himself our Lord covertly puts in here—as if in Him they beheld, all unknown to themselves, nothing less than heaven in the habiliments of earth, the Great Shepherd above, clothed in a garment of flesh, come "to seek and to save that which was lost!") 11-32. III. THE PRODIGAL SON. 12. the younger—as the more thoughtless, said, &c.—weary of restraint, panting for independence, unable longer to abide the check of a father's eye. This is man, impatient of divine control, desiring to be independent of God, seeking to be his own master; that 'sin of sins, in which all subsequent sins are included as in their germ, for they are but the unfolding of this one.' [TRENCH.] he divided, &c.—Thus 'God, when His service no longer appears a perfect freedom, and man promises himself something far better elsewhere, allows him to make the trial; and he shall discover, if need be by saddest proof, that to depart from Him is not to throw off the yoke, but to exchange a light yoke for a heavy one, and one gracious Master for a thousand imperious tyrants and lords.' [TRENCH.] 13. not many days—intoxicated with his new-found resources, and eager for the luxury of using them at will, a far country—beyond all danger of interference from home, wasted, &c.—So long as it lasted, only "good." This indeed is but distantly hinted; but unless this is seen in the back-ground of our Lord's words, nothing worthy of Him can be made out of them. (Hence, Socinianism, instead of having any support here, is only baffled by it.) 20. thou knowest, &c. —Matthew is more full here: "But if thou wilt enter into life, keep the commandments. He saith unto him, Which?—as if he had said, 'Point me out one of them which I have not kept?'—Jesus said, Thou shalt," &c. (Matthew, 19, 17, 18.) Our Lord purposely confines Himself to the second table, which He would consider easy to keep, enumerating them all—for in Mark 10, 19, "'Defraud not" stands for the tenth else the eighth is twice repeated." In Matthew the sum of this second table of the law is added, "Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself," as if to see if he would venture to say he had kept that. 21. all these, &c.—"what lack I yet," asks Matthew. Ah! this gives us a glimpse of his heart. Doubtless he was perfectly sincere; but something within whispered to him that his keeping of the commandments was too easy a way of getting to heaven. He felt something beyond this to be necessary; after keeping all the commandments he was at a loss to know what that could be; and he came to Jesus just upon that point. "Then," says Mark (10, 21), "Jesus beholding him loved him," or 'looked lovingly upon him.' His sincerity, frankness, and nearness to the kingdom of God, in themselves most winning qualities, won our Lord's regard even though he turned his back upon Him—a lesson to those who can see nothing lovable save in the regenerate. 22. lackest one thing—Ah! but that a fundamental, fatal lack, sell, &c.—As riches were his idol, our Lord, who knew it from the first, lays His great authoritative grasp at once upon it, saying, 'Now give Me that and all is right.'

in every form of self-sacrifice, for the king sake—in Mark, "for my sake and the Gospel's sake," in Matthew, "for my sake and the Gospel's sake," in Luke, "for my sake and the Gospel's sake." On ch. 6, 22, manifold more in this sense Matthew (19, 29) "an hundred-fold," to v (10, 36) gives this most interesting addition to this present time, houses, and brethren, and mothers, and children, and lands, with all things." We have here the blessed promise of adjustment of all human relationships as on a Christian basis and in a Christian being sacrificed, in their natural form, of love to Christ. This he calls "manifold more"—"an hundred-fold more"—than what Our Lord was Himself the first to exemplify in His own relationships. Matthew, 12, 49, 50; and on 2 Corinthians, 6, 10, "with persecutions;" for how could we ever take place without the most cruel wrongs and blood; but the persecution would be theirs into their new and higher circle. But up too! But best of all, "in the world that is to come." And

When the shore is won at last.

Who will count the billows past?—Ke These promises are for every one who forsakes all for Christ. But in Matthew (19, 28) this is a special promise to the Twelve: "Verily I say unto you, That ye which have followed me in this generation, when the Son of Man shall sit in the glory of His Father, ye also shall sit upon twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel." Ye who have followed me shall, in the new kingdom, rule, or govern, the great Christian world, here set forth as the twelve tribes, presided over by the twelve Apostles on so many judicial thrones.

[ALFORD, WEBSTER & WILKINSON, &c.] But the context rather favours the former. Liked, &c.—a touching act of brute pity, in the absence of human relief. It is a case of heartless indifference, amidst luxuries of every kind, to one of God's poorest and most afflicted ones, presented daily before the eye. 22. dead—his burial was too unimportant to mention; while "the rich man died and was buried"—his carcase carried in pomp to its earthly resting-place, in Abraham's bosom—as if seen reclining next to him at the heavenly feast. (ch. 8. 24.) But by the same law, he whose "evil things," all crowded into the present life, drove him to seek, and find, consolation in a life beyond the grave, is by death released from all evil and ushered into unmixed and uninterrupted good (ch. 6. 21). (2.) It is impossible, besides all this—'independently of this consideration.' a great gulf fixed—by an irreversible decree there has been placed a vast impassable abyss between the two states, and the occupants of each. 27-31. [TRENCH] The answer of Abraham is, They are sufficiently warned. nay—giving the lie to Abraham. 11, &c.—a principle of awful magnitude and importance. The greatest miracle will have no effect on those who are determined not to believe. A real Lazarus soon "rose from the dead," but the sight of him by crowds of people, incited thereby to Christ, only crowned the unbelief and hastened the murderous plots of the Pharisees against the Lord of glory; nor has His own resurrection, far more overpowering, yet won over that "crooked and perverse nation."

Ver. 1-10. OFFENCES—FAITH—HUMILITY. 1, 2. See on Matthew, 18. 6, 7. 3, 4.—See on Matthew, 18. 15-17, 21-22. seven times—not a lower measure of the forgiving spirit than the "seventy-times seven" enjoined on Peter, which was occasioned by his asking if he was to stop at seven times. I trust no;—or, as we say, when much more is meant, 'I should think not.' unprofitable—a word which, though usually denoting the opposite of profit, is here used simply in its secular sense. 'We have not, as his servants, profited or benefited God at all.' cf. Job, 22. 2, 3; Romans, 11. 35.)

In how many different ways were our Lord's cures wrought, and this different from all the rest. 17. 14. We: there not ten cleansed—rather, 'Were not the ten cleansed?' i. e., the whole of them—an example by the way of Christ's omniscience. 19-27. COMING OF THE KINGDOM OF GOD AND OF THE SON OF MAN. 20-25. When, &c.—To meet the erroneous views not only of the Pharisees, but of the disciples themselves, our Lord addresses both, announcing the coming of the kingdom under different aspects. "It cometh not with observation"—'with watching' or 'lying in wait,' as for something outwardly imposing; and at once revealing itself. Lo here! lo there!—Shut up within this or that sharply defined and visible geographical or ecclesiastical limit. within you—is of an internal and spiritual character as contrasted with their outward views of it. 'The Lord speaks here of His coming and manifestation in a prophetically indefinite manner, and in these preparatory words blends into one the distinct epochs.' [STRICK.] When the whole polity of the Jews, civil and ecclesiastical alike, was broken up at once, and its continuance rendered impossible, by the destruction of Jerusalem, it became as manifest to all as the lightning of heaven that the Kingdom of God had ceased to exist in its old, and had entered on a new and perfectly different form. So it may be again, ere its final and greatest change at the personal coming of Christ, of which the words in their highest sense are alone true. But first...suffer, &c.—This shows that the more immediate reference of the previous verse is to an event soon to follow the death of Christ. It was designed to withdraw the attention of "His disciples" from the glare in which His foregoing words had invested the approaching establishment of His kingdom. 26-30. eat...married, planted, &c.—all the ordinary occupations and enjoyments of life. Though the antediluvian world and the cities of the plain were awfully wicked, it is not their wickedness, but their worldliness, their unbelief and indifference to the future, their unpreparedness, that is here held up as a warning. N. B.—These recorded events of Old Testament history—denied or explained away now-a-days by a few—are referred to here as facts. 31-33. to take it away—remember, &c.—a warning against that lingering reluctance to part with present treasures which induces some to remain in a burning house, in hopes of saving this and that precious article, till consumed and buried in its ruins. The cases here supposed, though different, are similar. L.'s wife—her "look back," for that is all that is said of her, and her recorded doom. Her heart was in Sodom still, and her "lo-k" just said, "And must I bid it adieu?" whosever, &c.—See on ch. 9. 27-27. 34. two in one bed—the prepared and unprepared mingled in closest intercourse together in the ordinary walks and fellowships of life, when the moment of severance arrives. Awful truth! realised before the destruction of Jerusalem, when the Christians found themselves forced by their Lord's directions, ch. 21. 21) at once and for ever away from their old associates; but most of all when the second coming of Christ shall burst upon a heedless world. 37. where—shall this occur? whereever, &c.—'As birds of prey scent out the carrion, so wherever is found a mass of incurable moral and spiritual corruption, there will be seen alighting the ministers of Divine judgment,' a proverbial saying, terrifically verified at the destruction of Jerusalem, and many times since, though its most tremendous illustration will be at the world's final day.

Ver. 1-8. PARABLE OF THE IMPOTENT WIDOW. 15. always—cf. v. 7. Zechariah, 2. 8. cry day and night—whose every cry enters into the ears of the Lord of Sabaoth (James, 5. 4), and how much more their incessant and persevering cries! bear long with them—rather, 'in their case,' or 'on their account,' as James, 5. 7, "for it". [GROTIUS, De Werra, &c.] speedily—as if pained at the long stay, impatient for the destined moment to interpose. Cf. Proverbs, 29, 1.) nevertheless, &c.—q. d., 'Yet are the Son of Man comes to redress the wrongs of His Church, so low will the hope of relief sink, through the length of the delay, that one will be fain to ask, will He find any faith of a coming avenger left on the earth? From this we learn, (1.) That the primary and historical reference of this parable is to the Church like widowed, desolate, oppressed, defenceless condition during the present absence of her Lord in the heavens; (2.) That in these circumstances importunate, answering prayer for deliverance is the Church's king exercise; (3.) That notwithstanding every encouragement to this, so long will the answer be delayed, while the need of relief continues the same, that all hope of deliverance will have nearly died out, and "faith" of Christ's coming scarcely be found. But be application of the parable to prayer in general is so obvious as to have nearly hidden its more direct allusion, and so precious that one cannot allow it to disappear in any public and historical interpretation.

94. PARABLE OF THE PHARISEE AND THE PUBLICAN. 11, 12. stood—as the Jews in prayer. (Mark, 11, 21.) God, &c.—To have been kept from gross indignities was undoubtedly a just cause of thankfulness to God; but instead of the devoutly humble, admiring frame which this should inspire, he arrogantly severs himself from the rest of mankind, as quite above them, and with a contemptuous look at the poor publican thanks God that he has not to stand afar off like him, is hang down his head like a bulrush and beat his breast like him. But these are only his moral exultations. His religious merits complete his grounds for magnification. Not confining himself to the one heavily prescribed annual fast (Leviticus, 16, 29), he was not behind the most rigid, who fasted on the second and fifth days of every week (LIGHTFOOT), and ate the tenth not only of what the law laid under his hand, but of "all his gains." Thus, besides doing all his duty, he did works of supererogation; while ours to confess and spiritual wants to be supplied he seems to have felt none. What a picture of the Pharisaic character and religion! 13. standing afar off—as unworthy to draw near; but that was the way to get near. (Psalm 34, 18; Isaiah, 57, 15.) would not lift up—"blushing and ashamed" to do so. (Ezra, 9, 6.) note, &c.—"kept smiting;" to anguish (ch. 23, 48), and self-reproach (Jeremiah, 31, 19). be merciful—"be protected," a very unusual word in such a sense, only now also used in the New Testament, in the sense of "making reconciliation" by sacrifice, Hebrews, 2, 17. There may, therefore, be some allusion to this here, though not likely. a sinner—literally, 'the sinner;' q. d., 'If ever there was one, I am he.' 14. rather than the other—the meaning is, 'and not the other;' for the Pharisee was not seeking justification, and felt no need of it. This great law of the Kingdom of God is, in the teaching of Christ, inscribed, as in letters of gold, over its entrance-gate. And in how many different forms it is repeated. (Psalm 138, 6; 147, 6; ch. 1, 63.) To be self-complacent, or, "poor in spirit," is the fundamental and indispensable preparation for the reception of the "grace which bringeth salvation;" wherever this exists, be "mourning" for it which precedes "comfort" and be earnest "hungerings and thirstings after righteousness" which are rewarded by the "fulness" of it, as we see here, be surely found. Such, therefore, and such only, are the justified ones. (Job, 33, 27, 28; Psalm 64, 18; Isaiah, 57, 15.)

15-17. LITTLE CHILDREN BROUGHT TO CHRIST. stands—showing that some, at least, of those called in Matthew (19, 13) and Mark (10, 13) simply "little" or "young children" were literally "babes," teach them—as more fully in Matthew, "put his hands on them and pray," or invoke a "blessing" on them (Mark, 10, 16), according to venerable custom (Genesis, 48, 14, 15), rebuked them—Repeatedly the disciples thus interposed, to save annoyance and interruption to their Master, but, as the result showed, always against the mind of Christ. (Matthew, 18, 23; ch. 18, 29, 40.) Here, it is plain from our Lord's reply, that they thought the intrusion a useless one, as infants were not capable of receiving anything from Him. His ministrations were for grown people. But Jesus—"much displeased," says Mark (10, 14); an invaluable addition, said—"SUFFER THE LITTLE CHILDREN TO COME UNTO ME"—"AND FORBID THEM NOT," is the important addition of Matthew (19, 14) and Mark (10, 14). What words are these from the lips of Christ! The price of them is above rubies. But the reason assigned, "FOR OF SUCH IS THE KINGDOM OF GOD," or "of heaven," as in Matthew, 19, 14, completes the previous information here conveyed; especially as interpreted by what immediately follows:—"AND HE TOOK THEM UP IN HIS ARMS, PUT HIS HANDS UPON THEM, AND BLESSED THEM," Mark, 10, 16. It is surely not to be conceived that all our Lord meant was to inform us, that seeing grown people must become childlike in order to be capable of the Kingdom of God, therefore they should not hinder infants from coming to Him, and therefore He took up and blessed the infants themselves. Was it not just the grave mistake of the disciples that infants should not be brought to Christ, because only grown people could profit by Him, which "much displeased" our Lord? And though he took the irresistible opportunity of lowering their pride of reason, by informing them that, in order to enter the Kingdom, 'instead of the children first becoming like them, they must themselves become like the children' (RICHTER ID STIER), this was but by the way; and returning to the children themselves, He took them up in His gracious arms, put His hands upon them and blessed them, for no conceivable reason, but to show that they were thereby made capable, as INFANTS, of the Kingdom of God. And if so, then "Can any man forbid water that these should not be baptized which have received the Holy Ghost as well as we?" (Acts, 10, 47.) But such application of the baptismal water can have no warrant here, save where the infants have been previously brought to Christ Himself for His benediction, and only as the sign and seal of that benediction.

18-30. THE RICH YOUNG RULER, AND DISCOURSE THEREON. This case presents some remarkable points. (1.) The man was of irreproachable moral character; and this amidst all the temptations of youth, for he was a "young man" (Matthew, 19, 22), and wealth, for "he was very rich" (v. 23; Matthew, 19, 22; Mark, 10, 22). But (2.) restless notwithstanding, his heart craves eternal life. (3.) Unlike the "rulers," to whose class he belonged (v. 18), he so far believed in Jesus as to be persuaded He could authoritatively direct him on this vital point. (4.) So earnest is he that he comes "running" and even "kneeling before Him," and that when He was gone forth into the way (Mark, 10, 17)—the highroad, by this time crowded with travellers to the Passover; undeterred by the virulent opposition of the class he belonged to as a "ruler" and by the shame he might be expected to feel at broaching such a question in the hearing of a crowd and on the open road, 19. why, &c.—Did our Lord mean then to teach that God only ought to be called "good?" Impossible; for that had been to contradict all Scripture teaching, and His own too. (Psalm 112, 5; Matthew, 25, 21; Titus, 1, 8.) Unless therefore we are to ascribe captiousness to our Lord, he could have had but one object—to raise the youth's ideas of Himself, as not to be classed merely with other "good masters," and declining to receive this title apart from the "One" who is essentially and rather than be withheld (Habakkuk, 2. 11). 41-44. was beheld, wept, &c.—Cf. Lamentations, 3. 51. "Mine eye affecteth mine heart;" the heart again affecting the eye. Under this sympathetic law of the relation of mind and body Jesus, in His beautiful, tender humanity, was constituted even as we. What a contrast to the immediately preceding profound joy! He yielded Himself alike freely to both. See on Matthew, 23. 37. at least in this, &c.—even at this moving moment. This "cut off all hope of escape," and consigned the city to unparalleled horrors. (See JOSEPHUS, Jewish War, v. 6. 2; and 12. 3. 4.) All here predicted was with dreadful literality fulfilled.

literally said, "And except those days should be shortened, there should no flesh be saved, but for the elects' 22). But for this merciful "shortening," brought about by a remarkable concurrence of causes, the whole nation would have perished, in which there yet remained a remnant to be afterwards gathered out.

Here in Matthew and Mark are some particulars about "false Christs," who should, "if possible"—a precious clause—"deceive the very elect." Cf. 2 The-signs, &c.—Though the grandeur of this language carries the mind over the head of all periods but that of Christ's second coming, nearly every expression will be found of the Lord's coming in terrible national judgments, as of Babylon, &c.; and from v. 25-32, it seems undeniable that its immediate reference was to the destruction of Jerusalem, though its ultimate reference beyond doubt is to Christ's final coming, redemption—from the oppression of ecclesiastical despotism and legal bondage by the total subversion of the Jewish state and the firm establishment of the evangelical kingdom (v. 31). But the words are of far wider and more precious import. Matthew 24, 30 says, "And then shall appear the sign of the Son of Man in heaven," evidently something distinct from Himself, mentioned immediately after. What this was intended to mean, interpreters are not agreed.

But as before Christ came to destroy Jerusalem some

Ver. 1-6. CONSPIRACY OF THE JEWISH AUTHORITIES TO PUT JESUS TO DEATH—COMPACT WITH JUDAS. 1, 2. See on Matthew, 26. 1-5. 3. Then entered Satan, &c.—but not yet in the full sense. The awful stages of it were these: (1.) Cocetousness being his master-passion, the Lord let it reveal itself and gather strength by entrusting him with "the bag" (John. 12. 6), as Treasurer to Himself and the Twelve. (2.) In the discharge of that most sacred trust he became "a thief," appropriating its contents from time to time to his own use. Satan, seeing this door into his heart standing wide open, determines to enter by it, but cautiously (2 Corinthians, 2. 11); first merely "putting it into his heart to betray Him" (John, 13. 2), suggesting the thought to him that by this means he might enrich himself. (3.) This thought was probably converted into a settled purpose by what took place in Simon's house at Bethany. See on Matthew, 26. 6, and John, 12. 4-8. (4.) Starting back, perhaps, or mercifully held back, for some time, the determination to carry it into immediate effect was not consummated till, sitting at the Paschal supper, "Satan entered into him" (see on John, 13. 27), and conscience, effectually stifled, only rose again to be his tormentor.  a striking term here. Our Lord was not charged with ordinary crime, but only with laying claim to office and honours which amounted to blasphemy. The charge of treason had not even a show of truth, as Pilate told His enemies. In this defence then there seems more than meets the eye. 'He made Himself the promised Messiah, the Son of God; but in this He "did nothing amiss." He ate with publicans and sinners, and bid all the weary and heavy laden come and rest under His wing; but in this He "did nothing amiss;" He claimed to be Lord of the Kingdom of God, to shut it at will, but also to open it at pleasure even to such as we are; but in this He "did nothing amiss!" Does His next speech imply less than this? Observe (1.) His frank confession and genuine self-condemnation. (2.) His astonishment and horror at the very different state of his fellow's mind. (3.) His anxiety to bring him to a better mind while yet there was hope.

(1) His noble testimony not only to the innocence of Jesus but to all that this implied of the rightfulness of His claims. Said to Jesus, &c.—Observe here (1.) The "kingdom" referred to was one beyond the grave; for it is inconceivable that he should have expected Him to come down from the cross to erect any temporal kingdom. (2.) This he calls Christ's own thy kingdom. (3.) As such, he sees in Christ the absolute right to dispose of that kingdom to whom He pleased. (4.) He does not presume to ask a place in that kingdom though that is what he means, but with a humility quite affecting, just says "Lord, remember me when," &c. Yet was there mighty faith in that word. If Christ will but "think upon him" (Nehemiah, 5. 19., at that august moment when He "cometh into His kingdom," it will do. "Only assure me that then Thou wilt not forget such a wretch as I, that once hung by thy side, and I am content." Now contrast with this bright act of faith the darkness even of the apostles' minds, who could hardly be got to believe that their Master would die at all, who now were almost despairing of Him, and who when dead had almost buried their hopes in His grave. Consider, too, the man's previous disadvantages and bad life. And then mark how his faith comes out—not in protestations, "Lord I cannot doubt, I am firmly persuaded that Thou art Lord of a kingdom, that death cannot disannul thy title nor impeach the assumption of it in due time," &c.—but as having no shadow of doubt, and rising above it as a question altogether, he just says, "Lord, remember me when thou comest," &c. Was ever faith like this exhibited upon earth? It looks as if the brightest crown had been reserved for the Saviour's head at His darkest moment! Jesus said, &c. The dying Redeemer speaks as if He Himself viewed it in this light. It was a "song in the night." It ministered cheer to His spirit in the midnight gloom that now enveloped it. verily I say unto thee—"Since thou speakest as to the king, with kindly authority speak I to thee," to-day—Thou art prepared for a long delay before I come into my Kingdom, but not a day's delay shall there be for thee; thou shalt not be parted from me even for a moment, but together we shall go, and with Me, ere this day expire, shalt thou be in paradise! future bliss, 2. How artless all this! concerning Jesus, &c.—As if feeling it a relief to have some one to unburden his thoughts and feelings to, this disciple goes over the main facts in his own desponding style, and this was just what our Lord wished. we trusted, &c.—They expected the promised Deliverance at His hand, but in the current sense of it, not by His death. besides all this—not only did His death seem to give the fatal blow to their hopes, but He had been two days dead already, and this was the third. It is true, they add, some of our women gave us a surprise, telling us of a vision of angels they had at the empty grave this morning that said He was alive, and some of ourselves who went thither confirmed their statement; but then, Himself they saw not. A doleful tale truly, told out of the deepest despondency. 25-27. fools—senseless, without understanding. ought not Christ—the Christ, 'the Messiah,' to suffer...and enter—i.e., through the gate of suffering and suffering "these things," or such a death: to enter into His glory. And does not this still repeat itself in the interviews of the Saviour with His loving, longing disciples? Else why do they say,

Abide with me from morn to eve,
For without Thee I cannot live; Abide with me when night is nigh, For without Thee I cannot die.—Killa.

They now tell each to the other how their hearts burned—were dried—within them at His talk and His expositions of Scripture. 'Ah! this accounts for it: We could not understand the glow of self-evidencing light, love, glory that ravished our hearts; but now we do.' They cannot rest—how could they?—they must go straight back and tell the news. They find the eleven, but ere they have time to tell their tale, their ears are saluted with the thrilling news, "The Lord is risen indeed, and hath appeared to Simon." Most touching and precious intelligence this. The only one of the Eleven to whom He appeared alone was he, it seems, who had so shamefully denied Him. What passed at that interview we Thou hast an everlasting right, O my Saviour, to that august place. The Brightness of the Father's glory, enshrined in our nature, hath won it well, for He poured out His soul unto death, and led captivity captive, receiving gifts for men, yea for the rebellious, that the Lord God might dwell among them. "Thou art the King of glory, O Christ." Lift up your heads, O ye gates, be lifted up, ye everlasting doors, that the King of glory may come in! This made them return, not with disappointment at His removal, but "with great joy," were continually in the temple—i.e., every day at the regular hours of prayer till the day of Pentecost.

34. THE WORD MADE FLESH. 1. In the be- of all time and created existence, for this ve it being (v. 3, 10; therefore, "before the m" (ch. 17. 5, 24); or, from all eternity. was —He who is to God what man's word is to him- nifestation or expression of himself to those him. (See on v. 18.) On the origin of this y and now for ever consecrated title, of Christ, at the place to speak. It occurs only in the of this seraphic apostle. was with God—hav- sious personal existence distinct from God's from the person he is "with", but insepar- l Him and associated with Him (v. 18; ch. 17. 1. 2, where "THE FATHER" is used in the ase as "GOD" here. was God—in substance and essence God; or was possessed of essential or proper divinity. Thus, each of these brief but pre- gnant statements is the complement of the other, cor- recting any misapprehensions which the others might occasion. Was the Word Eternal? It was not the eternity of "the Father," but of a conscious personal existence distinct from Him and associated with Him. Was the Word thus "with God?" It was not the distinctness and the fellowship of another being, as if there were more Gods than one, but of One who was Himself God—in such sense that the absolute unity of the God- head, the great principle of all religion, is only trans- ferred from the region of shadowy abstraction to the region of essential life and love. But why all this definition? Not to give us any abstract information about certain mysterious distinctions in the Godhead, but solely to let the reader know Who it was that in the fulness of time "was made flesh." After each verse, then, the reader must say, "It was He who is thus, and thus, and thus described, Who was made flesh." 2. The same, &c.—See what property of the Word the stress is laid upon—His eternal distinctness, in unity, from God—the Father. (John, 1, 2: 3. All things, &c.—all things absolutely, as is evident from v. 10; 1 Corinthians, 8, 6; Colossians, 1, 16, 17; but put beyond question by what follows. "Without Him was not one thing made (brought into being) that was made." This is a denial of the eternity and non-creation of matter, which was held by the whole thinking world outside of Judaism and Christianity; or rather, its proper creation was never so much as dreamt of save by the children of revealed religion. 4. In Him was life—essentially and originally, as the previous verses show to be the meaning. Thus He is the Living Word, or, as He is called in 1 John, 1, 1, 2, "the Word of Life," the life the light of men—all that in men which is true light—knowledge, integrity, intelligent, willing subjection to God, love to Him and to their fellow-creatures, wisdom, purity, holy joy, rational happiness—all this "light of men" has its fountain in the essential original "life" of "the Word." The word signifies both, as does the corresponding Hebrew word. Applied to sin, it means to be chargeable with the guilt of it; (Exodus, 28: 38; Leviticus, 4: 1; Ezekiel, 18: 20, and to bear it away as often. In the Levitical victims both ideas met, as they do in Christ, the people's guilt being viewed as transferred to them, atoned in their death, and so borne away by them (Leviticus, 4: 15; 16: 15, 21, 22; and cf. Isaiah, 53: 6-12; 2 Corinthians, 5: 21). the sin—The singular number being used to mark the collective burden and all-embracing efficacy, of the world—not of Israel only, for whom the typical victims were exclusively offered.

Wherever there shall live a sinner throughout the wide world, sinking under that burden too heavy for him to bear, he shall find in this "Lamb of God," a shoulder equal to the weight. The right note was struck at the first—balm, doubtless, to Christ's own spirit; nor was ever after, or ever will be, a more glorious utterance. 31-34. knew him not—Living mostly apart, the one at Nazareth, the other in the Judean desert—to prevent all appearance of collusion, John only knew that at a definite time after his own call, his Master would show Himself. As He drew near for baptism one day, the last of all the crowd, the spirit of the Baptist heaving under a divine presentiment that the moment had at length arrived, and an air of un-wonted serenity and dignity, not without traits, probably, of the family features, appearing in this Stranger, the Spirit said to him as to Samuel of his youthful type, "Arise, anoint Him, for this is He!" (1 Samuel, 16: 12). But the sign which he was told to expect was the visible descent of the Spirit upon Him as He emerged out of the baptismal water. Then, catching up the voice from heaven, "he saw and bare record that this is the Son of God." 35, 36. John stood—"was

CHAPTER III.

1-21. NIGHT-INTERVIEW OF NICODEMUS. JESUS, 1, 2. Nicodemus—in this member of the firm sincerity and timidity are seen struggling side. One of those superficial "believers" mentioned in ch. 2, 23, 24, yet inwardly craving further vision, he comes to Jesus in quest of it, but "by night" (see ch. 19, 38, 39; 12, 42); he avows a conviction that He was "come from God"—an ex-pression never applied to a merely human messenger, probably meaning more here—but only as "a man," and in His miracles he sees a proof merely God is with him." Thus, while unable to resist convictions he is afraid of committing himself. 3. Except, &c. This blunt and curt reply was meant to shake the whole edifice of the man's faith, in order to lay a deeper and more enduring foundation. Nicodemus probably thought he had gone far, and expected, perhaps, to be complimented and caressed. Instead of this, he is virtually told he has raised a question which he is not in a capacity, and that before approaching it, his spirit-uality required to be rectified by an entire revolu-tion in his man. Had the man been less sincere, and certainly have repelled him; but with per-plexed mixed state of mind—to which Jesus was eager (ch. 2, 25)—such methods speed better over honeyed words and gradual approaches. As of a Jew merely; the necessity is a universal one again—or, as it were, begin life anew, in re-ference to God; his manner of thinking, feeling, and with reference to spiritual things, undergoing mental and permanent revolution. cannot see any more part in (just as one is said to "see life," &c.), the kingdom of God—whether in its beginnings here (Luke, 16, 16), or its consummation hereafter. (Matthew, 23, 34; Ephesians, 5, 3.) 4. How, &c.—The figure of the new birth, if it had been meant only of Gentile proselytes to this Jewish religion, would have been intelligible enough to Nicodemus, being quite in keeping with the language of that day; but that Jews themselves should need a new birth was to him incomprehensible. 5. of water and of the Spirit—A twofold explanation of the "new birth," so startling to Nicodemus. To a Jewish ecclesiastic, so familiar with the symbolical application of water, in every variety of way and form of expression, this language was fitted to show that the thing intended was no other than a thorough spiritual purification by the operation of the Holy Ghost. Indeed this element of water and operation of the Spirit are brought together in a glorious evangelical prediction of Ezekiel (36, 25-27), which Nicodemus might have been reminded of had such spiritualities not been almost lost in the reigning formalism. Already had the symbol of water been embodied in an initiatory ordinance, in the baptism of the Jewish expectants of Messiah by the Baptist, not to speak of the baptism of Gentile proselytes before that; and in the Christian Church it was soon to become the great visible door of entrance into "the kingdom of God," the reality being the sole work of the Holy Ghost. (Titus, 3, 5.) 6-8. That which is born, &c.—A great universal proposition; "That which is begotten carries within itself the nature of that which begets it." [OLSHAUSEN.] flesh—Not the mere material body, but all that comes into the world by birth, the entire man; yet not humanity simply, but in its corrupted, depraved condition, in complete subjection to the law of the fall (Romans, 5, 1-9). So that though a man "could enter a second time into his mother's womb and be born," he would be no nearer this "new birth" than before (Job, 14, 4; Psalm 51, 5). is spirit—Partakes of and possesses His spiritual nature. Marvel not, &c.—If a spiritual nature only can see and enter the kingdom of God; if all we bring into the world with us be the reverse of spiritual; and if this spiritual-ity be solely of the Holy Ghost, no wonder a new birth is indispensable. ye must—Ye, says Jesus, not yet. [BENGOEL.] After those universal propositions, about what "a man" must be, to "enter the king- dom of God,"—this is remarkable, showing that our Lord meant to hold himself forth as "separate from sinners." The wind, &c.—Breath and spirit (one word both in Hebrew and Greek), are constantly brought together in Scripture as analogous (Job, 27, 3; 33, 4; Ezekiel, 37, 9-14). cannot tell, &c.—The laws which govern the motion of the winds are even yet but partially discovered; but the risings, fallings, and change in direction many times in a day, of those gentle breezes here referred to will probably ever be a mystery to us; So of the operation of the Holy Ghost in the new birth, 9, 10. How, &c.—Though the subject still confounds him, the necessity and possibility of the new birth is no longer the point with him, but the nature of it and how it is brought about. [LUTHARDE.] "From this moment Nicodemus says nothing more, but has sunk into a disciple who has found his true teacher. Therefore the Saviour now graciously advances in his communications of truth, and once more solemnly brings to the mind of this teacher in Israel, now become a learner, his own not guiltless ignorance, that He may then proceed to utter, out of the fulness of His divine knowledge, such farther testimonies both of earthly and heavenly things as his docile scholar may to his own profit receive." [STRICK.] master—teacher. The question clearly implies that the doctrine of regenera- tion is so far disclosed in the Old Testament that Nicodemus was culpable in being ignorant of it. Nor is it merely as something that should be experienced under the Gospel that the Old Testament holds it forth—as many distinguished critics allege, denying that there was any such thing as regeneration before Christ. For our Lord's proposition is universal, that no fallen man is or can be spiritual without a regenerating operation of the Holy Ghost, and the necessity of a spiritual obedience, under whatever name, in opposition to mere mechanical services, is proclaimed throughout all the Old Testament. 11-13. We speak that we know, and... have seen—i.e., by absolute knowledge and immediate vision of God, which "the only-begotten Son in the bosom of the Father" claims as exclusively His own, ch. 1. 18. The "we" and "our" are here used, though Himself only is intended, in emphatic contrast, probably, with the opening words of Nicodemus, "Rabbi, we know," &c. ye receive not, &c.—referring to the class to which Nicodemus belonged, but from which he was beginning to be separated in spirit. earthly things—such as regeneration, the gate of entrance to the kingdom of God on earth, and which Nicodemus should have understood better, as a truth even of that more earthly economy to which he belonged. heavenly things—The things of the new and more heavenly evangelical economy, only to be fully understood after the effusion of the Spirit from heaven through the exalted Saviour. no man hath ascended, &c. There is something paradoxical in this language—"No one has gone up but he that came down, even he who is at once both up and down." Doubtless it was intended to startle and constrain His auditor to think that there must be mysterious elements in His Person. The old Socinians, to subvert the doctrine of the pre-existence of Christ, seized upon this passage as teaching that the man Jesus was secretly caught up to heaven to receive his instructions, and then "came down from heaven" to deliver them. But the sense

In both cases, it is by directing the Remedy that the cure is effected bodily eye, in the other the gaze of the soul in Him, as in that glorious:—"Look unto me and be ye saved earth," &c. (Isaiah, 45. 22). Both being to human reason. What, to could seem more unlikely than should be dried up in his body by reptile of brass? Such a stumbling and to the Greeks foolishness would Nazarene, as a way of delirious. Yet was the warrant in a cure equally rational and we serpent was God's ordinance for ten Israelite, so is Christ for the perishing sinner—the one however ordinance, the other divinely appointed malady. In both cases same. As one simple look at distant and however weak, brought cure, even so, real faith in the tremulous, however distant—both brings certain and instant healing soul. In a word, the consequence the same in both. Doubtless to galling as speculate on the absurdity of a living serpent to be cured of dead metal in the shape of one they died. Alas! is not salvific deceiver subjected to like treatment of the cross? yet ceased? For God so loved, &c.—What protocol has been so set on the lips and do what will bear the light. Therefore "comes to the light," that all he is doing thus thoroughly tested, may be seen in it but what is divinely wrought and proved. This is the "Israelite, indeed, in rille."

US IN THE NEIGHBOURHOOD OF THE NOBLE TESTIMONY TO HIS MASTER. Judæa—The rural parts of that province, conversation being held in the capital, he sense explained in ch. 4. 2. Æon... West of Jordan. (cf. v. 26 with ch. 1. 25.) east into prison—Hence it is plain that industry did not commence with the imprisonment, though, but for this, we should have inference from Matthew, 4. 12, &c., and express statement, 25. 28, between some on the part of' and the Jews—rather the best MSS. 'and a Jew.' about puritanism, the symbolical meaning of washing, being put (as in ch. 2. 6) for the act and Jesus were the only teachers who discussions might easily arise between disciples and such Jews as declined to at rite. Rabbi, &c.—'Master, this man be to whom thou barest such generous of Jordan is requiting thy generosity by re people away to himself. At this rate, on have no disciples at all.' The reply of the noblest and most affecting utterer came from the lips of man, 27-30. A so my heaven-prescribed work, and that me. Would you have me mount into my e? Said I not unto you, I am not the Bride is not mine, why should the people? Mine it is to point the burdened to the that taketh away the sin of the world, to re is balm in Gilead, and a Physician shall I grudge to see them, in obedience lying as a cloud, and as doves to their those is the Bride but the Bridgroom's: ne to be the Bridgroom's Friend, sent gotiate the match, privileged to bring avour and those He is come to seek and joicing with joy unspeakable if I may d hear the Bridgroom's voice," witness d espousals. Say, ye, then, they go from Ye bring me glad tidings of great joy, ese, but I must decrease: this, my joy, 'filled.' A man can receive, &c.—'can ng,' &c., lawfully and with any success; an has his work and sphere appointed ove. Even Christ Himself came under rews, 5. 4. 31-34. He that, &c.—Here why He must increase while all human e decrease. The Master "cometh from ending from His proper element, the e "heavenly things" which He came to, although mingling with men and things a not "of the earth," either in Person or had said, "All come to Him" (v. 26). The Baptist here virtually says, Would it were so, but alas! they are next to "none." (BENGEL.) They were far readier to receive himself, and obliged him to say, I am not the Christ, and he seems pained at this, hath set to His seal, &c.—gives glory to God whose words Christ speaks, not as prophets and apostles by a partial communication of the Spirit to them, for God giveth not the Spirit by measure—Here, again, the sharpest conceivable line of distinction is drawn between Christ and all human-inspired teachers: 'They have the Spirit in a limited degree; but God giveth not (to Him) the Spirit by measure.' It means 'the entire fullness of divine life and divine power.' The present sense "giveth," very aptly points out the permanent communication of the Spirit by the Father to the Son, so that a constant flow and re-flow of living power is to be understood.' (cf. ch. 1. 51.) (OLMHAUSEN.) 35, 36. The Father loveth, &c.—See on Matthew, 11. 27, where we have the "delivering over of all things into the hands of the Son," while here we have the deep spring of that august act in the Father's ineffable "love of the Son," hath everlasting life—already hath it. See on v. 18, and ch. 5. 24. shall not see life—The contrast here is striking: The one has already a life that will endure for ever—the other not only has it not now, but shall never have it—never see it, abideth on him—It was on Him before, and not being removed in the only possible way, by "believing on the Son," it necessarily remaineth on him! N.B.—How flatly does this contradict the teaching of many in our day, that there neither was, nor is, any thing in God against sinners which needed to be removed by Christ, but only in men against God.

CHAPTER IV.

Ver. 1-42. CHRIST AND THE WOMAN OF SAMARIA—THE SAMARITANS OF SYCHAR. 1. 4. the Lord knew—not by report, but in the sense of ch. 2. 25, for which reason He is here styled "the Lord," Jesus baptized not—John being a servant baptized with his own hand; Christ as the Master, "baptizing with the Holy Ghost," administered the outward symbol only through His disciples. left Judæa—to avoid persecution, which at that early stage would have marred His work, departed into Galilee—by which time John had been cast into prison (Mark, 1. 14), must needs go through Samaria—for a geographical reason, no doubt, as it lay straight in his way, but certainly not without a higher design. 5. cometh to—i.e., as far as; for He remained at some distance from it. Sychar—the "Shechem" of the Old Testament, about thirty-four miles from Jerusalem, afterwards called "Neapolis," and now "Nablous." 6-8. wearied, sat thus—i.e., 'as you might fancy a weary man would'; an instance of the graphic style of St. John, (WENSTER & WILKINSON.) In fact, this is perhaps the most human of all the scenes of our Lord's earthly history. We seem to be beside Him, overhearing all that is here recorded, nor could any painting of the scene on canvass, however perfect, do other than lower the conception which this exquisite patriarchal stone. But what music is that which I hear from His lips, "Come unto Me all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest" (Matthew, 11. 28). Give me to drink—for the heat of a noon-day sun had parched His lips. But "in the last, that great day of the feast," Jesus stood and cried, saying, "If any man thirst let him come unto me and drink" (ch. 7. 37). 9-12. How is it that thou—not altogether refusing, yet wondering at so unusual a request from a Jew, as his dress and dialect would at once discover him to be, to a Samaritan. For, &c.—It is this national antipathy that gives point to the parable of the good Samaritan (Luke, 10. 30, &c.), and the thankfulness of the Samaritan leper (Luke, 17. 16, 18). If thou knewest, &c.—q. d., 'In me thou seest only a petitioner to thee; but if thou knewest Who that Petitioner is, and the Gift that God is giving to men, thou wouldst have changed places with Him, gladly suing of Him living water—nor shouldst thou have sued in vain' (scently reflecting on her for not immediately meeting His request. Art thou greater, &c.—already perceiving in this Stranger a claim to some mysterious greatness, our father Jacob—for when it went well with the Jews they claimed kindred with them, as being descended from Joseph, but when misfortunes befel the Jews they disowned all connexion with them. [JOSEPHUS, 9. 14, 3.] 13. 14. thirst again... never thirst, &c.—The contrast here is fundamental and all comprehensive. "This water" plainly means "this natural water and all satisfactions of a like earthly and perishable nature." Coming to us from without, and reaching only the superficial parts of our nature, they are soon spent, and need to be anew supplied as much as if we had never experienced them before, while the deeper wants of our being are not reached by them at all; whereas the "water" that "Christ gives—spiritual life—is struck out of the very depths of our being, making the soul not a cistern, for holding water poured into it from without, but a fountain, the word had been better so rendered, to distinguish it from the word rendered "well" in v. 11), springing, gushing, bubbling up and flowing forth from within us, ever fresh, ever living. The unbellying of the Holy Ghost as the Spirit of Christ is the secret of this life with all its enduring energies and satisfactions, as is expressly said (ch. 7. 27-29). "Never thirsting," then, means simply that such souls have the supplies at home, into everlasting life—carrying the thoughts up from the eternal freshness and vitality of these waters to the great ocean in which they have their confluence." "Thither may I arrive!" [BENOIST.] 15-18. give me this water, &c.—This is not obtuseness—that is giving way—it expresses a wondering desire after she scarce knew what from this mysterious Stranger, call thy husband—now proceeding to arouse her slumbering conscience by laying bare the guilty life she was leading, and by the minute details which that life furnished not only bringing her sin vividly up before her, but preparing her to receive in His true character that wonderful Stranger to whom her whole life, in its minutest particulars, evidently lay open. 19. 20. Sir, I perceive, &c.—Seeing herself all revealed, does she now break down and ask what hopes there might be for one so guilty? Nay, her convictions have not reached that point yet. She ingeniously shifts the subject from a personal to a public question. It is not, 'Alas, what a wicked life am I leading!' but 'Lo, what a wonderful prophet I got into conversation with: He will be able to settle that interminable dispute between us and the Jews: Sir, you must know all about such matters—our fathers hold to this mountain here,' pointing, to Gerizim in Samaria, 'as the divinely consecrated place of worship, but ye Jews say that Jerusalem is the proper place—which of us is right?' How slowly does the human heart submit to thorough humiliation! (compare the prodigal; see on Luke, 15. 16.) Doubtless our Lord saw through the fetch; but does He say, 'That question is not the point just now, but Have you been living in the way described, yea or nay? Till this is disposed of I cannot be drawn into theological controversies.' The Prince of preachers takes another method: He humours the poor woman, letting her take her own way, allowing her to lead while He follows—but thus only the more effectually gaining His object. He answers her question, pours light into her mind on the spirituality of all true worship, as of its glorious Object, and so brings her insensibly to the point at which He could disclose to her wondering mind Whom she was all the while speaking to. 21-24. Woman, &c.—Here are three weighty pieces of information: (1.) 'The point raised will very soon cease to be of any moment, for a total change of dispensation is about to come over the church.' (2.) 'The Samaritans are wrong, not only as to the place, but the whole grounds and nature of their worship, while in all these respects the truth lies with the Jews.' (3.) 'As God is a Spirit, so He both invites and demands a spiritual worship, and already all is in preparation for a spiritual economy, more in harmony with the true nature of acceptable service than the ceremonial worship by consecrated persons, place, and times, which God for a time has seen meet to keep up till fulness of the time should come,' neither in this mountain nor at Jerusalem—i. e., exclusively. (Malachi, 1. 11; 1 Timothy, 2. 8.) worship the Father—She had talked simply of "worship;" our Lord brings up before her the great OBJECT of all acceptable worship—"THE FATHER." Ye worship ye know not what—without any revealed authority, and so very much in the dark. In this sense, the Jews knew what they were about. But the most glorious thing here is the reason assigned, "FOR SALVATION IS OF THE JEWS," intimating to her that Salvation was not a thing left to be reached by any one who might vaguely desire it of a God of mercy, but something that had been revealed, prepared, deposited with a particular people, and must be sought in connexion with, and as issuing from them; and that people "the Jews" hour cometh and now is—evidently meaning her to understand that this new economy was in some sense being set up while He was talking to her, a sense which would in a few minutes so far appear, when He told her plainly He was the Christ. 25, 26. I know Messias cometh, when He is come, &c.—If we take our Lord's immediate disclosure of Himself, in answer to this, as the proper key to its meaning to His ear, we can hardly doubt that the woman was already all but prepared for even this startling announcement, which indeed she seems (from v. 29) to have already begun to suspect by His revealing her to herself. Thus quickly, under so matchless a Teacher, was she brought up from her sunken condition to a frame of mind and heart capable of the noblest revelations. Tell us all things—an expectation founded probably on Deuteronomy, 18. 15. I that speak am he—He scarce ever said anything like this to His own people, the Jews. He had magnified them to the woman, and yet to themselves He is to the last far more reserved than to her—proving rather than plainly telling them He was the Christ. But what would not have been safe among them was safe enough with her, whose simplicity at this stage of the conversation appears from the sequel to have become perfect. What now will the woman say? We listen, the scene has changed, a new party arrives, the disciples have been to Sychar, at some distance, to buy bread, and on their return are astonished at the company their Lord has been holding in their absence. 27. marvelled that he talked with the woman—It never probably occurred to them to marvel that He talked with themselves; yet in His eye, as the sequel shows, He was quite as nobly employed. How poor, if not

was a water of wondrous virtue that above meat and drink, and the vessels, and all human things. In short, she ed, forgot every thing but one; and her over with the tale she had to tell, she and pour-it out. [OLSHAUSEN.] 39-42. many believed, &c.—'The truth of v. 35 begins to appear. These Samaritans were the foundation of the church afterwards built up there. No miracle appears to have been wrought there [but unparalleled supernatural knowledge displayed]: "we have heard him ourselves" sufficed to raise their faith to a point never attained by the Jews, and hardly as yet by the disciples—that He was "the Saviour of the world." [ALFORD.] 'This incident is farther remarkable as a rare instance of the Lord's ministry producing an awakening on a large scale.' [OLSHAUSEN.] abode two days — Two precious days, surely, to the Redeemer Himself! Unought, He had come to His own, yet His own received Him not: now those who were not His own had come to Him, been won by Him, and invited Him to their town that others might share with them in the benefit of His wonderful ministry. Here, then, would He solace His already wounded spirit, and have in this outfield village-triumph of His grace a sublime foretaste of the ingathering of the whole Gentile world into the church. 43-54. SECOND GALILEAN MIRACLE—HEALING OF THE COURTIER'S SON. 43, 44. After two days—lit., 'the two days' of His stay at Sychar. For Jesus testified, &c.—This verse has occasioned much discussion. For it seems strange, if "His own country," here means Nazereth, which was in Galilee, that it should be said He came to Galilee because in one of its towns He expected no good reception. But all will be simple and natural if we fill up the statement thus: "He Manen (Acts, 13, 1), heard that Jesus was come out of Judea—where he had doubtless seen or heard what things Jesus had done at Jerusalem (v. 44). [BETHGAL.] come down—for Capernaum was down on the North West shore of the sea of Galilee. 48-54. Except ye see signs, &c.—He did believe, both as his coming and his urgent entreaty show; but how imperfectly we shall see; and our Lord would deepen his faith by such a blunt and seemingly rough answer as He made to Nicodemus. Come down ere my child die—'While we talk, the case is at its crisis, and if thou come not instantly, all is over.' This was faith, but partial, and our Lord would perfect it. The man cannot believe the cure could be wrought without the Physician coming to the patient—the thought of such a thing evidently never occurred to him. But Jesus will in a moment bring him up to this. Go thy way; thy son liveth—Both effects instantaneously followed.—'The man believed the word, and the cure, shooting quicker than lightning from Cana to Capernaum, was felt by the dying youth. In token of faith, the father takes his leave of Christ—in the circumstances this evidenced full faith. The servants hasten to convey the joyful tidings to the anxious parent, whose faith now only wants one confirmation. "If thou beganst to amend?" "Yesterday, at the seventh hour, the fever left him—the very hour in which was uttered that great word, "Thy Son liveth!" So "himself believed and his whole house." He had believed before this, first very imperfectly; then with assured confidence of Christ's word; but now with a faith crowned by "sight." And the wave rolled from the head to the members of his household. "To-day is salvation come to this house" (Luke, 10, 9); and no mean house this! second miracle Jesus did—i. e., in Cana; done "after he came out of Judea," as the former before.

CHAPTER V.

Ver. 1-47. THE IMPOTENT MAN HEALED—DISCOURSE OCCASIONED BY THE PERSECUTION ARISING THEREUPON. 1. A feast of the Jews—What feast! No question has more divided the Harmonists of the Gospels, and the duration of our Lord's ministry may be said to hinge on it. For if, as the majority have thought (until of late years) it was a Passover, His ministry lasted three-and-a-half years; if not, probably a year less. Those who are dissatisfied with the Passover view all differ among themselves what other feast it was, and some of the most acute think there are no grounds for deciding. In our judgment the evidence is in favour of its being a Passover, but the reasons cannot be stated here. 2, 3. sheep [market]—The supplement should be (as in Margyn) 'sheep [gate]', mentioned Nehemiah, 3, 1, 32. Bethesda—i. e., 'house [place] of mercy', from the cures wrought there. five porches—for shelter to the patients, impotent—or infirm. 4. An angel, &c.—This miracle differed in two points from all other miracles recorded in Scripture: (1.) It was not one but a succession of miracles periodically wrought; (2.) As it was only wrought "when the waters were troubled," so only upon one patient at a time, and that the patient "who first stepped in after the troubling of the waters." But this only the more undeniably fixed its miraculous character. We have heard of many waters having a medicinal virtue; but what water was ever known to cure instantaneously a single disease? And who ever heard of any water curing all, even the most diverse diseases—"blind, halt, withered"—alike? Above all, who ever heard of such a thing being done "only at a certain season," and most singularly of all, doing it only to the first person who stepped in after the moving of the waters? Any of these peculiarities—much more all taken together—must have proclaimed the supernatural character of the cures wrought. (If the text here be genuine, there can be no doubt of the miracle, as there were multitudes living when this gospel was published who, from their own knowledge of Jerusalem, could have exposed the falsehood of the evangelist, if no such cure had been known there. The want of v. 4 and part of v. 2, in some good MSS., and the use of some unusual words in the passage, are more easily accounted for than the evidence in their favour if they were not originally in the text. Indeed v. 7 is unintelligible without v. 4. The internal evidence brought against it is merely the unlikelihood of such a miracle—a principle which will carry us a great deal farther if we allow it to weigh against positive evidence.) 5-9. thirty-eight years—but not all that time at the pool. This was probably the most pitiable of all the cases, and therefore selected. saw him lie and knew, &c.—As He doubtless visited the spot just to perform this cure, so He knows where to find His patient, and the whole previous history of his case (ch. 2, 23). Will then be made whole!—Could any one doubt that a sick man would like to be made whole, or that the patients came thither, and this man had returned again and again, just in hope of a cure? But our Lord asked the question. (1.) To fasten attention upon Himself; (2.) By making him detail his case, to deepen in him the feeling of entire helplessness; (3.) By so singular a question, to begot in his desponding heart the hope of a cure. (Cf. Mark, 10, 51.) Sir, I have no man, &c.—Instead of saying he wished to be cured, he just talks with piteous simplicity how fruitless had been all his efforts to obtain it, and how helpless and all but hopeless he was. Yet not quite. For here he is at the pool, waiting on. It seemed of no use; nay, only tantalizing—"While I am coming another stepped down before me"—the fruit was snatched from his lips. Yet he will not go away. He may get nothing by staying, he may drop into his grave ere he get into the pool; but by going from the appointed, divine way of healing, he can get nothing. Wait therefore he will, wait he does, and when Christ comes to heal him, lo! he is waiting his turn. What an attitude for a sinner at Mercy's gate! The man's hopes seemed low enough ere Christ came to him. He might have said, just before "Jesus passed by that way." "This is no use; I'll never get in; let me die at home." Then all had been lost. But he held on, and his perseverance was rewarded with a glorious cure. Probably some rays of hope darted into his heart as he told his tale before those Eyes whose glance measured his whole case. But the word of command consummates his preparation, to receive the cure, and instantaneously works it. Rise, take up thy bed, &c.—"Immediately" he did so. "He spake and it was done." The slinging of his portable couch over his shoulders was designed to show the perfection of the cure. the same day was the Sabbath—beyond all doubt this was intentional, as in so many other healings, in order that when opposition arose on this account men might be compelled to listen to His claims and His teaching. 10-16. The Jews—i. e., those in authority. See on ch. 1, 19. It is not lawful to carry thy bed—a glorious testimony to the cure, as instantaneous and complete, from the lips of the most prejudiced! (And what a contrast does it, as all our Lord's miracles, present to the bungling miracles of the Church of Rome?) In ordinary circumstances, the rulers had the law on their side. (Nehemiah, 12, 12; Jeremiah, 17, 21.) But when the man referred them to "Him that had made him whole" as his authority, the argument was resistless. Yet they ingeniously parried the thrust, asking him, not who had "made him whole"—that would have condemned themselves and defeated their purpose—but who had told him "take up his bed and walk" in other words, who had dared to order a breach of the Sabbath? The time we were looking after him—thus hoping to shake the man's faith in his Healer. he that was healed went the proper Objects, show him greater things, &c.—re- referring to what He goes on to mention (v. 21-31), com- prised in two great words, LIFE and JUDGMENT, which STRICK beautifully calls God's Regalia. Yet these Christ says the Father and He do in common. 21-23. raiseth the dead and quickeneth them—one act in two stages. This is His absolute prerogative as God, so the son quickeneth—i. e., raiseth up and quickeneth, whom He will—not only doing the same divine act, but doing it as the result of His own will, even as the Fa- ther does it. This statement is of immense impor- tance in relation to the miracles of Christ, distin- guishing them from similar miracles of prophets and apostles, who as human instruments were employed to perform supernatural actions, while Christ did all as the Father's commissioned Servant indeed, but in the exercise of His own absolute right of action. For the Father judgeth no man, &c.—rather, 'For neither doth the Father judge any man,' implying that the same "thing was meant in the former verse of the quicken- ing of the dead"—both acts being done, not by the Father and the Son, as though twice done, but by the Father through the Son as His voluntary Agent. all judgment—judgment in its most comprehen- sive sense, or as we should say, all administration, honour the Son as...the Father.—As he who believes that Christ in the foregoing verses has given a true account of His relation to the Father must of necessity hold Him entitled to the same honour as the Father, so He here adds that it was the Father's express intention to making over all judgment to the Son, that men should thus honour Him, honoureth not the Father, &c.—does not do it in fact, whatever he may imagine, and will be held as not doing it by the Father Himself, who will accept no homage which is not accorded to His own Son. 24. believeth on Him that sent me—i. e., be- lieveth in him as having sent Me. q. d., I have spoken of the Son's right not only to heal the sick but to raise from the dead, and quicken whom He will: And now I say unto you, That life-giving operation has already passed upon all who receive my words as the Sent of the Father on the great errand of mercy, hath everlasting life—immediately on his believing (cf. ch. 3, 18; 1 John, 5, 12, 13). is passed—"hath passed over" "from death unto life." What a transition! cf. 1 John, 2, 14, 25-29. the hour cometh—in its whole fulness, at Pente- cost, and now is—in its beginnings, the dead—the spiritually dead, as is clear from v. 28. Here He rises from the calmer phrase "hearing his word" (v. 24), to the grander expression, "hearing the voice of the Son of God," to signify that as it finds men in a dead condition, so it carries with it a resurrection-power, shall live—in the sense of v. 24. given to the Son, &c.—Does this refer to the essential life of the Son before all time (ch. 1, 4) [as most of the Fathers, and OLSHAUSEN, STIER, ALFORD, &c., among the moderns], or to the purpose of God that this essential life should reside in the Person of the incarnate Son, and be manifested thus to the world? [CALVIN, LUCKE, LUTHER, &c.] The question is as difficult as the subject is high. But as all that Christ says of His essential relation to the Father is intended to explain and exalt his mediatorial functions, so the one seems in our Lord's own mind and language mainly the starting-point of the other, because he is the Son of Man—This seems to confirm the last remark, that what Christ had properly in view was the indwelling of the Son's essential life in humanity as the great theatre and medium of divine display, in both the great departments of His work—life-giving and judgment. The appointment of a Judge in our own nature is one of the most beautiful arrangements of divine wisdom in redemption. Marvel not at this—this committal of all judgment to the Son of Man. for the hour is coming, —He adds not in this case (as in v. 25, "and now is," because this was not to be till the close of the whole dispensation of mercy, resurrection of life—i.e., 'to life' everlasting. (Matthew, 26, 46.) of damnation—It would have been harsh to say 'the resurrection of death,' though that is meant, for sinners rise from death to death. [BENGL.] The resurrection of both classes is an exercise of sovereign authority; but in the one case it is an act of grace, in the other of justice. (cf. Daniel, 12, 2, from which the language is taken.) How awfully grand are these unfoldings of His dignity and authority from the mouth of Christ Himself! And they are all in the third person; in whose follows He resumes the first person. 30-32. of mine own self do nothing—i.e., apart from the Father, or in any interest of my own. See on v. 19) as I hear—q.d., 'My judgments are all anticipated in the bosom of my Father, to which I have immediate access, and by me only responded to and referred. They cannot therefore err, as I live for one end only, to carry into effect the will of Him that sent me. If I witness of myself—standing alone, and setting up any separate interest. There is another—i.e., the Father, as is plain from the connection. How brightly the distinction of the Persons shines out here! and I know that the witness, &c.—'This is the Son's testimony to the Father's truth (see ch. 7, 28; 8, 26, 55). It testifies to the full consciousness on the part of the Son, even in the days of His humiliation of the righteousness of the Father.' [ALFORD.] And thus he cheered His spirit under the cloud of human opposition which was already gathering over His head. 33-35. Ye sent unto John—(see ch. 1, 19, &c.) receive not testimony from men—i.e., depend not on human testimony. but...that ye may be saved—'I refer to him merely to aid your faith, in order to your salvation.' He was a burning and a shining light—lit., 'the burning and shining lamp' (or torch)—q.d., 'the great light of his day.' Christ is never called by the humble word here applied to John—a light-bearer—studiously used to distinguish him from his Master, but over the Light in the most absolute sense. See on ch. 1, 9, willing for a season—i.e., till they saw that it pointed whether they were not prepared to go, to reject in his light—There is a play of irony here, referring to the hollow delight with which his testimony tickled them. 36-38. I have greater witness—i.e., The witness which I have is greater.' The works...bear witness of me—not simply as miracles nor even as miracles of mercy, but these miracles, as He did them, with a will and a power, a holiness and a grace manifestly His own. The Father himself hath borne witness of me—not referring, probably, to the voice of His baptism, but as seems from what follows: to the testimony of the Old Testament Scripture. [CALVIN, LUCKE, MEYER, LUTHER, &c.] neither heard his voice, &c.—never recognised him in this character. The words are 'designated mysterious, like many others which our Lord uttered.' [STER.] not his word abiding in you—passing now from the Witness to the testimony borne by him in 'the lively oracles,' both were alike strangers to their breasts, as was evidenced by their rejecting Him to whom all that witness was borne. 39-42. Search the Scriptures, &c.—q.d., 'In the Scriptures ye find your charter of eternal life; go search them then, and you will find that I am the Great Burden of their testimony; yet ye will not come to Me for that life eternal which you profess to find there, and of which they tell you I am the appointed Dispenser.' (cf. Acts, 17, 11, 12.) How touching and gracious are these last words! Observe here 1). The honour which Christ gives to the Scriptures, as a record which all have a right and are bound to search—the reverse of which the Church of Rome teaches; 2). The opposite extreme is, resting in the mere Book, without the living Christ, to direct the soul to Whom is its main use and chiefest glory. I receive not honour from men—contrasting His own end with theirs, which was to obtain human applause, not the love of God in you—which would inspire you with a single desire to know His mind and will, and yield yourselves to it, in spite of prejudice and regardless of consequences. 42-47. If another snail come, &c.—How strikingly has this been verified in the history of the Jews! 'From the time of the true Christ to our time, sixty-four false Christs have been reckoned by whom they have been deceived.' [BENGL.] How can ye believe! &c.—(See on v. 40, 41.) The "scit not" of v. 40, and "cannot" here are just different features of the same awful state of the human heart. Do not think I will accuse you—q.d., 'My errand hither is not to collect evidence to condemn you at God's bar.' See that judgeth you, Moses, &c.—q.d., 'Alas! that will be too well done by another, and him the object of all your religious boastings—Moses,' here put for 'the Law,' the basis of the Old Testament Scriptures. He wrote of me—an important testimony to the subject of the whole Pentateuch—"of Me" [ALFORD.] If ye believe not, &c. (See on Luke, 16, 31.) His writings...my words—a remarkable contrast, not absolutely exalting Old Testament Scripture above His own words, but pointing to the office of those venerable documents to prepare Christ's way, to the necessity universally felt for documentary testimony in revealed religion, and perhaps as STRICK adds: to the relation which the comparative "letter" of the Old Testament holds to the more flowing "words" of "spirit and life" which characterise the New Testament.

CHAPTER VI.

Ver. 1-13. FIVE THOUSAND MIRACULOUSLY FED. (See on Mark, 6, 31-34, 3, a mountain—somewhere in that hilly range which skirts the East side of the lake. 4. passover...was night—but for the reason mentioned, ch. 7, 1, Jesus kept away from it, remaining in Galilee. 11-21. JESUS WALKS ON THE SEA. See also on Mark, 6, 45-56. 14-15, that prophet—(see on ch. 1, 21.) 15, departed to a mountain himself alone—[1] to rest, which He came to this "desert place" on purpose to do before the miracle of the loaves, but could not for the multitude that followed Him—see on Mark, 6, 31; and [2] "to pray," Matthew, 14, 23; Mark, 6, 46. But from His mountain-top He kept watching the ship (see on c. 18), and doubtless prayed both for them, and with a view to the new manifestation which He was to give them of His glory. 16, 17, when even was come—(See on Mark, 6, 35.) entered into a ship—"constrained" to do so by their Master (Matthew, 14, 22; Mark, 6, 46), in order to put an end to the miscreed excitement in His favour v. 15, into which the disciples themselves may have been somewhat drawn. The word "constrained" implies reluctance on their part, perhaps from unwillingness to part with their Master and embark at night, leaving Him alone on the mountain. went—rather, 'were proceeding,' towards Capernaum—Mark says 6, 45, "unto Bethsaida," meaning "Bethsaida of Galilee" (ch. 12, 21, on the West side of the lake. The place they left was of the same name (see on Mark, 6, 31.) Jesus was not come to them—They probably lingered in hopes of His still joining them, and so let the darkness come on. 18, 19, sea arose, &c.—and they were "now in the midst of it," Matthew, 14, 24. Mark adds the graphic and touching particular, "He saw them toiling in rowing" (6, 48, putting forth all their strength to buffet the waves and bear on against a head wind, but to little effect, He saw this from His mountain-top, and through the darkness of the night, for His heart was all with them; yet would He not go to their relief till His own time came. they see Jesus—"about the fourth watch of the night" (Matthew, 14, 25; Mark, 6, 48), or between three and six in the morning, walking on the sea—What Job 9, 8; celebrates as the distinguishing prerogative of God, "WHO ALONE radeth out the heavens, and treadeth upon the waves of the sea"—what Agur challenges as God's approachable prerogative, to "GATHER THE WIND HIS FEET, and BIND THE WATERS IN A GARMENT" (verbs, 30, 4)—lo! this is here done in flesh, by "THE SON OF MAN," drawing nigh to the ship—yet as though "would have passed by them" (Mark, 6, 45 (cf. 8, 24, 25; Genesis, 18, 3, 5; 32, 24-26,)) they were stricken—"cried out for fear" (Matthew, 14, 26), "supposing it had been a spirit" (Mark, 6, 49). He would appear to them at first like a dark moving speck upon the waters; then as a human figure, but—in the dark, pestilential sky, and not dreaming that it could be the Lord—they take it for a spirit. (How often thus miscall our chiefest mercies—not only thinking of a distant when they are near, but thinking the best worst!) 20. It is I: be not afraid—Matthew and Mark give before these exhilarating words, that to a well-known one, "Be of good cheer!" 21. willingly drew him into the ship—their first fears being now perturbed into wonder and delight, and immediately the ship was as the land—This additional miracle, for as it is manifestly related, is recorded here alone. All that is meant seems to be that as the storm suddenly calmed, so the little bark—propelled by secret power of the Lord of nature now sailing in it sped through the now unruffled waters, and, while they were wrapt in wonder at what had happened, not feeling their rapid motion, was found at port, to their further surprise.

21. JESUS, FOLLOWED BY THE MULTITUDES TO CAPERNAUM, DISCOURSES TO THEM IN THE SYNAGOGUE OF THE BREAD OF LIFE—EFFECT OF THIS TWO CLASSES OF THE DISCIPLES. 22-24. These two are a little involved, from the Evangelist's desire to mention every circumstance however minute that might call up the scene as vividly to the reader as stood before his own view. The day following—the acie of the loaves, and the stormy night; the day which they landed at Capernaum, the people which drew on the other side of the sea—not the whole multitude that had been fed, but only such of them as remained over night about the shore, &c., on the east side of the lake; for we are supposed to have come, in Jesus and his disciples in the ship, to the west side, to Capernaum, saw that there was none other there, &c.—The meaning is, the people had observed that there had been only one boat on the East side where they were, namely, the one in which the disciples had crossed at night to the other, the West side, & they had also observed that Jesus had not gone on that boat, but His disciples had put off without him: "Howbeit," adds the Evangelist, in a lively metaphor, "there came other boats from Tiberias' side lay near the south-west coast of the lake, some passengers were part of the multitude that had followed Jesus to the East side, and were miraculously fed: these boats were fastened somewhere (says the Evangelist) nigh unto the place where they did eat and sleep, after that the Lord had given thanks"—thus refers to the glorious "miracle of the loaves"—and as they were put in requisition to convey the people back again to the West side. For when "the people saw that Jesus was not there, neither his disciples, they took shipping (in these boats) and came to Capernaum, seeking for Jesus." 25. when they found him on the other side (at Capernaum) they said, &c.—astonished His being there, and wondering how he could have accomplished it, whether by land or water, and taken care: for being quite unaware of His having walked on the sea and landed with the disciples in the ship, they could not see how, unless He had travelled all the way round the head of the lake alone, he could have reached Capernaum, and even then, how he could have stood before themselves. 26. Ye seek me, &c.—Jesus does not pass them through their difficulty, says nothing of His treading on the waves of the sea, nor even notices their question, but takes advantage of the favourable moment for pointing out to them how forward, flippant, and superficial were their views, and how low their desires. "Ye seek me not because ye saw the miracles"—i. e., 'the signs,' i. e., supernatural tokens of a higher presence, and a divine commission, "but because ye did eat of the loaves and were filled." From this He proceeds at once to that other Bread, just as, with the woman of Samaria, to that other Water (ch. 4.). We should have supposed all that follows to have been delivered by the way-side, or wherever they happened first to meet. But from v. 59 we gather that they had probably met about the door of the synagogue—for that was the day in which they assembled in their synagogues (LIGHTFOOT)—and that on being asked, at the close of the service, if He had any word of exhortation to the people, He had taken the two breads, the perishing and the living bread, for the subject of His profound and extraordinary discourse. 27. which the Son of Man—taking that title of Himself which denoted His incarnate life, shall give unto you—in the sense of v. 51. Him hath God the Father sealed—marked out and authenticated for that transcendent office, to impart to the world the bread of an everlasting life, and this in the character of "the Son of Man." 28-31. What shall we do... the works of God—such works as God will approve. Different answers may be given to such a question, according to the spirit which prompts the inquiry. (See Hosea, 6, 6-8; Luke, 3, 12-14.) Here our Lord, knowing whom he had to deal with, shapes His reply accordingly. This is the work of God, &c.—That lies at the threshold of all acceptable obedience, being not only the pre-requisite to it, but the proper spring of it—in that sense, the work of works, emphatically "the work of God." What sign shewest thou, &c.—But how could they ask "a sign," when many of them scarce a day before had witnessed such a "sign" as had never till then been vouchsafed to men; when after witnessing it, they could hardly be restrained from making Him a king; when they followed Him from the one side of the lake to the other; and when, in the opening words of this very discourse, He had bid for seeking Him, "not because they saw the signs," but for the loaves? The truth seems to be, that they were confounded by the novel claims which our Lord had just advanced. In proposing to make Him a king, it was for far other purposes than dispensing to the world the bread of an everlasting life; and when He seemed to raise His claims even higher still, by representing it as the grand "work of God," that they should believe on Himself as his Sent One, they saw very clearly that He was making a demand upon them beyond any thing they were prepared to accord to Him, and beyond all that man had ever before made. Hence their question, "What dost thou work?" Our fathers did eat manna, &c.—insinuating the inferiority of Christ's miracle of the loaves to those of Moses; q. d., "When Moses claimed the confidence of the fathers, 'he gave them bread from heaven to eat'—not for a few thousands but for millions, and not once only, but daily throughout their wilderness journey" 32, 33. Moses gave you not, &c.—q. d., 'it was not Moses that gave you the manna, and even it was but from the lower heavens: "but My Father giveth you the true bread," and that "from heaven." The bread of God is He, &c.—This verse is perhaps best left in its own transparent grandeur—holding up the Bread Itself as divine, spiritual, and eternal; its ordained Fountain and essential Substance, "Him who came down from heaven to give it" (that Eternal Life which was with the Father and was manifested unto us.) 1 John, 1, 2; and its designed objects, "the world." 34. Lord evermore give us this bread—speaking now with a certain reverence (as at v. 25, the perpetuity of the manna floating perhaps in their minds, and much like the Samaritan woman, when her eyes were but half opened. "Sir, give me this water," &c. (ch. 4. 15.) 35. I am the Bread of Life—Henceforth the discourse is all in the first person. "I," "Me," which occurs in one form or other, as STRICK reckons, thirty-five times. He that cometh to me—to obtain what the soul craves, and as the only all-sufficient and ordained source of supply, hunger... thirst—shall have conscious and abiding satisfaction. 36. But ye have seen me and believe not—seen Him not in his mere bodily presence, but in all the majesty of His life, His teaching, His works. 37-40. All that, &c.—This comprehensive and very grand passage is expressed with a peculiar artistic precision. The opening general statement (v. 37), consists of two members: (1.) "ALL THAT THE FATHER GIVETH ME SHALL COME TO ME"—q.d., "Though ye, as I told you, have no faith in me, my errand into the world shall in no wise be defeated; for all that the Father giveth me shall infallibly come to me." Observe, what is given Him by the Father is expressed in the singular number and neuter gender—it, "everything"; while those who come to Him are put in the masculine gender and singular number—"every one." The whole mass, so to speak, is gifted by the Father to the Son as a unity, which the Son evolves, one by one, in the execution of His trust. So, ch. 17. 2, "that he should give eternal life to all that which thou hast given him." [BENGEL.] This "shall" expresses the glorious certainty of it, the Father being pledged to see to it that the gift be no empty mockery. (2.) "AND HIM THAT COMETH TO ME I WILL IN NO WISE CAST OUT." As the former was the divine, this is just the human side of the same thing. True, the "coming" ones of the second clause are just the "given" ones of the first. But had our Lord merely said, "When those that have been given me of my Father shall come to me, I will receive them,—besides being very fast, the impression conveyed would have been quite different, sounding as if there were no other laws in operation, in the movement of sinners to Christ, but such as are wholly divine and invariable to us; whereas, though He does speak of it as a sublime certainty which men's refusals cannot frustrate, He speaks of that certainty as taking effect only by their voluntary advances to Him and acceptance of Him—"Him that cometh to me," "whosoever will," throwing the door wide open. Only it is not the simply willing, but the actually coming, whom He will not cast out; for the word here employed usually denotes arrival, as distinguished from the ordinary word, which rather expresses the act of coming; see ch. 8. 42. Greek. [WEBSTER & WILKINSON.] "In no wise" is an emphatic negative, to meet the fears of the timid as in Revelation, 21. 27, to meet the presumption of the hardened. These, then, being the two members of the general opening statement, what follows is meant to take in both. "For I came down from heaven not to do mine own will"—to play an independent part—"but (in respect to both the foregoing things, the divine and the human side of salvation) the will of him that sent me." What this two-fold will of him that sent Him is, we are next sublimely told (v. 39, 40): "And this"—in the first place—"is the will of Him that sent me, that of all ('every thing') which he hath given me (taking up the identical words of v. 37), I should lose nothing, but should raise it up at the last day." The meaning is not, of course, that He is charged to keep the objects entrusted to Him as He received them, so as they should merely suffer nothing in His hands. For as they were just "perishing" sinners of Adam's family, to let "nothing" of such "be lost," but "raise them up at the last day," must involve, first, "giving his flesh for them" (v. 51), that they "might not perish but have everlasting life," and then, after "keeping them from falling," raising their sleeping dust in incorruption and glory, and presenting them, body and soul, perfect and entire, wanting nothing, to Him who gave them to Him, saying, "Behold I and the children which God hath given me." So much for the first will of Him that sent Him, the divine side of man's salvation, whose every stage and movement is inscrutable to us but infallibly certain. "And this"—in the second place—"is the will of Him that sent me, that every one which seeth the Son and believeth (or 'seeing the Son believeth') on Him, may have everlasting life, and I will raise him up at the last day." This is the human side of the same thing as in the foregoing verse, and answering to "Him that cometh unto me I will in no wise cast out" q.d., "I have it expressly in charge that every one that so 'beholdeth' ('so vieweth') the Son as to believe on Him shall have everlasting life; and that none of him be lost, 'I will raise him up at the last day.'" See on v. 64. 41-46. Jews murmured—or 'muttered,' not in our Lord's hearing, but He knew it, v. 43. (ch. 2. 24.) he said, I am the bread, &c.—Missing the sense and glory of this, and having no relish for such sublimities, they harp upon the "Bread from heaven." "What oost this mean? Do we not know all about him—where, when, and of whom he was born? And yet he says he came down from heaven? Murmur not... No man—q.d., 'Be not either startled or stumbled at these sayings; for it needs divine teaching to understand them, divine drawing to submit to them.'—as come to me—in the sense of v. 35. except the Father which hath sent me—i.e., the Father as the Sender of Me and to carry out the design of my mission. draw him—by an internal and efficacious operation; though by all the means of rational conviction, and in a way altogether consonant to their moral nature (Sons of Solomon, 1. 4; Jeremiah, 31. 3; Hosea, 11. 3. 4). raise him up, &c.—See on v. 64. written in the prophets—In Isaiah, 64. 13; Jeremiah, 31. 33, 54; or other similar passages may also have been in view. Our Lord thus falls back upon Scripture authority for this seemingly hard saying, all taught of God—not by external revelation merely, but by internal illumination, corresponding to the "drawing" of v. 44. every man therefore, &c.—i.e., who hath been thus efficaciously taught of him. cometh unto me—with absolute certainty, yet in the sense above given of "drawing" q.d., "As none can come to me but as divinely drawn, so none thus drawn shall fail to come." Not that any man hath seen, &c.—Less they should confound that "hearing and learning of the Father," to which believers are admitted by divine teaching, with His own immediate access to Him. He here throws in a parenthetical explanation; stating as explicitly as words could do it, how totally different the two cases were, and that only He who is "from God" hath this naked, immediate access to the Father. (See ch. 1. 19.) 47-51. He that believeth, &c.—See on ch. 3. 30; 5. 24. I am the bread of life—As he that believeth in Me hath everlasting life, so I am Myself the everlasting Sustenance of that life. (Repeated from v. 36.) Your fathers—of whom ye speak (v. 31); not 'ours,' by which He would hint that He had a higher descent, of which they dreamt not. [BENGEL.] I did eat manna... and are dead—recurring to their own point about the manna, as one of the noblest of the ordained preparatory illustrations of His own office: "Your fathers, ye say, ate manna in the wilderness; and ye say well, for so they did, but they are dead—even they whose carcasses fell in the wilderness did eat of that bread; the Bread whereof I speak cometh down from heaven, which the manna never did, that man, eating of it, may live for ever." I am, &c.—Understand, it is of MYSELF I now speak as the Bread from heaven; of ME if a man eat he shall live for ever; and THE BREAD WHICH I WILL GIVE IS MY FLESH WHICH I WILL GIVE FOR THE LIFE OF THE WORLD." See, me in this high discourse, our Lord ex-duces His sacrificial death—for only a doubt this—not only as that which in the Bread of life to men, but as THAT IN HIM WHICH POSSESSES THE LIFE-FULNESS.—From this time we hear no more use of "Bread;" this figure is dropped, it takes its place. [STRICK.] The words ally distinct. As the living Father hath sent me—to communicate His own life, and I live by the Father—head of Christ is God." (1 Corinthians, 11, 3; 3, 23.) This is that bread, &c.—a sort of summing up of the whole discourse, on which let this one further remark suffice—that as our Lord, instead of softening down His figurative sublimities, or even putting them in naked phraseology, leaves the great truths of His Person and Office, and our participation of Him and it, enshrined for all time in those glorious forms of speech, so when we attempt to strip the truth of these figures, figures though they be, it goes away from us, like water when the vessel is broken, and our wisdom lies in raising our own spirit, and attuning our own ear, to our Lord's chosen modes of expression.

 (It should be added that although this discourse has nothing to do with the Sacrament of the Supper, the Sacrament has every thing to do with it, as the visible embodiment of these figures, and, to the believing part-taker, a real, yes, and the most lively and affecting participation of His flesh and blood, and nourishment thereby of the spiritual and eternal life, here below.) 59. These things said he in the synagogue—which seems to imply that what follows took place after the congregation had broken up. 60-65. Many of his disciples—His pretty constant followers, though an outer circle of them, hard saying—not merely harsh, but insupferable, as the word often means in the Old Testament, who can hear—submit to listen to it. Doth this offend...
 What and if, &c.—q.d., 'If ye are stumbled at what I have said, how will ye bear what I now say.' Not that His ascension itself would stumble them more than His death, but that after recoiling from the mention of the one they would not be in a state of mind to take in the other. the flesh profiteth nothing—Much of His discourse was about "flesh;" but flesh as such, mere flesh, could profit nothing, much less impart that life which the Holy Spirit alone communicates to the soul, the words I speak are spirit and life—the whole burden of the discourse is "spirit," not mere flesh, and "life" in its highest, not its lower sense, and the words I have employed are to be interpreted solely in that sense. But there are some, &c.—q.d., 'But it matters little to some of you in what sense I speak, for ye believe not.' This was said, adds the Evangelist, not merely of the outer but of the inner circle of His disciples; for He knew the traitor, though it was not yet time to expose him. Therefore said I, &c.—q.d., 'That was why I spoke to you of the necessity of divine teaching, which some of you are strangers to,' except it were given him—plainly showing that by the Father's "drawing" (v. 44) was meant an internal and efficacious operation, for in recalling the statement here He says, it must be "given to a man to come" to Christ. 66-71.
 From that time, &c.—or, in consequence of this. Those last words of our Lord seemed to have given them the finishing stroke—they could not stand it no longer, walked no mere—Many a journey, it may be, they had taken with Him, but now they gave Him finally up! the Twelve—the first time they are thus mentioned in this gospel. Will ye also go away!—Affecting appeal! Evident Christ felt the desertion of Him even by those miserable men who could not abide His statements; and seeing a disturbance even of the wheat by the violence of the wind which blew away the chaff (not yet visibly showing itself, but open to His eyes of fire), He would nip it in the bud by this home question.
 Then Simon Peter—whose forwardness in this case was noble, and to the wounded spirit of His Lord doubtless very grateful. Lord, to whom, &c.—q.d., "We cannot deny that we have been staggered as well as they, and seeing so many go away who, as we thought, might have been retained by teaching a little less hard to take in, our own endurance has been severely tried, nor have we been able to stop short of the question, Shall we follow the rest, and give it up? But when it came to this, our light returned and our hearts were re-assured. For as soon as we thought of going away, there rose upon us that awful question, "To whom shall we go?" To the lifeless formalism and wretched traditions of the elders? to the gods many and lords many of the heathen around us? or to blank unbelief? Nay, Lord, we are shut up. They have none of that "ETERNAL LIFE" to offer us whereof Thou hast been discoursing, in words rich and ravishing as well as in words staggering to human wisdom. That life we cannot want; that life we have learnt to crave as a necessity of the deeper nature which Thou hast awakened; "the words of that eternal life" (the authority to reveal it and the power to confer it: Thou hast: Therefore will we stay with Thee—we must.) And we believe, &c.—(see on Matthew, 16. 16.) Peter seems to have added this not merely—probably not so much—as an assurance to his Lord of his heart's belief in Him, as for the purpose of fortifying himself and his faithful brethren against that recoil from his Lord's harsh statements which he was probably struggling against with difficulty at that moment. N. B.—There are seasons when one's faith is tried to the utmost, particularly by speculative difficulties: the spiritual eye then swims, and all truth seems ready to depart from us. At such seasons, a clear perception that to abandon the faith of Christ is to face blank desolation, ruin and death; and on recollecting from this, to be able to fall back, not merely on first principles, and unmovable foundations, but on personal experience of a Loving Lord in whom all truth is wrapped up and made flesh for our very benefit—this is a relief unspcakable. Under that blessed Wing taking shelter, until we are again fit to grapple with the questions that have staggered us, we at length either find our way through them, or attain to a calm satisfaction in the discovery that they lie beyond the limits of present apprehension. Have not I chosen, and one of you is a devil;—q.d., "Well said, Simon-Barjona, but that "we" embraces not so wide a circle as in the simplicity of thine heart thou thinkest; for though I have chosen you but twelve, one even of these is a "devil" (the temple, the tool of that wicked one).

CHAPTER VII.

VET. 1-73. CHRIST AT THE FEAST OF TABERNACLES.

1. 2. After these things—i.e., all that is recorded after ch. 6. 18. waiked in Galilee—continuing His labours there, instead of going to Judea, as might have been expected, sought to kill him, &c.—referring back to ch. 5. 18. Hence it appears that our Lord did not attend the Passover mentioned at ch. 6. 4.—being the third since His ministry began, if the feast mentioned in ch. 6. 1, was a Passover, feast of tabernacles at hand—This was the last of the three annual festivals, celebrated on the 15th of the 7th month (September). See Leviticus, 23, 33, &c.; Deuteronomy, 16. 13, &c.; Nehemiah, 8. 14-18. 35. His brethren said—See on Matthew, 13. 54-56. Depart into Judea, &c.—In r. 5 this speech is ascribed to their unbelief. But as they were in the "upper room" among the one hundred and twenty disciples who waited for the descent of the Spirit after the Lord's ascension (Acts, 1. 14), they seem to have had their prejudices removed, perhaps after His resurrection. Indeed here their language is more that of strong prejudice and suspicion (such as near relatives, even the best, too frequently show in such cases), than formed unbelief. There was also, probably, a tincture of enmity in it. "Thou hast many disciples in Judea; here in Galilee they are fast dropping off; it is not like one who advances the claims thou dost to linger so long here, away from the city of our solemnities, where surely "the kingdom of our father David" is to be set up: "seeking," as thou dost, "to be known openly," those miracles of thine ought not to be confined to this distant corner, but submitted at head-quarters to the inspection of "the world." (See Psalm 68. 2, "I am become a stranger to my brethren, an alien unto my mother's children.") 6. 10 My time not yet come—i.e., for "showing Himself to the world." your time always ready, &c.—q.d., "It matters little when ye go up, for ye have no great plan in life, and nothing hangs upon your movements: With Me it is otherwise: on every movement of Mine there hangs what ye know not: The world has no quarrel with you, for ye bear no testimony against it, and so draw down upon yourselves none of its wrath; but I am here to lift up My voice against its hypocrisy, and denounce its abominations; therefore it cannot endure Me, and one false step might precipitate its fury on its Victim's head before the time: Away, therefore, to the feast as soon as it suits you; I follow at the fitting moment, but "My time is not yet full come." tear went ha...not openly—not "in the (caravan) company." Jews (the rulers) sought him—for no good end. Where is he?—He had not been at Jerusalem for probably a year and a half, much murmuring—"buzzing" among the Jews—"the multitudes;" the natural expression of a Jewish writer, indicating without design the crowded state of Jerusalem at this festival.' [WEBSTER & WILKINSON.] a good man...Nay...deserveth, &c.—the two opposite views of His claims, that they were honest, and that they were an imposition, none spoke openly of him—i.e., in His favour, "for fear of the ruling Jews." 14, 15. about the midst of the feast—the fourth or fifth day of the eight, during which it lasted, went up into the temple and taught—the word denotes formal and continuous teaching, as distinguished from mere casual sayings. This was probably the first time that He did so thus openly in Jerusalem. He had kept back till the feast was half through, to let the stir about Him subside, and entering the city unexpectedly, had begun His "teaching" at the temple, and created a certain awe, before the wrath of the rulers had time to break it. How knoweth...letters—learning. (Acts, 28. 34.) having never learned—at any rabbinical school, as Paul under Gamaliel. These rulers knew well enough that He had not studied under any human teacher—an important admission against ancient and modern attempts to trace our Lord's wisdom to human sources. [MEYER.] Probably His teaching on this occasion was expository, manifesting that unrivalled faculty and depth which in the Sermon on the mount had excited the astonishment of all. 16-18. doctrine...not mine, &c.—i.e., from Myself unauthorised; I am here by commission. A principle of immense importance, showing, on the one hand, that singleness of desire to please God is the grand inlet to light on all questions vitally affecting one's eternal interests, and, on the other, that the want of this, whether perceived or not, is the chief cause of infidelity amidst the light of revealed religion. seeketh his own glory, &c.—see on ch. 6. 41-44. 19, 20. The people answered, Thou hast a devil: who goeth about to kill thee?—This was said by "the multitude," who as yet had no bad feeling to Jesus.

 who had already drawn all eyes upon Him by His supernatural power and unrivalled teaching—"JESUS stood," probably in some elevated position, "and cried," as if making proclamation in the audience of all the people, "IF ANY MAN THIRST LET HIM COME UNTO ME AND DRINK!" What an offer! The deepest cravings of the human spirit are here, as in the Old Testament, expressed by the figure of "thirst," and the eternal satisfaction of them by "drinking." To the woman of Samaria He had said almost the same thing, and in the same terms, John, 4, 13, 14. But what to her was simply affirmed to her as a fact is here turned into a world-wide proclamation; and whereas there, the gift by Him of the living water is the most prominent idea—in contrast with her hesitation to give Him the perishable water of Jacob's well—here, the prominence is given to Himself as the Well-spring of all satisfaction. He had in Galilee invited all the WEARY AND HEAVY-LADEN of the human family to come under His wing and they should find REST (Matthew, 11, 28, which is just the same deep want, and the same profound relief of it, under another and equally grateful figure. He had in the synagogue of Capernaum (ch. 6.) announced Himself, in every variety of form, as "the BREAD of Life," and as both able and authorized to appease the "HUNGER," and quench the "THIRST," of all that apply to Him. There is, and there can be, nothing beyond that here. But what was on all those occasions uttered in private, or addressed to a provincial audience, is here sounded forth in the streets of the great religious metropolis, and in language of surpassing majesty, simplicity, and grace. It is just Jehovali's ancient proclamation now sounding forth through human flesh, "HO, EVERY ONE THAT THIRSTETH, COME YE TO THE WATERS, AND HE THAT HATH NO MONEY!" (Isaiah, 55, 1.) In this light we have but two alternatives; either to say with Calaphas of Him that uttered such words, "He is guilty of death," or falling down before Him to exclaim with Thomas, "MY LORD AND MY GOD!" as the Scripture hath said—These words belong to what follows, "Out of his belly, as the Scripture hath said, shall flow," &c., referring not to any particular passage, but to such as Isaiah, 58, 11; Joel, 3, 18; Zechariah, 14, 8; Ezekiel, 47, 1-12; in most of which the idea is that of waters issuing from beneath the Temple, to which our Lord compares Himself and those who believe in Him, out of his belly—i.e., his inner man, his soul, as in Proverbs, 20, 27. rivers of living water—See on ch. 4, 13, rectly also to the diffusiveness, of this living water to the good of others. This spake he of the spirit—Who, by His direct personal agency, opens up this spring of living waters in the human spirit (ch. 3, 6), and by His indwelling in the renewed soul ensures their unfailling flow, they that believe, &c.—As the Holy Ghost is, in the redemption of man, entirely at the service of Christ, as His Agent, so it is only in believing connexion with Christ that any one "receives" the Spirit. For the Holy Ghost was not yet [given]—Beyond all doubt the word "given," or some similar word, is the right supplement. In ch. 16, 7, the Holy Ghost is represented not only as the gift of Christ, but a Gift the communication of which was dependent upon His own departure to the Father. Now as Christ was not yet gone, so the Holy Ghost was not yet given. Jesus not yet glorified —the word "glorified" is here used advisedly, to teach the reader not only that the departure of Christ to the Father was indispensable to the giving of the Spirit, but that this illustrious Gift, direct from the hands of the ascended Saviour, was God's intimation to the world that He whom it had cast out, crucified, and slain, was "His Elect, in whom His soul delighted," and that it was through the smiting of that Rock that the waters of the spirit—for which the Church was waiting and with pomp at the feast of Tabernacles proclaiming its expectation—had gushed forth upon a thirsty world. 40-43. Many . . . when they heard this . . . said, O a truth, &c.—The only wonder is they did not all say it. "But their rulers were blinded." Others, This is the Christ—See on ch. 1. 21. Doubtless they were strangers to the profound intent of Christ's teaching, but there was that in it which by its mysterious grandeur and transparent purity and grace, held them spell-bound. No doubt it was of God that they should so feel, that their arm might be paralysed, as Christ's hour was not come;" but even in human teaching there has sometimes been felt such a divine power, that men who came to kill them (e.g. ROWLAND HILL) have confessed to all that they were unmanned, ye also deceived?—In their own servants this seemed intolerable. . . any of the rulers and Pharisees believed?—"Many of them" did, including Nicodemus and Joseph, but not one of these had openly "confessed him" (ch. 12. 42), and this appeal must have struck such of them as heard it to the quick

FURTHER DISCOURSES OF JESUS—ATTEMPT HIM.—12. I am the light of the world—As the references to water (ch. 4. and 7.) and to bread are occasioned by outward occurrences, so this is. In "the Treasury" where it was spoken stood two colossal golden lamp-stands, on each a multitude of lamps, lighted after the sacrifice (probably every evening) during the Tabernacles, diffusing their brilliancy, it is said, all the city. Around these the people danced and rejoiced. Now as amidst the festivities of the Feast of Tabernacles Jesus cried, saying, "If any man come unto me and drink," so now amidst the joyousness of this illumination, He says, "I AM THE LIGHT OF THE WORLD"—plainly not absolute sense. For though He gives his name the same title, they are only "light in the phylacteria, &c.," and though He calls the Baptist "the light" and "the lamp" of his day, yet "he was not that Light, but was sent to witness of that Light: THAT WAS THE TRUE LIGHT coming into the world, lighteth every man," (ch. 1. under this magnificent title Messiah was proclaimed, Isaiah, 42. 6; Malachi, 4. 2, &c. he that comes—as one does a light going before him, and realities did the pillar of bright cloud in the desert—shall have the light of life—the light, the new world, a newly awakened spiritual and so forth. 13-19. bearest record of thyself; thy record is—How does He meet this specious cavil? disputing the wholesome human maxim that 'no man can be praised,' but by affirming that He was sent to the rule, or rather, that it had no application. 'Ye not only formal and warped judgments of Me, but are bending them into effect; I, though I form and judgment of you, am not here to carry this notion—that is reserved to a future day; yet sent I now pronounce and the witness I now not mine only, as ye suppose, but His also me. (See on ch. 5. 31, 32.) And these are the essences to any fact which your law requires,' words spake he in the treasury—a division, so the fore-court of the temple, part of the court women (Josephus' Antiquities, xix. 6. 2, &c.), they confirm the genuineness of v. 2-11, as the man the woman was brought, no man laid hands &c.—See on ch. 7. 30. In the dialogue that he conflict waxed sharper on both sides, till its climax, they take up stones to stone him. He said Jesus again unto them, I go my way, on ch. 7. 34. then said the Jews, Will he be seeing something more in his words than before? 25.) but their question more malignant still. Ye are from beneath...I from above—himself, not as in ch. 3. 31, simply with earth-servers of God, but with men sprung from things an opposite element from His, which it is impossible that He and they should have sent fellowship, or dwell eternally together. I could, and at the fitting time, will say and judge many things of you, (referring perhaps to the work of the Spirit, which is for judgment as well as salvation, ch. 16. 8.) but what I do say is just the message my Father hath given me to deliver.' 28-30. When ye have lifted up the Son of Man—The plainest intimation He had yet given in public of the manner and the authors of His death, ye shall know that I am he, &c.—i.e., find out, or have sufficient evidence, how true was all He said, though they would be far from owning it. The Father hath not left me alone; for I do always those things that please him, &c.—q.d., To you, who gnash upon me with your teeth, and frown down all open appearance for me, I seem to stand uncountenanced and alone; but I have a sympathy and support transcending all human applause; I came hither to do my Father's will, and in the doing of it have not ceased to please Him: therefore is He ever by Me with His approving smile, His cheering words, His supporting arm.' As he spake these words, many believed on him—Instead of wondering at this, the wonder would be if words of such unearthly, surpassing grandeur could be uttered without captivating some that heard them. And just as "all that sat in the council" to try Stephen "saw his face"—though expecting nothing but death—"as it had been the face of an angel" (Acts, 6. 15.) so may we suppose that, full of the sweet supporting sense of His Father's presence, amidst the rage and scorn of the rulers, a divine benignity beamed from His countenance, irradiated the words that fell from Him, and won over the candid "many" of His audience. 31-33. Then said Jesus to those who believed, If ye continue in my word, then are ye my disciples indeed, &c.—The impression produced by the words of our Lord may have become visible by some decisive movement, and here He takes advantage of it to press on them "continuance" in the faith, since then only were they "his real disciples," (cf. ch. 15. 3-8.) and then should they experimentally "know the truth," and "by the truth be made spiritually free." They answered him, We be Abraham's seed, and were never in bondage to any man, &c.—Who said this? Not surely the very class just spoken of as won over by His divine words, and exhorted to continue in them. Most interpreters seem to think so; but it is hard to ascribe such a petulant speech to newly-gained disciples, even in the lowest sense, much less persons so gained as they were. It came, probably, from persons mixed up with them in the same part of the crowd, but of a very different spirit. The pride of the Jewish nation, even now after centuries of humiliation, is the most striking feature of their character. 'Talk of freedom to us! Pray when or to whom were we ever in bondage!' This bluster sounds almost ludicrous from such a nation. Had they forgotten their long and bitter bondage in Egypt their dreary captivity in Babylon! their present bondage to the Roman yoke, and their restless eagerness to throw it off? But probably they saw that our Lord pointed to something else—freedom, perhaps, from the leaders of sects or parties—and were not willing to allow their subjection even to these. Our Lord, therefore, though He knew what slaves they were in this sense, drives the ploughshare somewhat deeper than this, to a bondage they little dream of. 34, 35. Whosoever committeth sin—i.e., liveth in the commission of it. (cf. 1 John, 3. 8; Matthew, 7. 23.) is the servant of sin—i.e., the bond-servant, or slave of it; for the question is not about free-service, but who are in bondage? (cf. 2 Peter, 2. 19; Revelation, 6. 16.) The great truth here expressed was not unknown to heathen moralists; but it was applied only to vice, for they were total strangers to what in revealed religion is called sin. The thought of slaves and freemen in the house suggests to our Lord a wider idea. And the servant abideth not in the house for ever, but the son abideth ever—q.d., 'And if your connexion with the family of God be that of BOND-SERVANTS, ye have no natural tie to the house; your tie is essentially uncertain and precarious. But THE SON'S relationship to the FATHER is a natural and essential one; it is an indefeasible tie; His abode in it is perpetual and of right: That is My relationship, My tie: If, then, ye would have your connection with God's family made real, rightful, permanent, ye must by the Son be manumitted and adopted as sons and daughters of the Lord Almighty. In this sublime statement there is no doubt a subordinate allusion to Genesis, 21. 10, "Cast out this bondwoman and her son, for the son of this bondwoman shall not be heir with my son, with Isaac." (cf. Galatians, 4. 22-30.) 37-41, ye seek to kill me—He had said this to their face before; He now repeats it, and they do not deny it; yet are they held back, as by some marvellous spell—it was the awe which His combined dignity, courage, and benignity struck into them. because my word hath no place in you—When did ever human prophet so speak of his words? They tell us of "the word of the Lord" coming to them. But here is One who holds up "His word" as that which ought to find entrance and abiding room for itself in the souls of all who hear it. my father...your father—See on v. 23. If ye were Abraham's children, ye would do the works of Abraham—He had just said He "knew they were Abraham's children," i.e., according to the flesh; but the children of his faith and holiness they were not, but the reverse. this did not Abraham—In so doing ye act in direct opposition to him. we be not born of fornication...we have one father, God—meaning, as is generally allowed, that they were not an illegitimate race in point of religion, pretending only to be God's people, but were descended from his own chosen

THE OPENING OF THE EYES OF ONE BORN DEAF THAT FOLLOWED ON IT. 1-5. As Jesus was a man which was blind from his birth it begging," v. 8. who did sin, this man or t he was born blind, &c.—not in a former ice, in which, as respects the wicked, the alieve; but, perhaps, expressing loosely here had surely been the cause of this ther this man, &c.—q.d., "The cause was self nor his parents, but, in order to ion of "the works of God," in his cure," works of him that sent me, &c.—a most terment from the mouth of Christ; inti- at He had a precise work to do upon ry particular of it arranged and laid out s all He did upon earth was just "the —particularly "going about doing good," insively by miracles; (3) that each work e time and place in His programme of to speak; hence, (4) that as His period definite termination, so by letting any one

The neighbours therefore . . . said, Is not this he that sat and begged—Here are a number of details to identify the newly seeing with the long-known blind-beggar, they brought to the Pharisees—sitting probably in council, and chiefly of that sect, (ch. 7. 47. 48.) 16, 17, this man is not of God, &c.—See on ch. 5. 9, 16. Others said, &c.—as Nicodemus, and Joseph. the blind man said, He is a prophet—rightly viewing the miracle as but a "sign" of his prophetic commission. 18-23, the Jews did not believe he had been born blind... till they called the parents of him that had received his sight.—Folled by the testimony of the young man himself, they hope to throw doubt on the fact by close-questioning his parents, who, perceiving the snare laid for them, ingeniously escape it by testifying simply to the identity of their son, and his birth-blindness, leaving it to himself, as a competent witness, to speak to the cure. They prevaricated, however, in saying they "knew not who had opened his eyes," for "they feared the Jews," who had come to an understanding, (probably after what is recorded, ch. 7. 50, &c., but by this time pretty well known,) that whoever owned him as the Christ should be put out of the synagogue—i.e., not simply excluded, but communicated. 24-34. Give God the praise, we know that this man is a sinner—not wishing him to own, even to the praise of God, that a miracle had been wrought upon him, but to show more regard to the honour of God than ascribe any such act to one who was a sinner. He answered and said, Whether a sinner or no, &c.—Not that the man meant to insinuate any doubt in his own mind on the point of his being "a sinner," but as his opinion on such a point would be of no consequence to others, he would speak only to what he knew as fact in his own case. then said they again, What did he to thee, &c.—hoping by repeated questions to ensnare him, but the youth is more than a match for them. I have told you already... will ye also be his disciples?—In a vein of keen irony he treats their questions as those of anxious enquirers, almost ready for discipleship! Stung by this, they retort upon him as the disciple, (and here they plainly were not wrong); for themselves, they fell back upon Moses; about him there could be no doubt; but who knew about this upstart? The man answered, Here- in is a marvellous thing, that ye know not from whence he is, and yet he hath opened mine eyes, &c.—He had no

to his being "born in sins" seems a tacit admission of his being blind from birth—the very thing they had been so unwilling to own. But rage and enmity to truth are seldom consistent in their outbreaks. The friends of this excommunicated youth, crowding around him with their sympathy, would probably express surprise that one who could work such a cure should be unable to protect his patient from the persecution it had raised against him, or should possess the power without using it. Nor would it be wonderful if such thoughts should arise in the youth's own mind. But if they did, it is certain, from what follows, that they made no lodgment there, conscious as he was that "whereas he was blind, now he saw," and satisfied that if his Benefactor "were not of God he could do nothing." (v. 33.) There was a word for him too, which, if whispered in his ear from the oracles of God, would seem expressly designed to describe his case, and prepare him for the coming interview with his gracious Friend. "Hear the word of the Lord ye that tremble at His word. Your brethren that hated you, that cast you out for my name sake, said, Let the Lord be glorified; BUT HE SHALL APPEAR TO YOUR JOY, and they shall be ashamed." (Isaiah, 62. 5.) But how was He engaged to whom such noble testimony had been given, and for whom such persecution had been borne? Uttering, perhaps, in secret, "with strong crying and tears," the words of the prophetic psalm, "Let not them that wait on thee, O Lord God of hosts, be ashamed for my sake; let none that seek thee be confounded for my sake, O God of Israel; because for thy sake I have borne reproach . . . and the reproaches of them that reproached thee are fallen upon me," (Psalm 69. 6, 7, 9.) 35-38. Jesus heard—s. c. by intelligence brought Him, that they had cast out

In this reception, however, an assimilation soul to the sublime Object of its knowledge takes place; and thus an activity, though me, is unfolded, which shows itself in obedient commands." [OLSHAUSEN.] From this knowledge Jesus rises to another and loftier of knowledge. 15-18. As my Father knoweth know I the Father.—What claim to absolute the Father could exceed this? (See on 1, 27.) and I lay down my life for the sheep—this, immediately following the lofty preceding clause! 'Tis the riches and of "the Word made flesh"—one glorious thing at once up to the Throne and down dust of death, "that we might live through and interpretation of the words, "for the he to go far to establish the special relation focus death of Christ to the Church. other s, not of this fold; them also I must bring— the perishing Gentiles, already His "sheep" of His heart and the purpose of His grace them" in due time, they shall hear my voice at the language of mere foresight that they re, but the expression of a purpose to draw me off an inward and efficacious call, I infallibly issue in their spontaneous access, and there shall be one fold—rather "one be word for 'fold,' as in the foregoing verses, ferent). Therefore doth my Father love me, r down my life, &c.—As the highest act of the o the Father was the laying down of His life at His "commandment," so the Father's n as His incarnate Son reached its consummation finds its highest justification, in that sub-most affecting of all acts, that I might —His resurrection-life being indispensable mpishment of the fruit of His death. No my life from me, but I lay it down myself: I to lay it down, and I have power to take it impossible for language more plainly and ly to express the absolute voluntariness of ath, such a voluntariness as it would be umption in any mere creature to affirm leath. It is beyond all doubt the language e was conscious that His life was His own resture's is), and, therefore, His to surren- n at will. Here lay the glory of His sacrifice, purely voluntarily. The claim of "power to e" is no less important, as showing that His a, though ascribed to the Father, in the all presently see, was nevertheless His own t His own right to life as soon as the pur- voluntary death were accomplished. This ut—to "lay down His life, that He might n." have I received of my Father—So that at once by "command" of His Father, and voluntary obedience to that command as Him (so to speak) infinitely dear to the e necessity of Christ's death, in the light of und sayings, must be manifest to all but dial student. 19-21. There was a division ; the Jews for these sayings—the light and the darkness revealing themselves with increasing clearness in the separation of the teachable from the obstinately prejudiced. The one saw in Him only "a devil and a madman," the other revolted at the thought that such words could come from one possessed, and sight be given to the blind by a demoniac; showing clearly that a deeper impression had been made upon them than their words expressed.

22-42. DISCOURSE AT THE FEAST OF DEDICATION—FROM THE FURY OF HIS ENEMIES JESUS ESCAPES BEYOND JORDAN, WHERE MANY BELIEVE ON HIM. 22, 23. It was . . . the Feast of Dedication—Celebrated rather more than two months, after the feast of tabernacles, during which intermediate period our Lord seems to have remained in the neighbourhood of Jerusalem. It was instituted by Judas Maccabeus, to commemorate the purification of the temple from the profanations to which it had been subjected by Antiochus Epiphanes (B.C. 165), and kept for eight days, from the 25th Chisleu (December), the day on which Judas began the first joyous celebration of it. (1 Maccabees, 4, 52, 56, 59; and JOSEPHUS Antiquities, xii, 7, 7.) It was winter—implying some inclemency. Therefore, Jesus walked in Solomon's porch—for shelter. This portico was on the east side of the temple, and Josephus says it was part of the original structure of Solomon. (Antiquities, xx, 9, 7.) 24. Then came the Jews—the rulers, (See on ch. 1, 19.) how long dost thou make us to doubt—"hold us in suspense," (margin.) If thou be the Christ, tell us plainly.—But when the plainest evidence of it was resisted, what weight could a mere assertion of it have? 25, 26. Jesus answered them, I told you—i.e., in substance, what I am, (e.g. ch. 7, 37, 38; 8, 12, 35, 36, 58.) ye believe not, because ye are not of my sheep, as I said—referring to the whole strain of the parable of the sheep, v. 1, &c. 27-30. My sheep hear my voice, &c.—(See on v. 8.) I give unto them eternal life—not "will give them;" for it is a present gift. (See on ch. 3, 20; 5, 24.) It is a very grand utterance, couched in the language of majestic authority. My Father, which gave them me—(See on ch. 6, 37-39.) is greater than all—with whom no adverse power can contend. It is a general expression of an admitted truth, and what follows shows for what purpose it was uttered, "and none is able to pluck them out of my Father's hand." "The impossibility of true believers being lost, in the midst of all the temptations which they may encounter, does not consist in their fidelity and decision, but is founded upon the power of God. Here the doctrine of predestination is presented in its sublime and sacred aspect; there is a predestination of the holy, which is taught from one end of the Scriptures to the other; not, indeed, of such a nature that an "irresistible grace" compels the opposing will of man (of course not), but so that that will of man which receives and loves the commands of God is produced only by God's grace." [OLSHAUSEN—a testimony all the more valuable, being given in spite of Lutheran prejudice.] I and my Father are one—Our language admits not of the precision of the original in this great saying. "Are" is in the masculine gender—"we two persons are;" while "one" is neuter—"one thing." Perhaps "one interest" expresses, as nearly as may be, the purport of the saying. There seemed to be some contradiction between His saying they had been given by His Father into His own hands, out of which they could not be plucked, and then saying that none could pluck them out of His Father's hands, as if they had not been given out of them. Neither they have," says He; "Though He has given them to me, they are as much in His own almighty hands as ever—they cannot be, and when given to me they are not, given away from Himself; for HE AND I HAVE ALL IN COMMON." Thus it will be seen, that, though oneness of essence is not the precise thing here affirmed, that truth is the basis of what is affirmed, without which it would not be true. And Augustin was right in saying the "Ye are" condemns the Sabelians (who denied the distinction of Persons in the Godhead), while the "one" (as explained) condemns the Arians (who denied the unity of their essence). 31-33, then the Jews took up stones again to stone Him—and for precisely the same thing as before, (ch. 8, 58, 59.) Many good works have I showed you—i.e., works of pure benevolence (as Acts, 10, 38, "Who went about doing good," &c.; see Mark, 7, 37.) from my Father—not so much by His power, but as directly commissioned by Him to do them. This He says to meet the imputation of unwarrantable assumption of the divine prerogatives. [LUTHARDT.] for which of these works do ye stone me?—"are ye stoning (i.e., going to stone) me?" for blasphemy—whose legal punishment was stoning (Leviticus, 24, 11-16.) then, being a man—i.e., a man only, maketh thyself God—Twice before they understood Him to advance the same claim, and both times they prepared themselves to avenge what they took to be the insulted honour of God, as here, in the way directed by their law, (ch. 5, 18; 8, 58.) 34-36. It is written in your law—in Psalm 82, 6, respecting Judges or magistrates, ye are gods—being the official representatives and commissioned agents of God. If he called them gods to whom the word of God came, say ye of Him whom the Father hath sanctified and sent into the world, Thou blasphemest—The whole force of this reasoning, which has been but in part seized by the commentators, lies in what is said of the two parties compared. The comparison of Himself with mere men, divinely commissioned, is intended to show, (as NEANDER well expresses it,) that the idea of a communication of the Divine Majesty to human nature was by no means foreign to the revelations of the Old Testament; but there is also a contrast between Himself and all merely human representatives of God—the one "sanctified by the Father and sent into the world;" the other, "to whom the word of God merely came," which is expressly designed to prevent His being massed up with them as only one of many human officials of God. It is never said of Christ that "the word of the Lord came to Him;" whereas this is the well-known formula by which the divine commission even to the highest of mere men, is expressed, as John the Baptist, (Luke, 3, 2.) The reason is that given by the Baptist himself, (See on ch. 3, 31.) The contrast is between those "to whom the word of God came"—men of the earth, earthy, who were merely privileged to get a divine message to utter (if prophets, or a divine office to discharge if judges)—and "Him whom (not being of the earth at all, the Father sanctified (or set apart), and sent into the world," an expression never used of any merely human messenger of God, and used only of Himself, because I said, I am the Son of God—it is worthy of special notice that our Lord had not said, in so many words that He was the Son of God, on this occasion. But He had said what beyond doubt amounted to it—namely, that He gave His sheep eternal life, and none could pluck them out of His hand; that He had got them from His Father, in whose hands, though given to Him, they still remained, and out of those hand none could pluck them; and that they were the indefeasible property of both, inasmuch as "He and His Father were one." Our Lord considers all this as just saying of Himself, "I am the Son of God"—One nature with Him, yet mysteriously of Him. The parenthetical (v. 35), "and the Scripture cannot be broken," referring to the terms used of magistrates in the 82nd Psalm, has an important bearing on the authority of the living oracles. "The Scripture, as the expressed will of the unchangeable God, is itself unchangeable and indissoluble." [OLSHAUSEN.] (cf. Matthew, 5, 17.) 37-39. Though ye believe not me, believe the works—There was in Christ's words, independently of any miracles, a self-evidencing truth, majesty, and grace, which those who had any spiritual susceptibility were unable to resist. (ch. 7, 46; 8, 30. But, for those who wanted this, "the works" were a mighty help. When those failed, the case was desperate indeed, that ye may know and believe that the Father is in me, and I in Him—thus reiterating His claim to essential oneness with the Father, which He had only seemed to soften down, that He might calm their rage and get their ear again for a moment, therefore they sought again to take Him—true to their original understanding of His words, for they saw perfectly well that He meant to "make Himself God" throughout all this dialogue. He escaped out of their hand—See on Luke, 4, 30; ch. 8, 59.) 40-42, went away again beyond Jordan . . . the place where John at first baptised—See on ch. 1, 28. Many resorted to him—on whom the ministry of the Baptist had left permanent impressions. John did no miracle, but all things John spake of this man were true—what they now heard and saw in Jesus only confirming in their minds the divinity of His forerunner's mission, though unaccompanied by any of His Master's miracles. And thus, "many believed on him there."

CHAPTER XI.

Ver. 1-46. LAZARUS RAISED FROM THE DEAD—THE CONSEQUENCES OF THIS, 1, 2, OF Bethany—at the east side of mount Olivet, the town of Mary and her sister Martha—thus distinguishing it from the other Bethany "beyond Jordan." (See on ch. 1, 28; 10, 40.) It was that Mary who anointed the Lord with ointment, &c.—This, though not recorded by our evangelist till ch. 12, 3, &c., was so well known in the teaching of all the churches, according to our Lord's prediction (Matthew, 26, 13.), that it is here alluded to by anticipation, as the most natural way of identifying her; and she is first named, though the younger, as the more distinguished of the two. She "anointed the Lord," says the evangelist—let doubtless to the use of this term here, as he was about to exhibit Him illustriously as the Lord of Life, 3-6. His sister sent unto him, saying, Lord, he whom thou lovest is sick—a most womanly appeal, yet how reverential, to the known affection of her Lord for the patient. (See v. 6, 11.) "Those whom Christ loves are no more exempt than others from their share of earthly trouble and anguish; rather are they bound over to it more surely." [TRENCH.] When Jesus heard that, he said, This sickness is not unto death—to result in death, but for the glory of God, that the Son of God may be glorified thereby—i.e., by this glory of God. (See Gr.) Remarkable language this, which from creature lips would have been intolerable. It means that the glory of God manifested in the resurrection of dead Lazarus would be shown to be the glory, personally and immediately, of THE SON. Jesus loved Martha and her sister and Lazarus—What a picture! one that in every age has attracted the admiration of the whole Christian Church. No wonder that those miserable sceptics who have carped at the ethical system of the Gospel, as not embracing private friendships in the list of its virtues, have been referred to the Saviour's peculiar regard for this family as a triumphant refutation, if such were needed, when he heard he was sick, he abode two days still where he was—at least twenty-five miles off. Beyond all doubt this was just to let things come to their worst, in order to the display of His glory. But how trying, meantime, to the faith of his friends, and how unlike the way in which love to a dying friend usually shows itself, on which it is plain that Mary reckoned. But the way of divine are not as the ways of human love. Often they are the reverse. When His people are sick, in body or spirit; when their case is waxing more and more desperate every day; when all hope of recovery is about to expire—just then and therefore it is that "He abides two days still in the same place where He is." Can they still hope against hope? Often they do not; but "this is their infirmity." For it is His chosen style of acting. We have been well taught it, and should not now have the lesson to learn. From the days of Moses most natural way, so many witnesses of the glorious miracle that was to follow, as to put the fact beyond possible question. 20-22. Martha, as soon as she heard that Jesus was coming, went and met him—true to the energy and activity of her character, as seen in Luke, 10, 38-42. See notes there; but Mary sat in the house—equally true to her placid character. These undesigned touches not only charmingly illustrate the minute historic fidelity of both narratives, but their inner harmony. then said Martha, Lord, if thou hadst been here, my brother had not died—As Mary afterwards said the same thing (v. 32), it is plain they had made this very natural remark to each other, perhaps many times during these four sad days, and not without having their confidence in His love at times overclouded.

Such trials of faith, however, are not peculiar to them, but I know that even now, &c.—Energetic characters are usually sanguine, the rainbow of hope peering through the drenching cloud. whatever thou wilt ask of God, God will give it thee—i.e., 'even to the restoration of my dead brother to life,' for that plainly is her meaning, as the sequel shows. 23-27. Jesus saith unto her, Thy brother shall rise again—purposely expressing Himself in general terms, to draw her out. Martha saith, I know that he shall rise again at the last day—q. d., 'But are we never to see him in life till then?' Jesus said, I am the Resurrection and the Life—q.d., 'The whole power to restore, impart, and maintain life, resides in Me.' (See on ch.
1, 4; 5, 21.) What higher claim to supreme divinity than this grand saying can be conceived? he that believeth in me though dead . . . shall live—q.d., 'The believer's death shall be swallowed up in life, and his life shall never sink into death.' As death comes by sin, it is His to dissolve it; and as life flows through His righteousness, it is His to communicate and eternally maintain it. Revelation, 5, 21.; The temporary separation of soul and body is here regarded as not even interrupting, much less impairing, the new and everlasting life imparted by Jesus to His believing people. Believest thou this?—(Canst thou take this in? Yes, I believe that thou art the Christ, the Son of God, &c.—q. d., And having such faith in Thee, I can believe all which that comprehends. While she had a dimming perception to the Messianic office and Sonship of Jesus, she sister, though her words were fewer. (See on v. 31.) 32-38. When Jesus saw her weeping, and the Jews weeping, he grieved in spirit—the tears of Mary and her friends acting sympathetically upon Jesus, and drawing forth His emotions. What a vivid and beautiful outcoming of His real humanity! The word here rendered “grieved” does not mean “sighed” or “grieved,” but rather “powerfully checked his emotion”—made a visible effort to restrain those tears which were ready to gush from His eyes, and was troubled—rather, “troubled himself” (margin); referring probably to this visible difficulty of repressing His emotions. Where have ye laid him? Lord, come and see—Perhaps it was to retain composure enough to ask this question, and on receiving the answer to proceed with them to the spot, that He checked Himself. Jesus wept—This beautifully conveys the sublime brevity of the two original words; else “shed tears” might have better conveyed the difference between the word here used and that twice employed in v. 32, and there properly rendered “weeping,” denoting the loud wail for the dead, while that of Jesus consisted of silent tears. Is it for nothing that the evangelist, some sixty years after it occurred, holds up to all ages with such touching brevity the sublime spectacle of the Son of God in tears? What a seal of His perfect oneness with us in the most redeeming feature of our stricken humanity! But was there nothing in those tears beyond sorrow for human suffering and death? Could these effects move Him without suggesting the cause? Who can doubt that in His ear every feature of the scene proclaimed that stern law of the Kingdom, “The wages of sin is death,” and that this element in His visible emotion underlay all the rest? then said the Jews, Behold here he loved him!—We thank you, O ye visitors from Jerusalem, for this spontaneous testimony to the human softness of the Son of God. And—rather ‘But,’ some said, Could not this man, which opened the eyes of the blind, have caused that this man should not have died?—The former exclamation came from the better-feeling portion of the spectators; this betokens a measure of suspicion. It hardly goes the length of atesting the miracle on the blind man; but ‘if (as everybody says) He did that, why could He not also have kept Lazarus alive? As to the restoration of the dead man to life, they never so much as thought of it. But this disposition to dictate to Divine power, and almost to peril our confidence in it upon its doing our bidding, is not confined to men of no faith. Jesus again groaning in himself—i.e., as at v. 33, checked or repressed His rising feelings, in the former instance, of sorrow, here of righteous indignation at their unreasonable unbelief. (cf. Mark, 3. 6.) [WIKSTEDT & WILKINSON.] But here, too, struggling emotion was deeper, now that His eye was about to rest on the spot where lay, in the still horrors of death, His Friend, a cave—the cavity, natural or artificial, of a rock. This, with the number of condoling visitors from Jerusalem, and the costly ointment with which Mary afterwards anointed Jesus at Bethany, all go to show that the family were in good circumstances. 39-44. Jesus said, Take ye away the stone—spoken to the attendants of Martha and Mary; for it was a work of no little labour.

 [GROTIUS.] According to the Talmudists, it was forbidden to open a grave after the stone was placed upon it.
 Besides other dangers, they were apprehensive of legal impurity by contact with the dead. Hence they avoided coming nearer a grave than four cubits. [MAIMONIDES in LAMPA.] But He who touched the leper, and the bier of the widow of Nain’s son, rises here also above these Judaic memorials of evils, every one of which He had come to roll away. Observe here what our Lord did Himself, and what He made others do. As Elijah himself repaired the altar on Carmel, arranged the wood, cut the victim, and placed the pieces on the fuel, but made the bystanders fill the surrounding trench with water, that no suspicion might arise of fire having been secretly applied to the pile (1 Kings, 18.

 30-36); so our Lord would let the most sceptical see that, without laying a hand on the stone that covered His friend, He could recal him to life. But what could be done by human hand He orders to be done, reserving only to Himself what transcended the ability of all creatures. Martha, sister of the dead—and as such the proper guardian of the precious remains; the relationship being here mentioned to account for her venturing gently to remonstrate against their exposure, in a state of decomposition, to eyes that had loved him so tenderly in life. Lord, by this time he stinketh, for he hath been dead four days—(See on v. 17.) It is wrong to suppose from this (as LAMPS and others do) that, like the bystanders, she had not thought of His restoration to life. But the glimmerings of hope which she cherished from the first (v. 22), and which had been brightened by what Jesus said to her (v. 28-27), had suffered a momentary eclipse on the proposal to expose the now sightless corpse. To such fluctuations all real faith is subject in dark hours. (See, for example, the case of Job.) Jesus saith unto her, Said I not unto thee, that if thou wouldest believe, thou shouldst see the glory of God?
 —He had not said those very words, but this was the scope of all that He had uttered to her about His life-giving power (v. 23, 25, 26); a gentle yet emphatic and most instructive rebuke: “Why doth the restoration of life, even to a decomposing corpse, seem hopeless in presence of the Resurrection and the Life? Hast thou yet to learn that “if thou canst believe, all things are possible to him that believeth?” (Mark, 9. 23.) Jesus lifted up his eyes—an expression marking His calm solemnity. (cf. ch. 17. 1.) Father, I thank thee that thou hast heard me—rather, ‘hardest me,’ referring to a specific prayer offered by Him, probably on intelligence of the case reaching Him (v. 3, 4.); for His living and loving oneness with the Father was maintained and manifested in the flesh, not merely by the spontaneous and uninterrupted outpouring of Each to Each in spirit, but by specific actings of faith and exercises of prayer about each successive case as it emerged. He prayed [says LUTHER, well] not for what He wanted, but for the manifestation of what He had; and having the bright consciousness of the answer in the felt liberty to ask it, and the assurance that it was at hand, He gives thanks for this with a grand simplicity before performing the act. And—rather ‘Yet,’ I knew that thou heardest me always, but because of the people that stand by I said it, that they might believe that thou hast sent me—instead of praying now, He simply gives thanks for answer to prayer offered ere He left Perez, and adds that His doing even this, in the audience of the people, was not from any doubt of the prevalence of His prayers in any case, but to show the people that He did nothing without His Father, but all by direct communication with Him. 43, 44, and when he had thus spoken, he cried with a loud voice —On one other occasion only did He this—on the cross.
 His last utterance was a “loud cry” (Matthew, 27. 50.) “He shall not cry,” said the prophet, nor, in His ministry, did He. What a sublime contrast is this “loud cry” to the magical “whisperings” and “mutterings” of which we read in Isaiah, 8. 19; 29. 4, [as GROTIUS remarks.] It is second only to the grandeur of that voice which shall raise all the dead, ch. 6. 28, 29; 1 Thessalonians, 4. 16. Jesus saith unto them, Loose him and let him go—Jesus will no more do this Himself than roll away the stone. The one was the necessary preparation for resurrection, the other the necessary sequel to it. THE LIFE-GIVING ACT ALONE HE RESERVES TO HIMSELF.
 So in the quickening of the dead to spiritual life, human instrumentality is employed first to prepare the way, and then to turn it to account. 45, 46. Many . . . which had

CHAPTER XII.

THE ANOINTING AT BETHANY.—See on l. 6-13. 1-8. Six days before the passover— th day before it; probably after sunset on ing, or the commencement of the Jewish eding the Passover. Martha served—This, afterwards said of Mary's way of honour- l, is so true to the character in which those appear in Luke, 10. 38-42, as to constitute rougest and most delightful confirmations of both narratives. See also on ch. 11. 20, at the table—'Between the raised Lazarus d Leper (Simon, Mark, 14. 3.) the Lord pro- banded two trophies of His glory.' [STIER.] r pure, ward, a celebrated aromatic. (Cant.

l. 12.) anointed the feet of Jesus—and "poured it on his head," Matthew, 26. 7; Mark, 14. 5. The only use of this was to refresh and exhilarate—a grateful compliment in the East, amidst the closeness of a heated atmosphere, with many guests at a feast. Such was the form in which Mary's love to Christ, at so much cost to herself, poured itself out. Judas . . . who should be- tray him—For the reason why this is here mentioned, see on Matthew, 26. 8. three hundred pence—between nine and ten pounds sterling. had the bag—the purse or treasure-chest, bare what was put there—not, bare it off by theft, though that he did; but simply, had charge of its contents, was treasurer to Jesus and the twelve. How worthy of notice is this arrangement, by which an avaricious and dishonest person was not only taken into the number of the twelve, but entrusted with the custody of their little property. The purposes which this served are obvious enough; but it is farther notice- able, that the remotest hint was never given to the eleven of his true character, nor did the disciples most favoured with the intimacy of Jesus ever suspect him, till a few minutes before he voluntarily separated him- self from their company—for ever! Jesus said, Let her alone, against the day of my burying hath she done this—not that she thought of His burial, much less reserved any of her hard to anoint her dead Lord. But as the time was so near at hand when that office would have to be performed, and she was not to have that privilege even after the spices were brought for the purpose (Mark, 16. 1.). He lovingly regards it as done now, the poor always with you—referring to Deuteronomy, 15. 11. but me not always—a gentle hint of His approaching departure. He adds, Mark, 14. 5—"She hath done what she could," a noble testimony, embodying a principle of immense importance. "Verily I say unto you, Where- soever this Gospel shall be preached in the whole world, there shall also this, that this woman hath done, be told for a memorial of her." Matthew, 23. 13; Mark, 14. 9.) "In the act of love done to Him she had erected to herself an eternal monument, as lasting as the Gospel, the eternal word of God. From generation to generation this remarkable prophecy of the Lord has been fulfilled; and even we, in explaining this saying of the Redeemer, of necessity contribute to its accomplish- ment.' [OLSHAUSEN.] 'Who but Himself had the power to ensure to any work of man, even if resound- ing in his own time through the whole earth, an imper- ishable remembrance in the stream of history? Behold once more here, the majesty of His royal judicial supremacy in the government of the world, in this "Verily I say unto you." [STIER.] Beautiful are the lessons here. (1.) Love to Christ transfigures the humblest services. All, indeed, who have themselves a heart value its least outgoings beyond the most costly mechanical perfor- mances; but how does it endear the Saviour to us to find Him endorsing the principle as His own standard in judging of character and deeds!

"What though in poor and humble guise Thou here didst sojourn cottage-born?
Yet from thy glory in the skies Our earthly gold thou didst not scorn, For Love delights to bring her best,
And where Love is, that offering evermore is best.

Love on the Saviour's dying head Her spikenard drops unblam'd may pour, May mount his cross, and wrap him dead In spices from the golden shore," etc.—[Keble.]

(2.) Works of utility should never be set in opposition to the promptings of self-sacrificing love, and the sincerity of those who do so is to be suspected. Under the mask of concern for the poor at home, how many excuse themselves from all care of the perishing heathen abroad. (3.) Amidst conflicting duties, that which our "hand presently findeth to do" is to be preferred, and even a less duty only to be done now to a greater that can be done at any time. (4.) "If there be first a willing mind, it is accepted according to that a man hath, and not according to that he hath not" (2 Corinthians, 8, 12).—"She hath done what she could." (5.) As Jesus beheld in spirit the universal diffusion of His Gospel, while His lowest depth of humiliation was only approaching, so He regards the facts of His earthly History as constituting the substance of His Gospel, and the relation of them as just the "preaching of this Gospel." Not that preachers are to confine themselves to a bare narration of these facts, but that they are to make their whole preaching turn upon them as its grand centre, and derive from them its proper vitality; all that goes before this in the Bible being but the preparation for them, and all that follows but the sequel. 9-11. Crowds of the Jerusalem Jews hastened to Bethany, not so much to see Jesus, whom they knew to be there, as to see dead Lazarus alive; and this, issuing in their accession to Christ, led to a plot against the life of Lazarus also, as the only means of arresting the triumph of Jesus (see 8, 19).—to such a pitch had these chief priests come of diabolical determination to shut out the light from themselves, and quench it from the earth!

19-19. CHRIST'S TRIUMPHAL ENTRY INTO JERUSALEM.—See on Matthew, 21, 1, &c.; and Luke, 19, 29, &c. 12. On the next day—the Lord's day, or Sunday (see on 9, 1.); the tenth day of the Jewish month Nisan, on which the Paschal Lamb was set apart, to be "kept up until the 14th day of the same month, when the whole assembly of the congregation of Israel were to kill it in the evening." (Exodus, 12, 3, 6.) Even so, from the day of this solemn entry into Jerusalem, "Christ our Passover" was virtually set apart to be "sacrificed for us." (1 Corinthians, 5, 7.) 16. When Jesus was glorified, then remembered they that these things were written of him, &c.—The Spirit, descending on them from the glorified Saviour at Pentecost, opened their eyes suddenly to the true sense of the Old Testament, brought vividly to their recollection this and other Messianic predictions, and to their unspeakable astonishment showed them that they, and all the actors in these scenes, had been unconsciously fulfilling those predictions.

20-36. SOME GREEKS DESIRE TO SEE JESUS—THE DISCOURSE AND SCENE THEREUPON. 20-22. Greeks—Not Grecian Jews, but Greek proselytes to the Jewish faith, who were wont to attend the annual festivals, particularly this primary one, the passover. The same came therefore to Philip of Bethsaida—possibly as being from the same quarter, saying, We would see Jesus—certainly in a far better sense than Zaccheus, (Luke, 19, 3.) Perhaps He was then in that part of the temple court to which Gentile proselytes had no access. "These men from the west represent, at the end of Christ's life, what the wise men from the east represented at its beginning; but those come to the cross of the King, even as these to His Manger." [STRIB.] Philip telleth Andrew—As fellow-townsmen of Bethsaida, (ch. 1, 44.) these two seem to have drawn to each other. Andrew and Philip tell Jesus—The minuteness of these details, while they add to the graphic force of the narrative, serve to prepare us for something important to come out of this introduction. 23-26. Jesus answered them, The hour is come that the Son of Man should be glorified—i. e., "They would see Jesus, would they? Yet a little moment, and they shall see Him so as now they dream not of. The middle wall of partition that keeps them out from the commonwealth of Israel is on the eve of breaking down, "and I, if I be lifted up from the earth, shall draw all men unto Me." I see them "flying as a cloud, and as doves to their cots"—a glorious event that will be for the Son of Man, by which this is to be brought about." It is His death He thus sublimely and delicately alludes to. Lost in the scenes of triumph which this desire of the Greeks to see Him called up before His view, He gives no direct answer to their petition for an interview, but sees the cross which was to bring them gilded with glory. Except a corn of wheat fall into the ground and die, it abideth alone; but if it die, it bringeth forth much fruit.—The necessity of His death is here brightly expressed, and its proper operation and fruit—Woe springing forth out of death—imagined forth by a beautiful and deeply significant law of the vegetable kingdom. For a double reason, no doubt, this was uttered—to explain what He had said of His death, as the hour of His own glorification, and to sustain His own Spirit under the agitation which was mysteriously coming over it in the view of that death. He that loveth his life shall lose it; and he that hateth his life in this world shall keep it unto life eternal—See on Luke, 9, 24. Did our Lord mean to exclude Himself from the operation of the great principle here expressed—self-renunciation the law of self-preservation; and the converse, self-preservation the law of self-destruction. On the contrary, as He became Man to exemplify this fundamental law of the Kingdom of God in its most sublime form, so the very utterance of it on this occasion served to sustain His own Spirit in the double prospect to which He had just alluded. If any man serve me, let him follow me; and where I am, there shall also my servant be: If any man serve me, him will my Father honour—Jesus here claims the same absolute submission to Himself, as the law of men's evaluation to honour, as He yielded to the Father. 27, 28. Now is my soul troubled—He means at the prospect of His death, just alluded to. Strange view of the Cross this, immediately after representing it as the hour of His glory! (9, 28.) But the two views naturally meet, and blend into one. It was the Greeks, one might say, that troubled Him. "Ah! they shall see Jesus, but to How it shall be a costly sight," and what shall I say!—He is in a strait betwixt two. The death of the Cross was, and could not but be, appalling to His spirit. But to shrink from absolute submission to the Father, was worse still. In asking Himself, "What shall I say?" He seems as if thinking aloud, feeling His way between two dread alternatives, looking both of them sternly in the face, measuring, weighing them, in order that the choice actually made might be seen, and even by Himself the more vividly felt, to be a profound, deliberate, spontaneous election. Father, save me from this hour—To take this as a question, "Shall I say, Father, save me," &c.—as some eminent editors and interpreters do, is unnatural and jejune. It is a real petition, like that in Gethsemane, "Let this cup pass from me;" only whereas there His prefaces the prayer with an "If it be possible," here He follows it up with what is tantamount to that—"Nevertheless for this cause came I unto this hour." The sentiment conveyed, then, by the prayer, in both cases, is twofold: (1.) that only one thing could reconcile Him to the death of the Cross—its being His Father's will He should endure it—and (2.) that in this view of it He yielded Himself freely to it. What He recoils from is not submission to His Father's will; but to show how tremendous a self-sacrifice that obedience involved. He first asks the Father to save Him from it, and then signifies how perfectly He knows that He is there for the very purpose of enduring it. Only by letting these mysterious words speak their full meaning do they become intelligible and consistent. As for those who see no bitter elements in the death of Christ—nothing beyond mere dying—what can they make of such a scene! and when they place it ever against the feelings with which thousands of His adoring followers have welcomed death for His sake, how can they hold Him up to the admiration of men! Father, glorify thy name—by a present testimony. I have both glorified it—referring specially to the voice from heaven at His baptism, and again at His transfiguration, and will glorify it again—i. e., in the yet future scenes of His still deeper necessity; although this promise was a present and subtle which would irradiate the clouded spirit of Man. 29-33, the people therefore that stood thundered; others, an angel spake to him—only a sound, others an articulate, but intelligible voice. Jesus said, This voice came of me, but for your sakes—i.e., probably, to unfavourable impressions which his motion and mysterious prayer for deliverance produced on the bystanders. Now is it of this world—the world that “crucified glory.” (1 Corinthians, 2, 8.), considered as complicated kingdom of Satan, breathing along his work, and involved in his doom, it’s death by its hands irrevocably sealed, a prince of this world be cast out—How different fast-approaching “hour” regarded in the darkness and of light! The hour of relief and Troubler of our peace—how near it is! moment, and the day is ours! So it was and felt in the one region. “Now shall the world be cast out,” is a somewhat different same event. We know who was right, under a veil, He sees the triumphs of the clouded and transporting light. And I, if p from the earth, will draw all men unto me ere is emphatic—I, taking the place of the ved prince. “If lifted up,” means not only have been lifted up, but, through the virtue of g. And truly, the death of the Cross, in all ace, revealed in the light, and borne in upon y the power of the Holy Ghost, possesses an ver the wide world—to civilized and savage, l illiterate, alike—which breaks down all assimilates all to itself, and forms out of terogeneous and discordant materials a surpassing glory, whose uniting principle is ection “to Him that loved them.”—“Will n “UNTO ME,” says He. These things said Esaias, when he saw his glory, and spake of him—a key of immense importance to the opening of Isalah’s vision, (Isaiah, 6.) and all similar Old Testament representations. ‘THE SON is “the King Jehovah” who rules in the Old Testament and appears to the elect, as in the New Testament THE SPIRIT, the invisible Minister of the Son, is the Director of the Church and the Revealer in the sanctuary of the heart.’ [OLSHAUSEN.] 42, 43, among the chief rulers also—rather, “even of the rulers;” such as Nicodemus and Joseph, because of the Pharisees—i. e., the leaders of the sects; for they were of it themselves, put out of the synagogue—See on ch. 9, 22, 34, they loved the praise of men more than the praise of God—“a severe remark, considering that several at least of these persons afterwards boldly confessed Christ. It indicates the displeasure with which God regarded their conduct at this time, and with which He continues to regard similar conduct.” [WEBSTER & WILKINSON.] 44-50. Jesus cried—in a loud tone, and with peculiar solemnity, (cf. ch. 7, 37.) and said, He that believeth, &c.—This seems to be a supplementary record of some weighty proclamations, for which there had been found no natural place before, and introduced here as a sort of summary and winding up of His whole testimony.

CHAPTER XIII.

Ver. 1-20. AT THE LAST SUPPER, JESUS WASHES THE DISCIPLES’ FEET—THE DISCOURSE ARISING THEREUPON.—1. When Jesus knew that his hour was come that he should depart out of this world unto the Father—On these beautiful euphemisms see on Luke, 9, 31, 51, having loved his own which were in the world, he loved them unto the end—The meaning is, that on the very edge of His last sufferings, when it might have been supposed that He would be absorbed in His own awful prospects, He was so far from forgetting “His own,” who were to be left struggling “in the world” after He had “departed out of it to the Father,” (ch. 17, 11.) that in His care for them, He seemed scarce to think of Himself save in connexion with them: “Herein is love,” not only “enduring to the end,” but most affectingly manifested when, judging by a human standard, least to be expected, 2. supper being ended—rather ‘being prepared,’ ‘being served,’ or ‘going on;’ for that it was not “ended” is plain from v. 26, the devil having now—or, ‘already’—put into the heart of Judas to betray him—referring to the agreement he had already made with the contrast between the "show" and the "say," which, by bringing them together the original expresses, for it is not English to say, 'Lord, Thou my feet dost wash!' But every word of this question is emphatic. Thus far, and in the question itself, there was nothing but the most profound and beautiful astonishment at a condescension, to him quite incomprehensible. Accordingly, though there can be no doubt that already Peter's heart rebelled against it as a thing not to be tolerated, Jesus ministers no rebuke as yet, but only bids him wait a little, and he should understand it all. Jesus answered and said, What I do, thou knowest not now—q. d. Such condescension does need explanation; it is fitted to astonish, but thou shalt know hereafter—'afterwards,' meaning presently; though viewed as a general maxim, applicable to all dark sayings in God's word, and dark doings in God's providence, those words are full of consolation. Peter saith unto him, Thou shalt never wash—more emphatically, 'Never shalt thou wash' my feet. q. d. 'That is an incongruity to which I can never submit.' How like the man! If I wash thee not, thou hast no part with me—What Peter could not submit to was, that the Master should serve His servant. But the whole saving work of Christ was one continued series of such services, ending with and consummated by the most self-sacrificing and transcendent of all services: THE SON OF MAN CAME NOT TO BE MINISTERED UNTO, BUT TO MINISTER, AND TO GIVE HIS LIFE A RANSOM FOR MANY." (See on Mark, 10. 45.) If Peter then could not submit to let his Master go down so low as to wash his feet, how should he suffer himself to be served by Him at all! This is couched under the one pregnant word "wash," which though applicable to the lower operation which Peter resisteth, is the familiar scriptural symbol of that higher cleansing, which Peter little thought he was at the same time virtually putting from him. It is not humility to refuse what the Lord deigns to do for us, or to deny what He has done, but it is self-willed presumption—not rare, however, in those inner circles of lofty religious profession and traditional spirituality, which are found wherever Christian truth has enjoyed long and undisturbed possession. The truest humility is to receive reverentially, and thankfully to own, the gifts of grace. Lord, not my feet only, but also my hands and my head—q. d. 'To be severed from Thee, Lord, is death to me: If that be the meaning of my speech, I tread upon it; and if to be washed of Thee have such significance, then not my feet only, but hands, head, and all, be washed! This artless expression of clinging, life-and-death attachment to Jesus, and felt dependence upon Him for his whole spiritual well-being, compared with the similar saying in ch. 8. 68, 69. (on which see notes,) furnishes such evidence of historic verity as no thoroughly honest mind can resist. He that is washed—in this thorough sense, to express which the word is carefully changed to one meaning to wash as in a bath, needeth not—to be so washed any more. save to wash his feet—needeth to do no more than wash his feet, (and here the former word is resumed, meaning to wash the hands or feet.) but is clean every whit—or, 'as a whole.' This sentence is singularly instructive. Of the two cleansings, the one points to that which takes place at the commencement of the Christian life, embracing complete abatement from sin as a guilty state, and entire deliverance from it as a polluted life, (Revelation, 1. 5; 1 Corinthians, 6. 11.)—or, in the language of theology, Justification and Regeneration. This cleansing is effected once for all, and is never repeated. The other cleansing, described as that of "the feet," is such as one walking from a bath quite cleansed still needs, in consequence of his contact with the earth. (cf. Exodus, 30. 18, 19.) It is the daily cleansing which we are taught to seek, when in the spirit of adoption we say, "Our Father which art in heaven—forgive us our debts;" and, when burdened with the sense of manifold short-comings, as what tender spirit of a Christian is not it is not a relief to be permitted thus to wash our feet after a day's contact with the earth! This is not to call in question the completeness of our past justification. Our Lord, while graciously insisting on washing Peter's feet, refuses to extend the cleansing farther, that the symbolical instruction intended to be conveyed might not be marred, and ye are clean—in the first and whole sense, but not all—important, as showing that Judas, instead of being as true-hearted a disciple as the rest at first, and merely falling away afterwards—as many represent it—never experienced that cleansing of all which made the others what they were. 13-15. Know ye what I have done?—i. e., his intent. The question, however, was put merely to summon their attention to His own answer. Ye call me Master, (Teacher)—and Lord—learning of Him in the one capacity, obeying Him in the other, and ye say well, for so I am.—The conscious dignity with which this claim is made is remarkable, following immediately on His laying aside the towel of service. Yet what is this whole history but a succession of such astonishing contrasts from first to last? If I then—the Lord—have washed your feet—the servants—ye—but fellow-servants. ought to wash one another's feet—not in the narrow sense of a literal washing, profusely caricatured by Popes and Emperors, but by the very humblest real services one to another. 14, 17. The servant is not greater than his Lord, &c.—an oft-repeated saying. (Matthew, 10. 24, &c.) If ye know these things, happy are ye if ye do them—a hint that even among real Christians the doing of such things would come lamentably short of the knowing. 18, 19. I speak not of you all—the "happy are ye," of v. 17, being on no supposition applicable to Judas. I know whom I have chosen—in the higher sense. But that the Scripture might be fulfilled—i. e., one has been added to your number, by no accident or mistake, who is none of Mine, but just that he might fulfil his predicted destiny. He that eateth bread with me—"did eat of my bread," (John 6. 1.) as one of my family; admitted to the nearest familiarity of discipleship and of social life. hath lifted up his heel against me—turned upon me, adding insult to injury. (cf. Hebrews, 10. 28.) In the Psalm the immediate reference is to Abithophel's treachery against David, (3 Samuel, 17.) one of those scenes in which the parallel of his story with that of his great Antitype is exceedingly striking. "The eating bread derives a fearful meaning from the participation in the sacramental supper, a meaning which must be applied for ever to all unworthy communicants, as well as to all betrayers of Christ who eat the bread of His Church."—(SPICER, with whom, and others, we agree in thinking that Judas partook of the Lord's supper.) I tell you before, that when it comes to pass, ye may believe—and it came to pass when they deeply needed such confirmation. 30. He that receiveth whatsoever I send, receiveth me, &c.—See on Matthew, 10. 41. The connexion here seems to be that despite the dishonour done to Him by Judas, and similar treatment awaiting themselves, they were to be cheered by the assurance that their office, even as His own, was divine.

21-30. THE TRAITOR INDICATED—HE LEAVES THE SUPPER ROOM. 21. When Jesus had thus said, he was troubled in spirit, and testified, and said, Verily, verily, I say unto you, One of you shall betray me.—The announcement of v. 18. seems not to have been plain enough to be quite apprehended, save by the traitor himself. He will therefore speak it out in terms not to be misunderstood. But how much it cost Him to do this, appears from the "trouble" that came over His "spirit"—visible emotion, no doubt—before He got it uttered. What wounded susceptibility does this disclose, and what exquisite delicacy in His social intercourse with the Twelve, to whom He cannot, without an effort,

He then, having received the sop, went immediately out—severing himself forever from that holy society with which he never had any spiritual sympathy. and it was night—but far blacker night in the soul of Judas than in the sky over his head.

31-35. DISCOURSE AFTER THE TRAITOR'S DEPARTURE—PETER'S SELF-CONFIDENCE—HIS FALL PREDICTED. 31. When he was gone out, Jesus said, Now is the Son of Man glorified—These remarkable words plainly imply that up to this moment our Lord had spoken under a painful restraint, the presence of a traitor within the little circle of His holiest fellowship on earth preventing the free and full outpouring of His heart; as is evident, indeed, from those oft-recurring clauses, "Ye are not all clean." "I speak not of you all" &c. "Now" the restraint is removed, and the embankment which kept in the mighty volume of living waters having broken down, they burst forth in a torrent which only ceases on His leaving the supper-room and entering on the next stage of His great work—the scene in the Garden. But with what words is the silence first broken on the departure of Judas? By no reflections on the traitor, and, what is still more wonderful, by no reference to the dread character of His own approaching sufferings. He does not even name them, save by announcing, as with a burst of triumph, that the hour of His glory has arrived! And what is very remarkable, in five brief clauses He repeats this word "glorify" five times, as if to His view a coronation of glories played at that moment about the Cross. (See on ch. 12, 23.) God is glorified in him—the glory of Each reaching its zenith in the Death of the Cross! If God be glorified in Him, God shall also—in return and reward of this highest of all services ever rendered to Him, or capable of being rendered, glorify him in Himself, and straightway glorify Him—referring now to the Resurrection and Exaltation of Christ after this service was over, including all the honour and glory then put upon Him, and that will for ever encircle Him as Head of the new creation. 33-35. Little children—From the height of His own glory He now descends, with sweet pity, to His "little children," all now His own. This term of endearment, now here else used in the Gospels, and once only employed by Paul (Galatians, 4, 19.), is appropriated by the beloved disciple himself, who no fewer than seven times employs it in his first Epistle. ye shall seek me—feel the want of Me. as I said to the Jews—ch. 7, 34; 8, 21. But, O, in what a different sense! a new commandment I give unto you, That ye love one another; as I have loved you, that ye also love one another, &c.—This was the new feature of it. Christ's love to His people in giving His life a ransom for them was altogether new, and consequently as a Model and Standard for their's to one another. It is not, however, something transcending the great moral law, which is "the old commandment" (1 John, 2, 7, and see on Mark, 12, 28-33.), but that law in a new and peculiar form. Hence it is said to be both new and old (1 John, 2, 7, 8.). by this shall death Christ referred to as what would sever Him from them, but is not staggered at following Him thither. Jesus answered, Wilt thou lay down thy life for my sake?—In this repetition of Peter's words there is deep though affectionate irony, and this Peter himself would feel for many a day after his recovery, as he retraced the painful particulars. Verily... The cook, &c.—See on Luke 22, 21-24.

CHAPTER XIV.

VER. 1-21. DISCOURSE AT THE TABLE AFTER SUPPER.—We now come to that portion of the evangelical history which we may with propriety call its Holy of Holies. Our Evangelist, like a consecrated priest, alone opens up to us the view into this sacred season. It is the record of the last moments spent by the Lord in the midst of His disciples before His passion, when words full of heavenly thought flowed from His sacred lips. All that His heart, glowing with love, had still to say to His friends, was compressed into this short season. At first (from ch. 12, 21.) the intercourse took the form of conversation; sitting at table, they talked familiarly together. But when (14, 21.) the repast was finished, the language of Christ assumed a loftier strain; the disciples, assembled around their Master, listened to the words of life, and seldom spoke a word (only ch. 14, 17, 22). At length, in the Redeemer's sublime intercessory prayer, His full soul was poured forth in express petitions to His heavenly Father on behalf of those who were His own. It is a peculiarity of these last chapters, that they treat almost exclusively of the most profound relations—as that of the Son to the Father, and of both to the Spirit, that of Christ to the Church, of the Church to the world, and so forth. Moreover, a considerable portion of these sublime communications surpassed the point of view to which the disciples had at that time attained; hence the Redeemer frequently repeats the same sentiments in order to impress them more deeply upon their minds, and, because of what they still did not understand, points them to the Holy Spirit, who would remind them of all His sayings, and lead them into all truth (14, 26.). [OLMHAUSEN.] 1. Let not your heart be troubled, &c.—What myriads of souls have not these opening words cheered, in deepest gloom, since first they were uttered! ye believe in God—absolutely, believe also in me—q. d., 'Have the same trust in Me.' What less, and what else, can these words mean! And if so, what a demand to make by one sitting familiarly with them at the supper table! cf. the saying, ch. 5, 17, for which the Jews took up stones to stone Him, as "making himself equal with God" (v. 18.). But it is no transfer of our trust from its proper Object; it is but the concentration of our trust in the Unseen and Impalpable One upon His Own Incarnate Son, by which that trust, instead of the distant, unsteady and too often cold and scarce real thing it otherwise is, acquires a conscious reality, warmth, and power, which makes all things new. This is Christianity in brief. 2, 3. in my Father's house are many mansions—and so room for all, and a place for each. If not I would have told you—q. d., 'I would tell you so at once, I would not deceive you.' I go to prepare a place for you—to obtain for you a right to be there, and to possess your "place." I will come again and receive you unto myself—strictly, at His Personal appearing; but in a secondary and comforting sense, to each individually. Mark again the claim made:—to come again to receive His people "to Himself, that where He is there they may be also." He thinks it ought to be enough to be assured that they shall be where He is and in His keeping. 4-7. whether I go ye know... Thomas saith, Lord, we know not whether thou goest. Jesus saith, I am the way, &c.—By saying this, He meant rather to draw out their enquiries and reply to them. Christ is "THE WAY" to the Father—"no man cometh unto the Father but by Me;" He is "ZAN LAUZAN" of all we find in the Father when we get to Him, "For in Him dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily." (Colossians 2, 8.), and He is all "THE LIFE" that shall ever flow to us and bless us from the Godhead thus approached and thus manifested in Him—"this is the true God and eternal life." (1 John 4, 20.) from henceforth—now, or from this time, understand. 8-12. The substance of this passage is that the Son is the ordained and perfect manifestation of the Father, that His own word for this ought to His disciples to be enough; that if any doubt remained His works ought to remove them, (see on ch. 10, 37, 38,) but yet that these works of His were designed mainly to subvert weak faith, and would be repeated, may succeed by His disciples, in virtue of the power He would confer on them after His departure. He mentions the apostles wrought, though wholly in His name and by His power; and the "greater" works—not in degree but in kind—were the conversion of thousands in a day, by His Spirit accompanying them. 12, 14. whether ever ye ask in my name—as Mediator, that will I do—as Head and Lord of the Kingdom of God. This comprehensive promise is emphatically repeated in v. 14, 15-17. If ye love me, keep my commandments. And I will pray the Father, &c.—This connection seems designed to teach that the proper temple for the individual Spirit of Jesus is a heart filled with that love to Him which lives actively for Him, and so this was the fitting preparation for the promised gift. He shall give you another Comforter—a word used only by John; in his Gospel with reference to the Holy Spirit, in his First Epistle (2, 1.), with reference to Christ Himself. Its proper sense is an "advocate," "patron," "helper." In this sense it is plainly meant of Christ, (1 John, 2, 1.) and in this sense it comprehends all the comfort as well as aid of the Spirit's work. The Spirit is here presented as One who would supply Christ's own place in His absence. That He may abide with you for ever—now go away, as Jesus was going to do in the body, whom the world cannot receive, &c.—See 1 Corinthians 2, 14. He dwelleth with you, and shall be in you.—Though the proper fulness of both these was yet future, our Lord, by using both the present and the future, seems plainly to say that they already had the germ of this great blessing. 18-20. I will leave you comforted—in bereaved and desolate condition—or (as Mey.) "orphans." I will come to you—"I come" or "am coming" to you, i. e., plainly by the Spirit, since it was to make His departure to be no bereavement, world with "me" holdeth me no more, but ye see ('behold') me—His bodily presence, being all the sight of Him which "the world" ever had, or was capable of, it "behold Him no more" after His departure to the Father; but by the coming of the Spirit, the presence of Christ was not only continued to His spiritually enlightened disciples, but rendered far more efficacious and blessed than His bodily presence had been before the Spirit's coming, because I live—not 'shall live,' only when raised from the dead; for it is His unextinguishable, divine life of which He speaks, in view of which His death and resurrection were but as shadows passing over the sun-gleams disc. cf. Luke, 24, 5; Revelation, 1, 18, "the Living One." And this grand saying Jesus uttered with death immediately in view. What a brightness does this throw over the next clause, "Ye shall live also!" "Knewest thou not," said Luther to the King of terrors, "that thou didst devour the Lord Christ, but wert charged to give Him back, and wert devoured of Him! So thou must leave me undevoured because I abide in Him, and live and suffer for His name's sake. Men may hunt me out of the world—that I care not for—but I shall sit on that account abide in death, I shall live with my Lord Christ, since I know and believe that He dwelleth" [quoted in STRONG.] At that day—of the Spirit's coming. Ye shall know that; I am in my Father, ye in me, I in you—See on ch. 17, 22, 23, 21-24. He that hath my

And hath nothing in me—nothing of His own—nothing to fasten on. Glorious saying! The truth of it is, that which makes the Person and Work of Christ the life of the world. (Hebrews 9. 14; 1 John 3. 5; 2 Corinthians 5. 21.) But that the world may know that I love the Father, &c.—The sense must be completed thus: 'But to the Prince of the world, though he has nothing in me, I shall yield myself up even unto death, that the world may know that I love and obey the Father, whose commandment it is that I give my life a ransom for many.' Arise, let us go hence—Did they then, at this stage of the discourse, leave the supper-room, as some able interpreters conclude? If so, we think our evangelist would have mentioned it; see ch. 18. 1, which seems clearly to intimate that they then only left the upper-room. But what do the words mean if not this? We think it the dictate of the saying of earlier date, "I have a baptism to be baptized with, and how am I straitened till it be accomplished!"—a spontaneous and irrepressible expression of the deep eagerness of His spirit to get into the conflict, and that if, as is likely, it was responded to somewhat too literally by the guests who hung on His lips, in the way of a movement to depart, a wave of His hand would be enough to show that He had yet more to say ere they broke up; and that disciple, whose pen was dipt in a love to his Master which made their movements of small consequence save when essential to the illustration of His words, would record this little outburst of the Lamb hastening to the slaughter, in the very midst of His lofty discourse; while the effect of it, if any, upon His hearers, as of no consequence, would naturally enough be passed over.

CHAPTER XV.

VER. 1-27. DISCOURSE AT THE SUPPER-TABLE CONTINUED.—1-8. The spiritual oneness of Christ and His people, and His relation to them as the Source of all their spiritual life and fruitfulness, are here beautifully set forth by a figure familiar to Jewish ears. (Isaiah, 5. 1, &c.) I am the true VINE—of Whom the vine of nature is but a shadow. my Father the husbandman—the great Proprietor of the Vineyard, the Lord of the Spiritual kingdom. (It is surely unnecessary to point out the claim to supreme divinity involved in this.) every branch in me that beareth not fruit . . . every branch that beareth fruit—As in a fruit-tree, some branches may be fruitful, others quite barren, according as there is a vital connexion between the branch and the stock, or no vital connexion; so the disciples of Christ may be spiritually fruitful or the reverse, according as they are vitality and spiritually connected with Christ, or but externally and mechanically attached to Him. The fruitless He "taketh away" (see on v. 6.); the fruitful He "purgeth" ("cleanseth," "pruneth")—stripping it, as the husbandman does, of what is rank and luxuriant (Mark, 4. 19.), "that it may bring forth more fruit;" a process often painful, but no less needful and beneficial than in the natural husbandry. Now—rather, 'Already,' ye are clean through ('by reason of') the word I have spoken to you—already in a purified, fruitful condition, in consequence of the long action upon them of that searching "word" which was "as a refiner's fire." (Malachi, 3. 2. 3.) abide in me, and I in you; as the branch cannot bear fruit of itself, except it abide in the vine, &c.—As all spiritual fruitfulness had been ascribed to the mutual inhabitation, and living, active, interpenetration (so to speak) of Christ and His disciples, so here the keeping up of this vital connexion is made essential to continued fruitfulness, without me—'apart,' or 'vitality disconnected from me,' ye can do nothing—spiritually, acceptably. If a man abide not in me, he is cast forth as a branch...withered...cast into the fire...burned—The one proper use of the vine is to bear fruit; falling this, it is good for one other thing—fuel. (See Ezekiel, 15. 1-5.) How awfully striking the figure, in this view of it! If ye abide in me, and my words in you—Mark the change from the inhabitation of Himself to that of His words, paving the way for the subsequent exhortations (v. 6, 10.), ask what ye will, and it shall be done unto you—because this indwelling of His words in them would secure the harmony of their askings with the Divine will, glorified that ye bear much fruit—not only from His delight in it for its own sake, but as from 'the juices of the Living Vine,' so shall ye be my disciples—evidence your discipleship. 9-11. continue ye in my love—not, 'Continue to love me,' but, 'Continue in the possession and enjoyment of My love to you,' as is evident from the next words. If ye keep my commandments, ye shall abide in my love—the obedient spirit of true discipleship cherishing and attracting the continu-

Thus the Spirit, use, is seen convincing men that there is in feet relief under the sense of sin of which were convinced them; and so far from mourning His absence from us, as an irreparable loss, as glory in it, as the evidence of His perfect on our behalf, exclaiming with one who said this point, "Who shall lay anything to the God's elect? It is God that justifieth: Who condemneth? It is Christ that died; yea, at is risen again, who is even at the right hand," &c. (Romans, 8. 33, 34.) of judgment, the prince of this world is judged—By supposing cast out judgment is here meant, the point of this cast out by good interpreters, quite missed. The "The prince of this world is judged," means, reasonable doubt, the same as that in ch. 12. shall the prince of this world be cast out;" mean that his dominion over men, or his enslave and so to ruin them, is destroyed, of Christ "judged" or judicially overthrew he was thereupon "cast out" or expelled usurped dominion. The subjective of the Spirit's teaching—the discovery to the use of what is Christ outwardly—is here very pressed; and, at the same time, the vanity for revelations of the Spirit which shall ing beyond throwing light in the soul upon at Himself is, and taught, and did upon earth. that the Father hath are mine—a plainer ex- than this of absolute community with the all things, cannot be conceived, though the us here have reference to the things of the of Grace, which the Spirit was to receive ight show it to us. show that His removal from them by death was what He meant; and in that case, their 'joy at again seeing Him' points to their transport at His re-appearance amongst them on His resurrection, when they could no longer doubt his identity. At the same time the sorrow of the widowed Church in the absence of her Lord in the heavens, and her transport at His personal return, are certainly here expressed. 24-25. At that day—of the dispensation of the Spirit, as ch. 14. 20. ye shall ask (enquire of) me nothing—by reason of the fulness of the Spirit's teaching. (ch. 14. 20; 16. 13; and cf. 1 John, 2. 27.) hitherto have ye asked nothing in my name—for prayer in the name of Christ, and prayer to Christ, presuppose His glorification. [OLSHAUSEN.] ask—when I am gone, "in my name," in proverbs—in obscure language, opposed to "showing plainly"—i.e., by the Spirit's teaching. I say not, I will pray the Father for you—as if He were not of Himself disposed to aid you: Christ does pray the Father for his people, but not for the purpose of inclining an unwilling ear. for the Father himself loveth you, because ye have loved me—This love of theirs is that which is called forth by God's eternal love in the gift of his Son mirrored in the hearts of those who believe, and resting on His dear Son. I came forth from the Father, &c.—q.d., 'And ye are right, for I have indeed so come forth, and shall soon return whence I came.' This echo of the truth, alluded to in the preceding verse, seems like thinking aloud, as if it were grateful to His own spirit on such a subject and at such an hour. 29, 30. His disciples said, Now speakest thou plainly, and speakest no proverb, &c.—hardly more so than before; the time for perfect plainness was yet to come; but having caught a glimpse of His meaning it was nothing more; they eagerly express their satisfaction, as if glad to make anything of His words. How touchingly does this show both the simplicity of their hearts and the infantile character of their faith! 31-33. Jesus answered, Do ye now believe—q.d., 'It is well ye do, for it is soon to be tested, and in a way ye little expect.' the hour cometh, ye, is now come, that ye shall be scattered, every man to his own, and shall leave me alone; and yet I am not alone—A deep and awful sense of wrong experienced is certainly expressed here, but how lovingly! That He was not to be utterly deserted, that there was One who would not forsake Him, was to Him matter of ineffable support and consolation; but that He should be without all human countenance and cheer, who as Man was exquisitely sensitive to the law of sympathy, would fill themselves with as much shame, when they afterwards recurred to it, as the Redeemer's heart in his hour of need with pungent sorrow. "I looked for some to take pity, but there was none; and for comforters, but I found none." (Psalm 69. 30.) because the Father is with me—how near, and with what sustaining power, who can express? These things I have spoken unto you—not the immediately preceding words, but this whole discourse, of which these were the very last words, and which He thus winds up. that in me ye might have peace—in the sublime sense before explained. (See on ch. 14. 27.) In the world ye shall have tribulation—specially arising from its deadly opposition to those who "are not of the world, but chosen out of the world." So that the "peace" promised was far from an untruffed one. I have overcome the world—not only before you, but for you, that ye may be able to do the same. (1 John, 5. 4, 5.)

CHAPTER XVII.

Ver. 1-26. THE INTERCESSORY PRAYER.—See on ch. 14. 1. Had this prayer not been recorded, what reverential reader would not have exclaimed, O to have been within hearing of such a prayer as that must have been, which wound up the whole of His past ministry and formed the point of transition to the dark scenes which immediately followed! But here it is, and with such signature of the Lips that uttered it that we seem rather to hear it from Himself than read it from the pen of His faithful reporter. 1-3. These words spake Jesus, and lifted up his eyes—'John very seldom depicts the gestures or looks of our Lord, as here. But this was an occasion of which the impression was indelible, and the upward look could not be passed over. [ALFORD.] Father, the hour is come—See on ch. 13. 31, 32. glorify thy Son—Put honour upon thy Son, by countenancing, sustaining, and carrying Him through that "hour," given ('gavest') him power over all flesh—See on Matthew, 11. 27; 28. 18-20. give eternal life to as many as, &c.—lit., 'to all that which thou hast given him.' (See on ch. 6. 37-40.) This is that life eternal, that they might (may) know, &c.—This life eternal, then, is not mere conscious and unending existence, but a life of acquaintance with God in Christ. (Job, 22. 21.) thee, the only true God—the sole personal living God; in glorious contrast equally with heathen polytheism, philosophic naturalism, and mystic pantheism, and Jesus Christ whom thou hast sent—This is the only place where our Lord gives himself this compound name, afterwards so current in apostolic preaching and writing. Here the terms are used in their strict signification—"JESUS," because He "saves his people from their sins"; "CHRIST," as anointed with the measureless fulness of the Holy Ghost for the exercise of His saving offices (see on Matthew 1. 16.); "WHOM THOU HAST SENT," in the plenitude of Divine Authority and Power, to save. The very juxtaposition here of Jesus Christ with the Father is a proof, by implication, of our Lord's Godhead. The knowledge of God and a creature could not be eternal life, and such an association of the one with the other would be inconceivable. [ALFORD.] 4. 5. I have glorified thee on the earth—rather, 'I glorified' for the thing is conceived as now past. I have finished, 'I finished,' the work which thou gavest me to do—It is very important to preserve in the translation the past tense, used in the original, otherwise it might be thought that the work already "finished" was only what He had done before uttering that prayer; whereas it will be observed that our Lord speaks throughout as already beyond this present scene (v. 12, &c.), and so must be supposed to include in His "finished work" the "decease which He was to accomplish at Jerusalem." And now—in return, glorify thou me—The "I thee" and "Thou me" are so placed in the original, each beside its fellow, as to show that a PERFECT RECIPROCALITY OF SERVICES of the Son to the Father first, and then of the Father to the Son in return, is what our Lord means here to express. with the glory which I had with thee before the world was—when "in the beginning the Word was with God" (ch. 1. 1.), "the only-begotten Son in the bosom of the Father" (ch. 1. 18.). With this pre-existent glory, which He veiled on earth, He asks to be reinstated, the design of the veiling being accomplished—not, however, simply as before, but now in our nature. 6-8. From praying for Himself He now comes to pray for His disciples. I have manifested ('I manifested') thy name—His whole character towards mankind. to the men thou gavest me out of the world.—See on ch. 6. 37-40. they have known surely that I came out from thee—See on ch. 16. 30, 31. 9-14. I pray for them—not as individuals merely, but as representatives of all such in every succeeding age (see on v. 20.). not for the world—for they had been given Him "out of the world" (v. 6.), and had been already transformed into the very opposite of it. The things sought for them, indeed, are applicable only to such. all mine are thine, and thine are mine—lit., 'All my things are thine and thy things are mine.' (On this use of the newer gender, see on ch. 6. 37-40.) Absolute COMMUNITY OF PROPERTY between the Father and the Son is here expressed as nakedly as words can do it. (See on v. 8.) I am no more in the world (see on v. 4.), but these are in the world—q. d., Though My struggles are at an end, theirs are not; though I have gotten beyond the scene of strife, I cannot sever myself in spirit from them, left behind and only just entering on their great conflict.' Holy Father—an expression He nowhere else uses. "Father" is His wonted appellation, but "holy" is here prefixed, because His appeal was to that perfection of the Father's nature, to "keep" or preserve them from being tainted by the unholy atmosphere of "the world" they were still in. keep through thine own name—rather, 'in thy name'; in the exercise of that gracious and holy character for which He was known. that they may be one—See on v. 21. I kept (guarded) them in thy name—acting as thy representative on earth. none of them lost, but the son of perdition—'It is not implied here that the son of perdition was one of those whom the Father had given to the Son, but rather the contrary, ch. 12. 18. [w. & w.] It is just as in L. 4. 28, 27, where we are not to suppose that the woman of Sarepta in Sidon was one of the widows of Israel, nor Naaman the Syrian one of the lepers in Israel, though the language—the same as here—might seem to express that. son of perdition—doomed to it. (2 Thessalonians 2. 3; Mark 14. 21.) I speak in the world, that they might have my joy fulfilled in themselves—q. d., 'Such a strain befits rather the upper sanctuary than the scene of conflict; but I speak so "in the world," that My joy, the joy I experience in knowing that such intercessions are to be made for them by their absent Lord, may be tasted by those who now hear them, and by all who shall hereafter read the record of them. 15-19. I pray not that thou shouldst take them out of the world—for that, though it would secure their own safety, would leave the world unblest by their testimony, but keep them from the evil—all evil in and of the world. They are not of the world, even as I am not of the world.—See on ch. 15. 18, 19. This is reiterated here, to pave the way for the prayer which follows. Sanctify them—As the former prayer, "Keep them," was negative, asking protection for them from the poisonous element which surrounded and pressed upon their renewed nature, so this prayer, "Sanctify them," is positive, asking the advancement and completion of their begun sanctification. through ('in') thy truth—God's revealed truth, as the medium or element of sanctification; a statement this of immense importance. thy word is truth—cf. ch. 15. 3; Colossians, 1. 6; Ephesians, 1. 13. As thou hast sent ('sentest') me into the world, even so have I also sent ('sent I also') them into the world—As their mission was to carry into effect the purposes of their Master's mission, so our Lord speaks of the authority in both cases as co-ordinate. and for their sakes I sanctify (consecrate) myself, that they also might ('may') be sanctified (consecrated)—The only difference between the application of the same term to Christ and the disciples is, as applied to Christ, that it means only to 'consecrate'; whereas, in application to the disciples, it means to 'consecrate' with the additional idea of previous sanctification, since nothing but what is holy can be presented as an offering. The whole self-sacrificing work of the disciples appears here as a mere result of the offering of Christ. [OLSHAUSEN.] through ('in') the truth—Though the article is wanting in the original here, we are not to translate, as in the margin, 'truly sanctified,' for the reference seems plainly to be to "the truth" mentioned v. 17. (see there). 20-23. Neither pray I for these alone—This very important explanation, uttered in condescension to the hearers and readers of this prayer in all time, is meant not merely of what follows, but of the whole prayer. them also which shall believe—The majority of the best MSS. read 'which believe,' all future time being viewed as present, while the present is viewed as past and gone. that they all may be one, as thou, Father, in me, and I in thee, that they may be one in us—The indwelling Spirit of the Father and the

"With this lofty thought the Redeemer closes His prayer for His disciples, and in them for His Church through all ages. He has compressed into the last moments given Him for conversation with His own the most sublime and glorious sentiments ever uttered by mortal lips. But hardly has the sound of the last word died away, when He passes with the disciples over the brook Kedron to Gethsemane—and the bitter conflict draws on. The seed of the new world must be sown in Death, that thence Life may spring up. [OLSHAUSEN.]

CHAPTER XVIII.

VER. 1-13. BETRAYAL AND APPREHENSION OF JESUS. 1-3. Over the brook Kedron—a deep, dark ravine, to the North-East of Jerusalem, through which flowed this small 'storm-brook' or 'winter-torrent,' and which in summer is dried up, where was a garden—at the foot of the mount of Olives, "called Gethsemane" ('olive-press'), Matthew 26. 30, 36. Judas knew the place, for Jesus ofttimes (see ch. 8. 1; Luke 21. 37) resorted thither with his disciples.—The baseness of this abuse of knowledge in Judas, derived from admission to the closest privacies of his Master, is most touchingly conveyed here, though nothing beyond bare narrative is expressed. Jesus, however, knowing that in this spot Judas would expect to find Him, instead of avoiding it, hies Him thither, as a Lamb to the slaughter, "No man taketh my life from me, but I lay it down of myself." (ch. 10. 18.) Besides, the scene which was to fill up the little breathing time, the awful interval, between the Supper and the Apprehension—like the "silence in heaven for about the space of half-an-hour" between the breaking of the Apocalyptic Seals and the peal of the Trumpets of war (Revelation 8. 1.)—the AGONY—would have been too terrible for the upper-room; nor would He cloud the delightful associations of the last Passover and the first Supper by pouring out the anguish of His soul there. The garden, however, with its amplitude, its shady olives, its endeared associations, would be congenial to his heart. Here He had room enough to retire—first, from eight of them, and then from the more favoured three; and here, when that mysterious scene was over, the stillness would only be broken by the tread of the traitor. Judas then—"He that was called Judas, one of the twelve," says Luke, in language which brands him with peculiar infamy, as in the sacred circle while in no sense of it, the band of men—"the detachment of the Roman cohort, on duty at the festival, for the purpose of maintaining order." [WEBSTER & WILKINSON.] officers from the chief priests and Pharisees.—Captains of the Temple and armed Levites, lanterns and torches—It was full moon, but in case He should have secreted Himself somewhere in the dark ravine, they bring the means of exploring its hiding-places—little knowing whom they had to do with. "Now he that betrayed Him had given them a sign, saying, Whomsoever I shall kiss, that same is He, hold Him fast." (Matthew 26. 48.) The cold-bloodedness of this speech was only exceeded by the deed itself. "And Judas went before them, Luke 22. 47; and forthwith he came to Jesus, and said, Hall, Master, and kissed Him." (Matthew 26. 49. cf. Exodus 4. 27; 15. 7; Luke 7. 45.) The impudence of this atrocious deed shows how thoroughly he had by this time mastered all his scruples. If the dialogue between our Lord and His captors was before this, as some interpreters think it was, the kiss of Judas was purely gratuitous, and probably to make good his right to the money; our Lord having presented Himself unexpectedly before them, and rendered it unnecessary for any one to point Him out. But a comparison of the narratives seems to show that our Lord's "coming forth" to the band was subsequent to the interview of Judas. "And Jesus said unto him, Friend"—not the endearing term "friend" in ch. 15. 15, but "companion," a word used on occasions of remonstrance or rebuke (as Matthew 20. 13; 22. 12. —"Wherefore art thou come? (Matthew 26. 50). Betrayest thou the Son of Man with a kiss"—imprinting upon the foulest act the mark of tenderest affection! What wounded feeling does this express! Of this Jesus showed Himself on various occasions keenly susceptible—as all generous and beautiful natures do. 4-9. Jesus, knowing all things that should come, were coming, upon Him, went forth—from the shade of the trees, probably, into open view, indicating His sublime preparedness to meet His captors. Whom seek ye?—Partly to prevent a rush of the soldiery upon the disciples (BESSET); and see Mark 14. 51. 52, as showing a tendency to this; but still more as part of that courage and majesty which so overawed them. He would not wait to be taken. They answered, Jesus of Nazareth—Just the sort of blunt, straightfor-side would be exposed to attack. The was evidently aimed vertically at his breast & WILKINSON. Then said Jesus thus far" (Luke 22. 51). Put up thy sword; the cup which my Father hath given me, shall it?—This expresses both the feelings which the Lord's breast during the agony in obedience to the cup viewed in itself, but of the Father's will, perfect preparedness (See on Luke 22. 39-46). Matthew adds to Peter the following:—"For all they sword shall perish by the sword." M. "Those who take the sword must run at human warfare; but mine is a warfare of love, as they are not carnal, are attended hazards, but carry certain victory. "I that I cannot now—even after things have so far—" pray to my Father, and He shall give me"—rather, "place at my disposal twelve legions of angels;" with allusion to the one angel who had, in His agony, Him from Heaven strengthening Him" and in the precise number, alluding to the needed the help, Himself and His elect. The full complement of a legion of Romans was six thousand. "But how then shall be fulfilled that thus it must be?" (Matt) He could not suffer, according to the Scripture allowed Himself to be delivered from death. "And He touched his ear and (Luke 22. 51; for "The son of Man came men's lives, but to save them" Luke 9. 55) while they were destroying Him; to save Than the band, took Jesus—but not till the reason for a fire—the coldness of the night. (MORAN & WELKINSON.) "Peter went in and sat in the servants to see the end" (Matthew 26, 58), and "stood himself at the fire" (Mark 14, 54). These two elements are extremely interesting. His wishing "see the end," or issue of these proceedings, was at led him into the palace, for he evidently feared a worst. But once in, the serpent-coil is drawn closer; a cold night, and why should not he take advantage of the fire as well as others? Besides, in the talk the crowd about the all-engrossing topic, he may keep something which he would like to hear. "And Peter was beneath in the palace" (Mark 14, 69, below 20, 69.) says, "sat without in the palace," pointing to oriental architecture, and especially in the buildings, as here, the street-door, or heavy fold-gate—through which single persons entered by a kept by a porter—opened by a passage or "porch" (Mark 14, 68) into a quadrangular court, here called the alcove or hall, which was open above, and is frequented with flagstones. In the centre of this court "fire" would be kindled in a brazier). At the far end of it, probably, was the chamber in which trial was held, open to the court and not far from the (Luke 22, 61), but on a higher level; for Mark the court was "beneath" it. The ascent was, perhaps, by a short flight of steps. This explanation will be the intensely interesting details more intelligible. Then saith the camel that kept the door—"one of the servants of the High Priest," says Mark 14, 66. "When I saw Peter warming himself, she looked upon him and said" (Mark 14, 67). Luke is more graphic (22, 66—" beheld him as he sat by the fire lit. 'the light,' earnestly looked on him 'fixed her gaze upon him'"), said. "His demeanour and timidity, which must be vividly showed themselves, as it so generally happens leading to the recognition of him." (OLSHAUSEN.) "But thou also one of this man's disciples!—i.e., thou well as "that other disciple," whom she knew to one, but did not challenge, perceiving that he was a vile person. He saith, I am not—"He denied her them all, saying, I know not what thou sayest," know 20, 70—a common form of point-blank denial; know 20, 70—"Peter," not, neither understand I what sayest," Mark 14, 68; "Woman, I know Him not," the 22, 67. This was the FIRST DENIAL. "And he set out into the porch (thinking, perhaps, to steal away, and the cock crew," Mark 14, 68. 10-21. The High Priest asked Jesus of His disciples, and of His doctrine probably to entrap Him into some statements which might be used against Him at the trial. From our side's answer it would seem that "His disciples" were devoted to be some secret party. I speak ('have them') openly to the world—See ch. 7, 4. I ever taught the evangelists and in the Temple, whither the Jews came—Court of publicity, though with sublime boldness. In secret have I said ('spoke') nothing at all, nothing of any different nature; all His private communications with the twelve being but explanations and developments of His public teaching—cf. John 4: 19; 48, 16. Why askest me ask them which and me... they know what I said—"This seems to imply that He saw the attempt to draw Him into self-implication, and resented it by falling back upon the list of every accused party to have some charge laid against Him by competent witnesses. Struck Jesus in the palms. Answerest the High Priest so—See Isaiah 53; and cf. Acts 23, 2. If I have spoken—"If I spoke," in reply to the High Priest. If well—He does not say "If not" evil, as if His reply were merely unobjectionable: "Well" seems to challenge more than this due to His remonstrance. (BENGLI.) This shows it. Matthew, 5, 39, is not to be taken to the letter. 57. Now Annas had sent Him bound unto Caiaphas—that the foregoing interview took place before Caiaphas; ANNAS, declining to meddle with the case, having sent Him to Caiaphas at once. But the words here, literally are, 'Annas sent Him (not 'had sent Him') to Caiaphas—and the "now" being of doubtful authority. Thus read, the verse affords no evidence that He was sent to Caiaphas before the interview just recorded, but implies rather the contrary. We take this interview, then, with some of the ablest interpreters, to be a preliminary and non-official one with ANNAS, at an hour of the night when Caiaphas's Council could not convene; and one that ought not to be confounded with that solemn one recorded by the other Evangelists, when all were assembled and witnesses called. But the building in which both met with Jesus appears to have been the same, the room only being different, and the court, of course, in that case, one. And Simon Peter was standing and warming himself. They said therefore, Art thou not also one of his disciples?—In Matthew, 26, 71, the second charge was made by "another maid, when he was gone out into the porch," who "saw him, and said unto them that were there, This [fellow] was also with Jesus of Nazareth." So also Mark, 14, 69. But in Luke, 22, 65, it is said, "After a little while" (from the time of the first denial, another [maid] saw him, and said, Thou art also of them." Possibly it was thrown at him by more than one: but these circumstantial varieties only confirm the truth of the narrative. He denied it, and said, I am not—in Matthew, 26, 72, "He denied with an oath, I do not know the man." This was the SECOND DENIAL. One of the servants of the High Priest, being his kinsman, whose ear Peter cut off, said, Did not I see thee in the Garden with Him—No doubt his relationship to Malchus drew attention to the man who smote him, and this enabled him to identify Peter. "Sad reprisals! (BENGLI.) The other evangelists make his detection to turn upon his dialect. "After a while" ("about the space of one hour after," Luke, 22, 69,) came unto him they that stood by and said to Peter, "Surely thou also art one of them, for thy speech betrayeth thee," Matthew, 26, 73. ("Thou art a Galilean, and thy speech agreeth thereto," Mark, 14, 70; and so Luke, 22, 69.) The Galilean dialect had a more Syrian cast than that of Judea. If Peter had held his peace, this peculiarity had not been observed; but hoping, probably, to put them off the scent by joining in the fire-side talk, he only thus discovered himself. Peter then denied again—But, if the challenge of Malchus's kinsman was made simultaneously with this on account of his Galilean dialect, it was no simple denial; for Matthew, 26, 74, says, "Then began he to curse and to swear, saying, I know not the man." So Mark, 14, 71. This was the THIRD DENIAL. And immediately ("while he yet spake," Luke, 22, 69.) the cock crew—As Mark is the only evangelist who tells us that our Lord predicted that the cock should crow twice (ch. 14, 30,) so he only mentions that it did crow twice (v. 72.) The other evangelists, who tell us merely that our Lord predicted that "before the cock should crow he would deny Him thrice," (Matthew, 26, 34; Luke, 22, 34; John, 13, 38;) mention only one actual crowing, which was Mark's last. There is something affecting in this evangelist—who, according to the earliest tradition (confirmed by internal evidence), derived his materials so largely from Peter, as to have been styled his "interpreter," being the only one who gives both the sad prediction and its still sadder fulfilment in full. It seems to show that Peter himself not only retained through all his after-life the most vivid recollection of the circumstances of his fall, but that he was willing that others should know them too. The immediately subsequent acts are given full only in Luke (22, 61, 62; "And the Lord turned and looked upon Peter," from the hall of judgment to the court, in the way already explained. But who can tell what lightning-flashes of wounded love and piercing reproach shot from that "look" through the eye of Peter into his heart! "And Peter remembered the word of the Lord, how he had said unto him, Before the cock crow, thou shalt deny me thrice. And Peter went out and wept bitterly." How different from the sequel of Judas' act! Doubtless the hearts of the two men towards the Saviour were perfectly different from the first; and the treason of Judas was but the consummation of the wretched man's resistance of the blaze of light in the midst of which he had lived for three years, while Peter's denial was but a momentary obscuration of the heavenly light and love to his Master which ruled his life. But the immediate cause of the blessed revulsion, which made Peter "weep bitterly" was, beyond all doubt, this heart-piercing "look" which his Lord gave him. And remembering the Saviour's own words at the table, "Simon, Simon, Satan hath desired to have you that he may sift you as wheat, but I have prayed (rather I pray): for thee that thy faith fail not" (see on Luke, 22, 31, 32), may we not say that this prayer fetched down all that there was in that "look" to pierce and break the heart of Peter, to keep it from despair, to work in it "repentance unto salvation not to be repented of," and at length, under other healing touches, to "restore his soul?" (See on Mk. 16, 7.) 29-40. JESUS BEFORE PILATE. N.B. Our Evangelist, having given the interview with Annas, omitted by the other Evangelists, here omits the trial and condemnation before Caiaphas, which the others had recorded. See on Mark, 14, 63-65. [The notes, broken off there at v. 61, are here concluded. (Mark 14.) 61. "The high priest asked him, Art thou the Christ, the Son of the blessed?"—Matthew says the high priest put him upon solemn oath, saying, "I adjure thee by the living God that thou tell us whether thou be the Christ, the Son of God" 26, 61.] This rendered an answer by our Lord legally necessary, Leviticus, 5, 1. Accordingly, 62. "Jesus said, I am" ("Thou hast said," Matthew, 26, 64.). In Luke, 22, 67, 68, some other words are given, "If I tell you, ye will not believe; and if I also ask you, ye will not answer me, nor let me go." This seems to have been uttered before giving His direct answer, as a calm remonstrance and dignified protest against the pre-judgment of His case and the unfairness of their mode of procedure, "and ye shall see the Son of Man," &c. —This concluding part of our Lord's answer is given somewhat more fully by Matthew and Luke. "Nevertheless I say unto you, Hereafter (rather, From henceforth) shall ye see the Son of Man sitting on the right hand of power, and coming in the clouds of heaven." (Matthew, 26, 64; Luke, 22, 69.) g.d. "I know the scorn with which ye are ready to meet such an avowal: To your eyes, which are but eyes of flesh, there stands at this bar only a mortal like yourselves, and He at the mercy of the ecclesiastical and civil authorities; 'Nevertheless,' a day is coming when ye shall see another sight: Those eyes, which now gaze on me with proud disdain, shall see this very prisoner at the right hand of the Majesty on high, and coming in the clouds of heaven." "Then shall the Judged One be revealed as the Judge, and His judges in this chamber appear at His august tribunal: then shall the unrighteous judges be impartially judged; and while they are wishing that they had never been born, He for whom they now watch as their Victim shall be greeted with the hallelujahs of heaven, and the welcome of Him that sitteth upon the throne!" 63, 64. "Then the high priest rent his clothes, and saith, What need we any further witnesses? Ye have heard the blasphemy"—"of his own mouth," Luke, 22, 71: an affectation of religious horror. "What think ye?"—"Say, what verdict you would pronounce." "They all condemned him to be guilty of death"—of a capital crime. (See Leviticus, 24, 16.) 65. "And some began to spit on him" ("Then did they spit in his face," Matthew, 26, 67.) See Isaiah, 50, 6. "And to cover his face, and to buffet him, and to say unto him, Prophesy"—or 'divine' "unto us, thou Christ, Who is he that smote thee?" The sarcasm in styling Him "the Christ," and as such demanding of Him the perpetrator of the blows inflicted upon Him, was in them as infamous as to Him it was stinging, and the servants did strike him with the palms of their hands—"And many other things blasphemously spake they against him." Luke, 22, 65. This general statement is important, as showing that virulent and varied as were the recorded affronts put upon Him, they are but a small specimen of what He endured on that black occasion.]—28. Then led they Jesus from Caiaphas to the hall of judgment—but not till 'in the morning the chief priests held a consultation with the elders and scribes and the whole council against him to put him to death, and bound him," (Matthew, 27, 1; and see on Mark, 15, 1.) The word here rendered "hall of judgment" is from the Latin, and denotes 'the palace of the governor of a Roman province.' they themselves went not into the palace lest they should be defiled—by contact with ceremonially unclean Gentiles. but that they might eat the Passover—If this refer to the principal part of the festival, the eating of the lamb, the question is, how our Lord and his disciples came to eat it the night before; and, as it was an evening meal, how ceremonial defilement contracted in the morning would unfit them for partaking of it, as after 6 o'clock it was reckoned a new day. These are questions which have occasioned immense research and learned treatises. But as the usages of the Jews appear to have somewhat varied at different times, and our present knowledge of them is not sufficient to clear up all difficulties, they are among the not very important questions which probably will never be entirely solved. 29-32. Pilate went out to them, and said, What accusation bring ye against this man?—State your charge. If he were not a malefactor, we would not have delivered him up unto thee—They were conscious they had no case, of which Pilate could take cognizance, and therefore insinuate that they had already found him worthy of death by their own law; but not having the power, under the Roman government, to carry their sentence into execution, they had come merely for his sanction, that the saying might be fulfilled which he spake, signifying what death he should die—i. e., by crucifixion (ch. 12, 32, 33; Matthew, 20, 19), which being a Roman mode of execution, could only be carried into effect by order of the governor. (The Jewish mode in such cases as this, was by stoning.) 33-38. Pilate called Jesus, and said, Art thou the king of the Jews?—In Luke, 23, 2, they charge our Lord before Pilate with "perverting the nation, and forbidding to give tribute to Cæsar, saying that he himself is Christ a king." Perhaps this was what occasioned Pilate's question. Jesus answered, Sayest thou this of thyself, or did others tell it of me?—an important question for our Lord's case, to bring out whether the word "king" were meant in a political sense, with which Pilate had a right to deal, or whether he were merely put up to it by His accusers, who had no claims to charge him but such as were of a purely religious nature, with which Pilate had nothing to do. Pilate answered, Am I a Jew? Thine own nation and the chief priests delivered thee to me: What hast thou done?—g.d. "Jewish questions I neither understand nor meddle with; but thou art here on a charge which, though it seems only Jewish, may yet involve treasonable matter: As they state it, I cannot decide the point; tell me, then, what procedure of thine has brought thee into this position." In modern phrase, Pilate's object in this question was merely to determine the relevance of the charge. Jesus answered, My kingdom is not of this world—He does not say "not over," but "not of this world"—i. e., in its origin and nature; therefore "no such kingdom as need give thee or thy master the least alarm.' If my kingdom were of this world, then would my servants fight, that I should not be delivered to the Jews.—A very convincing argument; for if his servants did not fight to prevent their king from being delivered up to his enemies, much less would they use force for the establishment of his kingdom. [w. & w.] but now—*but the fact is, is my kingdom not from hence—Our Lord only says whence His kingdom is not—first simply affirming it, next giving proof of it, then re-affirming it. This was all that Pilate had to do with. The positive nature of His kingdom He would not obtrude upon one who was as little able to comprehend it, as entitled officially to information about it. (It is worthy of notice that the "MY," which occurs four times in this one verse—Whence of His kingdom, and once of His servants—is put in the emphatic form. Art thou a king, then?—There was no sarcasm or disdain in this question (as THOMSON, ALFORD, &c., allege), else our Lord's answer would have been different. Putting emphasis upon "then," his question betrays a mixture of surprise and eagerness, partly at the possibility of there being, after all, something dangerous under the claim, and partly from a certain awe which our Lord's demeanour probably struck into him. T'ou sayest that I am a King—It is even so. To this end was I ('have I been') born, and to this end came I ('am I come') into the world, that I may bear witness to the truth—His birth expresses His manhood: His coming into the world, His existence before assuming humanity: The truth, then, here affirmed, though Pilate would catch little of it, was, that His incarnation was expressly in order to the assumption of royalty in our nature. Yet, instead of saying, He came to be a king, which is His meaning, He says He came to testify to the truth. Why this? Because, in such circumstances, it required a noble courage not to flinch from His royal claims; and our Lord, conscious that He was putting forth that courage, gives a turn to His conclusion expressive of it. It is to this that Paul alludes, in those remarkable words to Timothy: "I charge thee before God, who quickeneth all things, and before Christ Jesus, who, in the presence of Pontius Pilate, witnessed the good confession." (1 Timothy, 6. 13.) This was an act of our Lord's life, His courageous witness-bearing before the Governor, selected as an encouraging example of the fidelity which Timothy ought to display. As the Lord (says OLSHAUSEN beautifully) owned Himself the Son of God before the most exalted theocratic council, so He confessed His royal dignity in presence of the representative of the highest political authority on earth. Every one that is of the truth heareth my voice—Our Lord here not only affirms that His word had in it a self-evidencing, self-recommending power, but gently insinuated the true secret of the growth and grandeur of His kingdom—as a KINGDOM OF TRUTH, in its highest sense, into which all souls who have learnt to live and count all things but loss for the truth are, by a most heavenly attraction, drawn as into their proper element; THE KING of whom Jesus is, fetching them in and ruling them by His captivating power over their hearts. Pilate saith unto Him, What is truth?—q. d. 'Thou stirrest the question of questions, which the thoughtful of every age have asked, but never man yet answered.' And when he had said this—as if, by putting such a question, he was getting into interminable and unseasonable inquiries, when this business demanded rather prompt action. he went again unto the Jews—thus missing a noble opportunity for himself, and giving utterance to that consciousness of the want of all intellectual and moral certainty, which was the feeling of every thoughtful mind at that time. 'The only certainty,' says the elder Pliny, 'is that nothing is certain, nor more miserable than man, nor more proud. The fearful laxity of morals at that time most doubtless be traced in a great degree to this scepticism. The revelation of the eternal truth alone* was able to breathe new life into ruined human nature, and that in the apprehension of complete redemption.' [OLSHAUSEN.] and saith unto them—in the hearing of our Lord, who had been brought forth—I find no fault in him—no crime. This so exasperated "the chief priests and elders" that, afraid of losing their prey, they poured forth a volley of charges against him, as appears from Luke, 23. 4, 5: on Pilate's affirming his innocence, "they were the more fierce, saying, He stirreth up the people, teaching throughout all Jewry, beginning from Galilee to this place." They see no hope of getting Pilate's sanction to His death unless they can fasten upon Him a charge of conspiracy against the government; and as Galilee was noted for its turbulence, (Luke, 13. 1; Acts, 5. 37.) and our Lord's ministry lay chiefly there, they artfully introduce it to give colour to their charge. "And the chief priests accused him of many things, but he answered nothing (Mark, 15. 3.). Then said Pilate unto him, Hearest thou not how many things they witness against thee? And he answered him to never a word, inasmuch that the governor marvelled greatly" (Matthew, 27. 13, 14). See on Mark, 15. 3-5. In his perplexity, Pilate, hearing of Galilee, be-thinks himself of the expedient of sending Him to Herod, in the hope of thereby farther shaking off responsibility in the case. See on Mark, 15. 6; and on Luke, 23. 6-12. The return of the prisoner only deepened the perplexity of Pilate, who, "calling together the chief priests, rulers, and people," tells them plainly that not one of their charges against "this man" had been made good, while even Herod, to whose jurisdiction he more naturally belonged, had done nothing to him; He "will therefore chastise and release him" (Luke, 23. 13-16.). But ye have a custom that I should release one unto you at the passover, &c.—See on Mark, 15. 7-11. "On the typical import of the choice of Christ to suffer, by which Barabbas was set free, see Leviticus, 16, particularly v. 5-10, where the subject is the sin offering on the great day of atonement."—[KRAFFT in LUTHARDT.]

CHAPTER XIX.

VER. 1-16. JESUS BEFORE PILATE—SCOURGED—TREATED WITH OTHER SEVERITIES AND INSULTS—DELIVERED UP, AND LED AWAY TO BE CRUCIFIED. 1-3. Pilate took Jesus and scourged him—in hope of appeasing them. See on Mark, 15. 15. "And the soldiers led him away into the palace, and they call the whole band" (Mark, 15. 16)—the body of the military cohort stationed there, to take part in the mock coronation now to be enacted, the soldiers platted a crown of thorns, and put it on his head—in mockery of a regal crown, and they put on him a purple robe—in mockery of the imperial purple; first "stripping him" (Matthew, 27. 28.) of His own outer garment. The robe may have been the "gorgeous" one in which Herod arrayed and sent Him back to Pilate (Luke, 23. 11.). "And they put a reed into his right hand" (Matthew, 27. 29.)—in mockery of the regal sceptre. "And they bowed the knee before him" (Matthew, 27. 29.) and said, Hail, King of the Jews!—doing Him derisive homage, in the form used on approaching the emperors. "And they spit upon him, and took the reed and smote him on the head" (Matthew, 27. 30.). The best comment on these affecting details is to cover the face. 4, 5. Pilate went forth again, and saith, Behold I bring 'am bringing,' i. e., going to bring him forth to you, that ye may know I find no fault in him—and, by scourging him and allowing the soldiers to make sport of him, have gone as far to meet your exasperation as can be expected from a judge. Jesus therefore came forth, wearing the crown of thorns, and the purple robe. And Pilate saith unto them, Behold the man!—There is no reason to think that contempt dictated this speech. There was clearly a struggle in the breast of this wretched man. Not only was he reluctant to surrender to mere clamour an innocent man, but a feeling of anxiety about His mysterious claims, as is plain from what follows, was beginning to rack his breast, and the object of his exclamation seems to have been to move their pity. But, be his meaning what it may, those three words have been eagerly appropriated by all Christendom, and enshrined for ever in its heart, as a sublime expression of its calm, rapt admiration of its suffering Lord. 6, 7. When the chief priests saw him, they cried out—their fiendish rage kindling afresh at the sight of Him. crucify him, crucify him—See on Mark, 15. 14. Pilate saith unto them, Take ye him, and crucify him: for I find no fault in him—as if this would relieve him of the responsibility of the deed, who, by surrendering Him, incurred it all! The Jews answered him, We have a law, and by our law he ought to die, because he made himself the Son of God—Their criminal charges having come to nothing, they give up that point, and as Pilate was throwing the whole responsibility upon them, they retreat into their own Jewish law, by which, as claiming equality with God, (see on ch. 5, 18, and 8, 29.), He ought to die; insinuating that it was Pilate's duty, even as civil governor, to protect their law from such insult. 8-11. When Pilate heard this saying, he was the more afraid—the name "Son of God," the lofty sense evidently attached to it by His Jewish accusers, the dialo-ue he had already held with Him, and the dream of his wife (Matthew, 27, 19.), all working together in the breast of the wretched man, and went again into the judgment hall, and saith to Jesus, Whence art thou?—beyond all doubt a question relating not to His mission but to His personal origin. Jesus gave him no answer—He had said enough; the time for answering such a question was past; the weak and wavering governor is already on the point of giving way. Then saith Pilate unto him, Speakest thou not to me?—The "me" is the emphatic word in the question. He fall-back upon the pride of office, which doubtless tended to hunt the workings of his conscience. knowest thou not that I have power to crucify thee, and have power to release thee!—said to work upon him at once by fear and by hope. Thou couldst rather 'shouldest' have no power at all against me—neither to crucify, nor to release, nor to do any thing whatever against me, (BENJAMIN) except it were 'unless it had been' given thee from above—q.d. Thou thinkest too much of thy power. Pilate: against Me that power is none, save what is v.oted out to thee by special divine appointment, for a special end. Therefore he that delivered me unto thee (Capharnas, to wit—but he only as representing the Jewish authorities as a body hath the greater sin—as having better opportunities and more knowledge of such matters. 12-16. And from henceforth—particularly this speech, which seems to have filled him with awe, and redoubled his anxiety. Pilate sought to release him—i.e., to gain their consent to it, for he could have done it at once on his own authority. but the Jews cried—seeing their advantage, and not slow to profit by it. If thou let this man go, thou art not Cesar's friend, &c. This was equivalent to a threat of impeachment, which we know was much dreaded by such officers as the procurators, especially of the character of Pilate or Felix. It also consummates the treachery and disgrace of the Jewish rulers, who were willing, for the purpose of destroying Jesus, to affect a zeal for the supremacy of a foreign prince.' See c. 15, (WENSTER & WILKINSON.) When Pilate heard that, he brought Jesus forth, and sat down in 'upon' the judgment-seat—that he might pronounce sentence against the Prisoner, on this charge, the more solemnly—in a place called the pavement, a tessellated pavement, much used by the Romans, in the Hebrew, Gabbatha—from its being raised. It was the preparation—i.e., the day before the Jewish Sabbath, and about the sixth hour. The true reading here is probably, 'the third hour'—or 9 A.M.—which agrees best with the whole series of events, as well as with the other evangelists. He saith to the Jews, Behold your King!—Having now made up his mind to yield to them, he takes a sort of quiet revenge on them by this irony, which he knew would sting them. This only re-awakens their cry to despatch him. Crucify your king! We have no king but Cesar. 'Some of those who thus cried died miserably in rebellion against Cesar forty years afterwards. But it suited their present purpose.' (ALFORD.) Then delivered he him therefore unto them to be crucified, &c.—See on Mark, 15, 15.

17-30. CRUCIFIXION AND DEATH OF THE LORD JESUS. 17. And he bearing his cross—See on Luke, 23, 26. went forth—cf. Hebrews, 12, 11-13, "without the camp," "without the gate." On arriving at the place, "they gave him vinegar to drink mingled with gall [wine mingled with myrrh, Mark, 15, 23.], and when he had tasted thereof, he would not drink," Matthew, 27, 34. This potion was stupefying, and given to criminals just before execution, to deaden the sense of pain.

"Fill him the bowl, and spice it well, and pour The dew oblivious for the Cross is sharp, The Cross is sharp, and He Is tenderer than a lamb."—[Kidd.]

But our Lord would die with every faculty clear, and in full sensibility to all His sufferings.

Thou wilt feel all, that Thou may'st pity all;
And rather would'st Thou wrestle with strong pain, Than overlook Thy soul,
So clear in agony,

Or lose one glimpse of Heaven before the time, O most entire and perfect sacrifice, Renewed in every pulse, &c.—[Kidd.]

18. They crucified him, and two others with him—"malefactors" (Luke, 23, 33.), "thieves" (rather 'robbers, Matthew, 27, 38; Mark, 15, 27.). On either side one and Jesus in the midst—a hellish expedient, to hold Him up as the worst of the three. But in this, as in many other of his doings, "the Scripture was fulfilled, which saith (Isaiah, 53, 12, And he was numbered with the transgressors"—Mark, 15, 28.)—though the prediction reaches deeper. "Then said Jesus—"probably while being nailed to the Cross" (OSHAUGHNESS), FATHER, FORGIVE THEM, FOR THEY KNOW NOT WHAT THEY DO" (Luke, 23, 34.—and again the Scripture was fulfilled which said, "And he made intercession for the transgressors" (Isaiah, 53, 12.), though this also reaches deeper. See Acts, 7, 17, 13, 27; and cf. 1 Timothy, 1, 16. Often have we occasion to observe how our Lord is the first to fulfil His own precepts—thus furnishing the right interpretation and the perfect Model of them. See on Matthew, 5, 44.) How quickly was it seen in "His martyr Stephen," that though He had left the earth in Person, His Spirit remained behind, and Himself could, in some of His brightest lineaments, be reproduced in His disciples! (Acts, 7, 60.) And what does the world in every age owe to these few words, spoken where and as they were spoken! 19-22. Pilate wrote a title, and put it on the cross, Jesus of Nazareth, the King of the Jews. . . and it was written in Hebrew, or Syro-Chaldaic, the language of the country; and Greek, the current language; and Latin, the official language. These were the chief languages of the earth, and this secured that all spectators should be able to read it. Stung by this, the Jewish ecclesiastics entreat that it may be so altered as to express, not His royal dignity, but His false claim to it. But Pilate thought he had yielded quite enough to them; and having intended expressly to spite and insult them by this title, for having set him so act against his own sense of justice, he peremptorily refused them. And thus, amidst the conflicting passions of men, was proclaimed, in the chief tongues of mankind, from the Cross itself and in circumstances which threw upon it a lurid yet grand light, the truth which drew the Magi to His manger, and will yet be owned by all the world! 23, 24. then the soldiers, when they

Jesus, took his garments, and made four soldiers—of the four who nailed Him to whose perquisites they were, a part, coat—the Roman tunic, or close-fitting tunic, woven from the top throughout—of fine, considerable skill and labour as to reduce such a garment, the work probab- of the women who ministered in to him, Luke, 8. 3. [WENSTER & WIL- us not read it, but cast lots whose it shall capture might be fulfilled which saith, They sent among them; and for my vesture they etc.—Psalm 22. 18. That a prediction so specific—distinguishing one piece of dress and announcing that while those should cast several, that should be given by lot—such a prediction should not only the letter, but by a party of heathen out interference from either the friends of the Crucified One, is surely worthy among the wonders of this all-wonderful come the moderies, and from four differ- 1. "Thou that destroy- and buldest it in three days, save thy down from the cross," Matthew, 27. 30, 29, 20. "It is evident that our Lord's say- this perversion of it (for He claimed not to rebuild the temple destroyed by them) casperated the feeling which the priests had contrived to excite against Him. And it is ble that now, while it was receiving its, it should be made more public and ive by the insulting proclamation of His ace the importance attached to it after on, ch. 2. 22. [WENSTER & WILKINSON.] also the chief priests mocking him, with elders, said, He saved others, himself he There was a deep truth in this, as in for both He could not do, having "come fe a ransom for many." No doubt this own sting to the reproach. "If he be srael, let him now come down from the will believe him." No, they would not; for isted the evidence from the resurrection ad from His own resurrection, were beh of any amount of merely external evis- trasted in God that he would deliver him; er him now if he will have him (or "de- "cf. Psalm 18. 19; Deuteronomy, 21. 14.); am the Son of God," Matthew, 27. 41-43. u. O ye chief priests, scribes, and elders, testimony, unconsciously borne by you. first to His habitual trust in God, as a character so marked and palpable that d upon it your impotent taunt; next, to with the Sufferer of the 22nd Psalm, whose (cf. 8.) ye unwittingly appropriate, thus slets heirs to the dark office and impo- ty of Messiah's enemies; and again, to se of that august title which He took to EESON or God," which he rightly inter- vey first, (see on ch. 8. 18.), as a claim to y nature with Him, and dearness to Him, has to his father, 3.) "And the soldiers him, coming to him and offering him saying, If thou be the king of the Jews, Luke, 23. 36, 37. They insultingly offer Him their own vinegar, or sour wine, the f Roman soldiers, it being about the time of their midday meal. In the taunt of the soldiers we have one of those undesigned coincidences which so strikingly verify these historical records. While the ecclesiastics deride Him for calling Himself "the Christ, the King of Israel, the Chosen, the Son of God," the soldiers, to whom all such phraseology was mere Jewish jargon, make sport of Him as a pretender to royalty ("KING of the Jews"), an office and dignity which it belonged to them to comprehend. "The thieves also, which were crucified with him, cast the same in his teeth," Matthew, 27. 44; Mark, 15. 32. Not both of them, however, as some commentators unnaturally think we must understand these words; as if some sudden change came over the penitent one, which turned him from an unfeeling rader into a trembling petitioner. The plural "thieves" need not denote more than the quarter or class whence came this last and cruellest taunt—q. d. "Not only did scoffs proceed from the passers by, the ecclesiastics, the soldiery, but even from His fellow-sufferers," a mode of speaking which no one would think necessarily meant both of them. Cf. Mat- thew, 2. 20, "They are dead which sought the child's life," meaning Herod; and Mark, 9. 1, "There be some standing here," where it is next to certain that only John, the youngest and last survivor of the apostles, is meant. And is it conceivable that this penitent thief should have first himself reviled the Saviour, and then, on his views of Christ suddenly changing, he should have turned upon his fellow-sufferer and fellow-reviler, and rebuked him not only with dignified sharpness, but in the language of astonishment that he should be capable of such conduct? Besides, there is a deep calmness in all that he utters, extremely unlike what we should expect from one who was the subject of a mental revolution so sudden and total. On the scene itself, see on Luke, 23. 29-43. 25-27. Now there stood by the cross of Jesus his mother, and his mother's sister, Mary, wife of Cleophas.—This should be read, as in marg. "Clopas," the same as "Alphens," Matthew, 10. 3. The "Cleopas" of Luke, 24. 18, was a different person. When Jesus saw his mother, and the disciple whom he loved, standing by, he said to his mother, WOMAN, BEHOLD THY SON! Then saith he to the disciple, BEHOLD THY MOTHER!—What forgetfulness of self, what filial love, and to the "mother" and "son" what parting words! from that hour . . . took her to his own home—or, home with him; for his father Zebedee and his mother Salome were both alive, and the latter here present—Mark, 15. 40. See on Matthew, 13. 55. Now occurred the supernatural darkness, recorded by all the other evangelists, but not here. "Now from the 6th hour (12 noon) there was darkness over all the land unto the 9th hour," Matthew, 27. 45. No ordinary eclipse of the sun could have occurred at this time, it being then full moon, and this obscuration lasted about twelve times the length of any ordinary eclipse. cf. Exodus, 10. 21-23. Beyond doubt, the divine intention of the portent was to invest this darkest of all tragedies with a gloom expressive of its real character. "And about the ninth hour Jesus cried, ELI, ELI, LAMA SABACHTHANI . . . My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" Matthew, 27. 46. As the darkness commenced at the 6th hour, the second of the Jewish hours of prayer, so it continued till the 9th hour, the hour of the evening sacrifice, increasing probably in depth, and reaching its deepest gloom at the moment of this mysterious cry, when the flame of the one great "Evening Sacrifice" was burning fiercest. The words were made to His hand. They are the opening words of a Psalm the 22nd full of the last "sufferings of Christ and the following glories" (1 Peter, 1. 11.). "FATHER," was the cry in the first prayer which He uttered on the cross, for matters had not then come to their worst: "Father" was the cry of His last prayer, for matters had then passed their worst. Wax at: this crisis of His sufferings, "Father" does not issue from his lips, for the light of a martyr's countenance was then mysteriously eclipsed. He falls back, however, on a title expressive of His official relation which, though lower and more distant in itself, yet when grasped in pure and naked faith was its mighty in its claims, and rich in psalmic associations. And what deep earnestness is conveyed by the redoubling of this title. But as for the cry itself, it will never be fully comprehended. An absolute desolation is not indeed to be thought of; but a total eclipse of the veil sense of God's presence it certainly expresses. It expresses surprise, as under the experience of something not only never before known but inexplicable on the footing which had till then subsisted between Him and God. It is a question which the lost cannot utter. They are forsaken, but they know why. Jesus is forsaken, but does not know and demands to know why. It is thus the cry of conscious innocence, but of innocence unavailing to draw down, at that moment, the least token of approval from the unseen Judge—innocence whose only recognition at that moment lay in the thick surrounding gloom which but reflected the horror of great darkness that invested his own spirit. There was indeed a cause for it, and He knew it too—the "why" must not be pressed so far as to exclude this. He must taste this bitterest of the wages of sin—"Who did no sin." But that is not the point now in Him there was no cause at all (ch. 14, 30), and He takes refuge in the glorious fact. When no ray from above shines in upon Him, He strikes a light out of His own breast. If God will not own Him, He shall own Himself. On the rock of His unswerving allegiance to Heaven He will stand, till the light of Heaven return to His spirit. And it is near to come. Whilst He is yet speaking, the fierceness of the flame is beginning to abate. One incident and insult more, and the experience of one other predicted element of suffering, and the victory is His. The incident, and the insult springing out of it, is the misunderstanding of the cry, for we can hardly suppose that it was any thing else. "Some of them that stood there, when they heard that, said, This man calleth for Elias," Matthew, 27, 47. 28-30. After this, Jesus knowing that all things were now accomplished—i.e., the moment for the fulfilment of the last of them; for there was one other small particular, and the time was come for that too, in consequence of the burning thirst which the fevered state of His frame occasioned (Psalm 22, 16), that the Scripture (Psalm 69, 21), might be fulfilled, saith, I thirst—Now there was set a vessel full of vinegar (see on the offer of the soldiers' vinegar, above); and they—"one of them," Matthew, 27, 48—filled a sponge with vinegar, and put it upon [a stalk of] hyssop, and put it to his mouth—Though a stalk of this plant does not exceed eighteen inches in length, it would suffice, as the feet of crucified persons were not raised higher. "The rest said, Let be"—i.e., as would seem, "Stop that officious service"—"let us see whether Elias will come to save him," Matthew, 27, 49. This was the last cruelty He was to suffer, but it was one of the most unfeeling. "And when Jesus had cried with a loud voice," Luke, 23, 46. This "loud voice," noticed by three of the Evangelists, does not imply, as some able interpreters contend, that our Lord's strength was so far from being exhausted, that He needed not to die then, and surrendered up His life sooner than nature required, merely because it was the appointed time. It was indeed the appointed time, but time that He should be crucified through weakness" (2 Corinthians, 13, 4.), and nature was now reaching its utmost exhaustion. But just as even His own dying stains, particularly the martyr's of Jesus, have sometimes had such gleams of coming glory immediately before breathing their last, as to impart to them a strength to utter their feelings which has amazed the bystanders, so this mighty voice of the expiring Redeemer was nothing else but the exultant spirit of the Dying Victor, perceiving the fruit of His travail just about to be embraced, and nerving the organs of utterance to an ecstatic expression of its sublime feelings (not so much in the immediately following words of tranquil surrender, in Luke, as in the fiat about, recorded only by John: "FATHER, INTO THY HANDS I COMMIT MY SPIRIT!" Luke, 23, 46. Yes, the darkness is past, and the true light now shineth. His soul has emerged from its mysterious horrors; "My God" is heard no more, but in unclouded light He yields sublime into His Father's hands the infinitely precious spirit—using here also the words of those matchless Psalms (21, 8.) which were ever on his lips. "As the Father receives the spirit of Jesus, so Jesus receives those of the faithful," Acts, 7, 55. [BANGEL.] And now comes the exclaiming mighty shout, "IT IS FINISHED!" and He bowed His head and gave up the ghost!" v. 30. What is finished? The Law is fulfilled as never before, nor since, in His "obedience unto death, even the death of the cross; Messianic prophecy is accomplished; Redemption is completed: "He hath finished the transgression, and made an end of sin, and made reconciliation for iniquity, and brought in everlasting righteousness, and sealed up the vision and prophecy, and anointed a holy of holies." He has inaugurated the kingdom of God and given birth to a new world.

31-42. BURIAL OF CHRIST. 31-37. The preparation—Sabbath eve, that the bodies should not remain over night, against the Mosaic law. Deuteronomy, 21, 22, 23. on the Sabbath-day, for that day was an high (or great) day—the first day of unleavened bread, and as concurring with an ordinary Sabbath, the most solemn season of the ecclesiastical year. Hence their peculiar jealousy lest the law should be infringed, brought forth that their legs might be broken—to hasten their death, which was done in such cases with clubs. But when they came to Jesus, and saw that he was dead already—there being in His case elements of suffering unknown to the malefactors, which might naturally hasten His death, lingering though it always was in such cases, not to speak of His previous sufferings, they brake not his legs—a fact—of vast importance, as showing that the reality of His death was visible to those whose business it was to see to it. The other divine purpose served by it will appear presently. But one of the soldiers—to make assurance of the fact doubly sure, with a spear pierced his side—making a wound deep and wide, as indeed is plain from ch. 20, 37, 39. Had His still remained, it must have fled now, and forthwith came thereout blood and water—It is now well known that the effect of long-continued and intense agony frequently to produce a secretion of a colourless lymph within the pericardium the membrane enveloping the heart), amounting in many cases to a very considerable quantity. (WEBSTER & WILKINSON.) And he that saw it bare record ("hath borne witness"), and his witness is true, and he knoweth that he saith true, that you might believe—This solemn way of referring to his own testimony in this matter has no reference to what he says in his Epistle about Christ's "coming by water and blood," (see on 1 John, 5, 6.) but is intended to call attention both to the fulfilment of Scripture in these particulars, and to the undeniable evidence he was thus furnishing of the reality of Christ's death, and consequently of His resurrection; perhaps also to meet the growing tendency, in the Asiatic churches, to deny the reality of our Lord's body, or that "Jesus Christ is come in the flesh." (1 John, 4, 1-3.) that the Scripture should be fulfilled, a bone of him shall not be broken—The reference is to the paschal lamb, as to which this ordinance was stringent, Exodus, 12, 10; Numbers, 9, 12. (cf. 1 Corinthians, 5, 7.)—But though we are to see here the fulfilment of a very definite typical ordinance, we shall, on searching deeper, see in the remarkable divine interposition to protect the sancti-

Christ from the least indignity after He had work given Him to do. Every imaginable nities two most blessed objects were thus secured: (1.) The reality of our Lord's death was attested by the party of all others most competent to decide on it, and certainly free from all bias—the officer in attendance—in full reliance on whose testimony Pilate surrendered the body; (2.) The dead Redeemer, thus delivered out of the hands of His enemies and committed by the supreme political authority to the care of His friends, was thereby protected from all further indignities; a thing most befitting indeed, now that His work was done, but impossible, so far as we can see, if His enemies had been at liberty to do with Him as they pleased. How wonderful are even the minutest features of this matchless History! also Nicodemus (which at the first came to Jesus by night)—"This remark corresponds to the secrecy of Joseph's discipleship, just noticed, and calls attention to the similarity of their previous character and conduct, and the remarkable change which had now taken place." [WILKINSON & WILKINSON.] brought myrrh and aloes, about an hundred pounds weight—an immense quantity, betokening the greatness of their love, but part of it probably intended as a layer for the spot on which the body was to lie. (See 2Chronicles, 16, 14.) [MEYER.] then took they the body of Jesus, and wound it in linen clothes with the spices, as the manner of the Jews is to bury—the mixed and pulverised myrrh and aloes shaken into the folds, and the entire body, thus swathed, wrapt in an outer covering of "clean linen cloth." (Matthew, 27, 58.) Had the Lord's own friends had the least reason to think that the spark of life was still in Him, would they have done this? But even if one could conceive them mistaken, could any one have lain thus enveloped for the period during which He was in the grave, and life still remained? Impossible. When, therefore, He walked forth from the tomb, we can say with the most absolute certainty, "Now is Christ risen from the dead, and become the first-fruits of them that slept!" (1 Corinthians, 15, 20.) No wonder that the learned and the barbarians alike were prepared to die for the name of the Lord Jesus; for such evidence was to the unsophisticated resistless. (No mention is made of anointing in this operation. No doubt it was a hurried proceeding, for fear of interruption, and because it was close on the Sabbath, the women seem to have set this as their proper task "as soon as the Sabbath should be past" (Mark, 16, 1.) But as the Lord graciously held it as undesignated anticipated by Mary at Bethany (Mark, 14, 8.), so this was probably all the anointing, in the strict sense of it, which He received.

 41, 42. Now in the place where he was crucified there was a garden, and in the garden a new sepulchre.—The choice of this tomb was, on their part, dictated by the double circumstance that it was so near at hand, and by its belonging to a friend of the Lord; and as there was need of haste, even they would be struck with the providence which thus supplied it. "There laid they Jesus therefore, because of the Jews' preparation day, for the sepulchre was nigh at hand." But there was one recommendation of it which probably would not strike them; but God had it in view. Not its being "hewn out of a rock" (Mark, 15, 46.), accessible only at the entrance, which doubtless would impress them with its secrecy and suitableness. But it was "a new sepulchre" (v. 41), "wherein never man before was laid" (Luke, 23, 53); and Matthew (27, 60.), says that Joseph laid Him "in his own new tomb, which he had hewn out in the rock" —doubtless for his own use, though the Lord had higher use for it. Thus as He rode into Jerusalem on an ass, "whereon never man before had sat," so now He shall lie in a tomb wherein never man before had lain, that from these specimens it may be seen that in all things He was "SEPARATE FROM SINNERS."

CHAPTER XX.

Ver. 1-18. MARY'S VISIT TO THE SEPULCHRE, AND RETURN TO IT WITH PETER AND JOHN—HER RINGS

He stoops, he lingers, but enters not the open sepulchre, he looks probably by a reverential fear. The bold Peter, on the other side, in at once, and is rewarded with a bright vision of what had expected. He sees the linen clothes in "laying" and the napkin, that was about his head, not lying with the linen clothes—loosely, as if hastily thrown down, and indicative of a hurried and disorderly removal, but wrapped (or 'folded') together in a place by itself—showing with what grand tranquillity "the Living One" had walked forth from "the dead" (Luke, 24, 6). "Doubtless the two attendant angels (s. 12, did this service for the Rising One, the one disposing of the linen clothes, the other of the napkin." [BENNETT.] Then went in that other disciple which came first to the sepulchre—the repetition of this, in connection with his not having gone in till after Peter, seems to show that at the moment of penning these words the advantage which each of these loving disciples had of the other was present to his mind, and he does not say, that he believed in his Lord's resurrection more immediately and certainly than Peter. For as yet they knew (i. e., understood: not the Scripture that he must rise again from the dead, &c. — In other words, they believed in His resurrection at first, not because they were prepared by Scripture to expect it; but fact carried resistless conviction of it in the first instance to their minds, and furnished a key to the Scripture predictions of it. 11-15. But Mary stood without at the sepulchre weeping, &c.—Brief was the stay of those two men. But Mary, arriving perhaps by another direction after they left, lingers at the spot, weeping for her missing Lord. As she gazes through her tears on the open tomb, she also ventures to stoop down and look into it, when lo! "two angels in white" (as from the world of light, and see on Matthew, 28, 3), appear to her, in a "sitting" posture, 'as having finished some business, and awaiting some one to impart tidings to.' [BENNETT.] one at the head, and the other at the feet where the body of Jesus had lain—not merely proclaiming silently the entire change they had had of the body of Christ (quoted in LUTHER, 1), but rather, possibly, calling mute attention to the narrow space within which the Lord of glory had contracted Himself; as if they would say, O-mne, see within what limits, marked off by the interval here between the two the

CHAPTER XXI.

Vol. 123. SUPPLEMENTARY PARTICULARS. [That this chapter was added by another hand has been asserted, against clear evidence to the contrary, by some late critics, chiefly because the evangelist had concluded his part of the work with ch. 20. 30, 31. But neither in the Epistles of the New Testament, nor in other good authors, is it unusual to insert supplementary matter, and so have more than one conclusion.] 1, 2. Jesus showed ('manifested') himself again, and on this wise he manifested himself—This way of speaking shows that after His resurrection He appeared to them but occasionally, unexpectedly, and in a way quite unearthly, though yet really and corporally. Nathanael—See on Matthew, 10. 3. 3-6. Peter saith unto them, I go a fishing—See on Luke, 5. 11. that night caught nothing—as at the first miraculous draught (see on Luke, 5. 5.); no doubt so ordered that the miracle might strike them the more by contrast. The same principle is seen in operation throughout much of Christ's ministry, and is indeed a great law of God's spiritual procedure with His people. Jesus stood—cf. ch. 20. 19, 20. but the disciples knew not it was Jesus—Perhaps there had been some considerable interval since the last manifestation, and having agreed to betake themselves to their secular employment, they would be unprepared to expect Him. Children—This term would not necessarily identify Him, being not unusual from any superior; but when they did recognize Him, they would feel it sweetly like Himself. have ye any meat—'provisions,' 'supplies'; meaning fish. they answered, No—This was in His wonted style, making them tell their case, and so the better prepare them for what was coming. he said unto them, Cast the net on the right side of the ship—no doubt, by this very specific direction, intending to reveal to them His knowledge of the deep and power over it. 7-11. that disciple whom Jesus loved, said, It is the Lord—again having the advantage of his brother in the former miraculous draught, Luke, 5, 1-11, furnishes the key to this scene. There the draught was symbolical of the success of their future ministry: While "Peter and all that were with him were astonished at the draught of the fishes which they had taken, Jesus said unto him, Fear not, from henceforth thou shalt catch men." Nay, when first called, in the act of "casting their net into the sea, for they were fishers," the same symbolic reference was made to their secular occupation: "Follow me, and I will make you fishers of men." (Matthew, 4, 18, 19.) Here, then, if but the same symbolic reference be kept in view, the design of the whole scene will, we think, be clear. The multitude and the size of the fishes they caught symbolically foreshadowed the vast success of their now fast approaching ministry, and this only as a beginning of successive draughts, through the agency of a Christian ministry, till, "as the waters cover the sea, the earth should be full of the knowledge of the Lord." And whereas, at the first miraculous draught, the net "was breaking" through the weight of what it contained—expressive of the difficulty with which, after they had "caught men," they would be able to retain, or keep them from escaping back into the world—while here, "for all they were so many, yet was not the net broken," are we not reminded of such sayings as these (chan. 10, 28.); "I give unto my sheep eternal life, and they shall never perish, neither shall any pluck them out of my hand?" [LUTHARDT.] But it is not through the agency of a Christian ministry that all true disciples are gathered. Jesus Himself, by unseen methods, gathers some, who afterwards are recognised by the constituted fishers of men, and mingle with the fruit of their labours. And are not these symbolized by that portion of our Galilean repast which the fishers found, in some unseen way, made ready to their hand? 12-14. Now dost ask him, Who art thou, knowing it was the Lord—[implying that they would have liked Him just to say, "It is I:" but having such convincing evidence, they were afraid of being "upbraided for their unbelief and hardness of heart" if they ventured to put the question. Jesus taketh [the] bread, and giveth them, and [the] fish likewise—See on Luke, 24, 30. This is the third time that Jesus showed himself ("was manifested") to his disciples—his assembled disciples; for if we reckon His appearances to individual disciples, they were more. 15-17. When they had dined Jesus saith—Silence appears to have reigned during the meal; unbroken on His part, that by their mute observation of Him they might have their assurance of His identity the more confirmed; and on theirs, from reverential shrinking to speak till He did. Simon, son of Jonas, lovest thou me more than these?—referring lovingly to those sad words of Peter, shortly before denying his Lord. "Though all men shall be offended because of thee, yet will I never be offended" (Matthew, 26, 33.), and intending by this allusion to bring the whole scene vividly before his mind and put him to shame. Yes, Lord; thou knowest that I love thee—He adds not, "more than these," but prefixes a touching appeal to the Saviour's own omniscience for the truth of his protestation, which makes it a totally different kind of speech from his former. He saith unto him, Feed my lambs—It is surely wrong to view this term as a mere diminutive of affection, and as meaning the same thing as "the sheep." [WENSTER & WILKINSON.] It is much more according to usage to understand by the "lambs" young and tender disciples, whether in age or Christian standing [Isaiah, 40, 11; 1 John, 2, 12, 13,] and by the "sheep" the more mature. Shall we say [with many] that Peter was here reinstated in office? Not exactly, since he was not actually excluded from it. But after such conduct as his, the deep wound which the honour of Christ had received, the stain brought on his office, the damage done to his high standing among his brethren, and even his own comfort, in prospect of the great work before him, required some such renewal of his call and re-establishment of his position as this. He saith to him the second time... lovest thou me, &c.—In this repetition of the question, though the wound was meant to be re-opened, the words, "more than these" are not repeated; for Christ is a tender as well as skilful Physician, and Peter's silence on that point was confession enough of his sin and folly. On Peter's repeating his protestation in the same words, our Lord rises higher in the manifestation of His restoring grace. Feed (or 'keep' my sheep—It has been observed that the word here is studiously changed, from one signifying simply to feed, to one signifying to 'tend' as a shepherd, denoting the abiding exercise of that vocation, and in its highest functions. He saith unto him the third time, Simon, son of Jonas, lovest thou me. Peter was grieved because he said the third time, &c.—This was the Physician's deepest incision into the wound, while yet smarting under the two former probrings. Not till now would Peter discern the object of this succession of thrusts. The third time reveals it all, bringing up such a rush of dreadful recollections before his view, of his "thrice denying that he knew Him," that he feels it to the quick. It was fitting that he should; it was meant that he should. But this accomplished, the painful dialogue concludes with a delightful "Feed my sheep," as if He should say, "Now, Simon, the last speck of the cloud which overhung thee since that night of nights is dispelled: Henceforth thou art to me and to my work as if no such scene had ever happened. 18, 19, when thou wast young—embracing the whole period of life to the verge of old age. thou girdest thyself, and walkedst whether thou wouldst—was thine own master. when old, thou shalt stretch forth thine hands—to be bound for execution, though not necessarily meaning on a cross. There is no reason, however, to doubt the very early tradition, that Peter's death was by crucifixion. This spake he, signifying by what death he should glorify God—not, therefore, a mere prediction of the manner of his death, but of the honour to be conferred upon him by dying for his Master. And, indeed, beyond doubt, this prediction was intended to follow up his triple restoration:—'Yes, Simon, thou shalt not only feed my lambs, and feed my sheep, but after a long career of such service, shall be counted worthy to die for the name of the Lord Jesus.' And when he had spoken this, he saith unto him, Follow me—By thus connecting the utterance of this prediction with the invitation to follow Him, the evangelist would indicate the deeper sense in which the call was understood, not merely to go along with Him at that moment, but to come after Him taking up his cross." 20, 21. Peter, turning about—showing that he followed immediately as directed, such the disciple whom Jesus loved following; which also leaned on Jesus' breast at [the] supper, and said, Lord, which is he that betrayeth thee?—The evangelist makes these allusions to the peculiar familiarity to which he had been admitted on the most memorable of all occasions, perhaps lovingly to account for Peter's somewhat forward question about him to Jesus; which is the rather probable, as it was at Peter's suggestion that he put the question about the traitor which he here recalls ch. 13, 24, 25.) Peter saith to Jesus, Lord, and what [shall] this man [do]?—What of this man? or, How shall it fare with him? 22, 23. Jesus saith to him, If I will that he tarry till I come, what is that to thee? I follow thou me—From the fact that John alone of the twelve survived the destruction of Jerusalem, and so witnessed the commencement of that series of events which belongs to "the last days," many good interpreters think that this is a virtual prediction of fact, and not a mere supposition. But this is very doubtful, and it seems more natural to consider our Lord as intending to give no positive indication of John's fate not to signify that this was a matter which belonged to the Master of both, who would disclose or reveal as He thought proper, and that Peter's part was his own affairs. Accordingly, in "follow," the word "thou" is emphatic. Observe the disposal of human life which Christ claims: "that he tarry till I come, &c. Then went this thread among the brethren, that that disciple die—into which they the more easily fell, a prevalent expectation that Christ's second was then near at hand, yet Jesus said not unto shall not die—The evangelist is jealous for His honour, which his death might be thought to raise if such a misunderstanding should not check.

FINAL CLOSE OF THIS GOSPEL. This is the which testifieth of these things, and wrote these things—thus identifying the author of this book with all that it says of this disciple. we know that his testimony is true—cf. ch. 19. 35. And there are many other things which Jesus did—cf. ch. 20. 30, 31. If written every one, I suppose—an expression used to show that what follows is not to be pressed too far. even the world itself would not hold the books, &c.—not a mere hyperbolical expression, unlike the sublime simplicity of this writer, but intended to let his reader know that, even now that he had done, he felt his materials so far from being exhausted, that he was still running over, and could multiply "Gospels" to almost any extent within the strict limits of what "Jesus did." But in the limitation of these matchless Histories, in point of number, there is as much of that divine wisdom which has presided over and pervades the living oracles, as in their variety and fulness.

THE ACTS OF THE APOSTLES.

CHAPTER I.

11. INTRODUCTION—LAST DAYS OF OUR LORD ASCEND—HIS ASCENSION. 1, 2. former treatise—Gospel. Theophilus—see on Luke, 1. 3. began to teach—a very important statement, dividing the work of Christ into two great branches: the one His work on earth, the other His subsequent work in heaven; the one in His own Person, the other Spirit; the one the "beginning," the other the "end" of the same work; the one complete when He sat down on the right hand of the Majesty on high, the other to continue till His second appearing; the one the "beginning" in "The Gospel," the "beginnings" only of the "Acts" in this book of "The Acts." Hence the history of what Jesus did and taught does not end with His departure to the Father; but Luke gives it in a higher strain; for all the subsequent work of the apostles are just an exhibition of the power of the glorified Redeemer Himself, because they acted under His authority, and He was the one who operated in them all. [OLSHAUSEN.] "through the Holy Ghost, had given commandment, referring to the charge recorded in Matthew, 28. Mark, 16. 15-18; Luke, 24. 44-49. It is worthy of that no where else are such communications of a Redeemer said to have been given "through the Holy Ghost." In general, this might have been said of all He uttered and all He did in His official life; for it was for this very end that God "gave the Spirit by measure unto Him" (John, 3. 34.) and His resurrection, as if to signify the new era in which He now stood to the Church, He held His first meeting with the assembled disciples "breathing on them (immediately after) and saying, Receive ye the Holy Spirit," thus anticipating the donation of the Holy Spirit to His hands (see on John, 20. 21, 22.); and on principle His parting charges are here said to have been given "through the Holy Ghost," as if to show that He was now all redolent with the Spirit; that had been husbanded, during His suffering in His own necessary uses, had now been set as already overflowing from Himself to His people, and needed but his ascension and glorification all forth. (See on John, 7. 39.) 3-5. showed alive—As the author is about to tell us that "the vision of the Lord Jesus" was the great burden of his preaching, so the subject is here fitly introduced by an allusion to the primary evidence on which the fact rests, the repeated and undeniable manifestations of Himself in the body to the assembled disciples, who, instead of being predisposed to believe it, had to be overpowered by the resistless evidence of their own senses, and were slow of yielding even to this. (Mark, 16. 14.) after his passion—Or 'Suffering.' This primary sense of the word 'Passion,' has fallen into disuse; but it is nobly consecrated in the phraseology of the Church to express the Redeemer's final endurance, seen of them forty days—This important specification of time occurs here only, speaking of—rather, "speaking" the things pertaining to the kingdom of God—till now only in germ, but soon to take visible form; the earliest and the latest burden of His teaching on earth, should not depart from Jerusalem—Because the Spirit was to glorify the existing economy, by descending on the disciples at its metropolitan seat, and at the next of its great festivals after the ascension of the Church's Head; in order that "out of Zion might go forth the law, and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem" (Isaiah, 2. 3; and cf. Luke, 21. 49.). ye shall be baptized with the Holy Ghost not many days hence—Ten days hence, as appears from Leviticus, 23. 15, 16; but it was expressed thus indefinitely to exercise their faith. 6-8. wilt thou at this time restore the kingdom to Israel?—Doubtless their carnal views of Messiah's kingdom had by this time been modified, though how far it is impossible to say. But, as they plainly looked for some restoration of the kingdom to Israel, so they are neither rebuked nor contradicted on this point. It is not for you to know the times, &c.—implying not only that this was not the time, but that the question was irrelevant to their present business and future work, receive power—See Luke, 24. 49. and ye shall be witnesses unto me . . . in Jerusalem . . . in all Judea, . . . and unto the uttermost part of the earth—This order of apostolic preaching and success supplies the proper key to the plan of the Acts, which relates first the progress of the Gospel "in Jerusalem, and all Judea and Samaria" (ch. 1. to ch. 9.) and then "unto the uttermost part of the earth," (ch. 10. to ch. 28.) 9-11. while they beheld he was taken up—See on Luke, 24. 50-53. Lest it should be thought He had disappeared when they were looking in some other direction, and so was only concluded to have gone up to heaven, it is here expressly said that "while they were looking He was taken up, and a cloud received him out of their sight." So Elijah, "If thou see me when I am taken from thee" (2 Kings, 2. 10.); "And Elisha saw it" (v. 12.). See on Luke, 9. 32. while they looked steadfastly toward heaven—Following Him with their eager eyes, in rapt amazement. Not, however, as a mere fact is this recorded, but as part of that resistless evidence of their senses on which their whole subsequent testimony was to be borne, two men in white apparel—Angels in human form, as Luke, 24. 4. ye men of Galilee, why stand ye gazing up into heaven, &c.—“As if your now glorified Head were gone from you never to return: He is coming again; not another, but this same Jesus:” and “as ye have seen Him go, in the like manner shall He come”—as personally, as visibly, as gloriously; and let the joyful expectation of this coming swallow up the sorrow of that departure.

Ver. 1-13. DESCENT OF THE SPIRIT—THY SPEAK WITH TONGUES—AMAZEMENT OF TITULUS. 1-4. when the day of Pentecost was—The fiftieth from the morrow after the Sabbath Leviticus, 23. 15, 16. with one solemnity of the day, perhaps, unconscious of their expectations. 2. And suddenly there came from heaven, as of a rushing mighty wind, a sound like the sound of many waters, or like the sound of a mighty rushing wind, and it filled the house. 3. And there appeared unto them tongues as of fire, and it rested upon each of them. 4. And they began to speak with one another, as the Spirit gave them utterance. The whole description is so picturesque and so full of solemnity, that it could only come from an eye-witness. (1) The suddenness, strength, and diffusive sound strike with deepest awe the whole church, thus complete their preparation for the Spirit. (2) The wind was a familiar emblem of the Spirit 9: John, 3. 8: 10. 22). But this was not a real wind. It was only a sound “as of” tongues, like as of fire, &c.—“disparted tongues, shaped, flame-like appearances, a common centre or root, and resting upon large company—beautiful visible symboling energy of the Spirit now descending in plenteousness upon the Church, and about to be poured out through every tongue, and over every heart under heaven! 4. they began to speak with one another, as the Spirit gave them utterance, &c.—Real, living languages, as is plain from the following. The thing uttered, probably the inspired words of the Old Testament evangelists, though it is next to certain that the speakers understood nothing of what they uttered (1 Corinthians, 14.). 5-11. there were dwelling in Jerusalem men of other nations—not all

With many other words did he testify and exhort—Thus we have here but a summary of Peter's discourse; though from the next words it would seem that only the more practical parts, the home appeals, are omitted. Save yourselves from this untoward generation—as if Peter already foresaw the hopeless impotence of the nation at large, and would have his hearers hasten in for themselves and secure their own salvation.

41-47. BEAUTIFUL BEGINNINGS OF THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH. 41-47. They that gladly received his word were baptized—It is difficult to say how 3,000 could be baptized in one day, according to the old practice of a complete submersion; and the more as in Jerusalem there was no water at hand except Kidron and a few pools. The difficulty can only be removed by supposing that they already employed sprinkling, or baptized in houses in large vessels. Formal submersion in rivers, or larger quantities of water, probably took place only where the locality conveniently allowed it. [OLSHAUSEN.] the same day there were added to the Church about 3,000 souls—fitting inauguration of the new kingdom, as an economy of the Spirit! continued steadfastly in—'attended constantly upon,' the apostles' doctrine—or 'teaching,' giving themselves up to the instructions which, in their raw state, would be indispensable to the consolidation of the immense multitude suddenly admitted to visible discipleship. fellowship—in its largest sense, breaking of bread—not certainly in the Lord's Supper alone, but rather in frugal repasts taken together, with which the Lord's Supper was probably conjoined until abuses and persecution led to the discontinuance of the common meal. prayers—probably, stated seasons of it. fear came upon every soul—a deep awe rested upon the whole community. all that believed were together, and had all things common, &c.—(See on ch. 4, 34-37.). daily in the temple—observing the hours of Jewish worship. and breaking bread from house to house—Rather, 'at home' (margin), i.e., in private, as contrasted with their temple-worship, but in some stated place or places of meeting. eat their meat with gladness ('exultation') and singleness of heart; praising God—"Go thy way, eat thy bread with joy, and drink thy wine with a merry heart, for God now accepteth thy works" (Ecclesiastes, 9, 7; see also on ch. 8, 30.). having favour with all the people—commending themselves by their lovely demeanour to the admiration of all who observed them. And the Lord—i.e., JESUS, as the glorified Head and Ruler of the Church. added—"kept adding;" i.e., to the visible community of believers, though the words "to the Church" are wanting, in the most ancient MSS. such as should be saved—Rather, 'the saved,' or 'those who were being saved.' The young Church had but few peculiarities in its outward form, or even in its doctrine: the single discriminating principle of its few members was that they all recognized the crucified Jesus of Nazareth as the Messiah. This confession would have been a thing of no importance, if it had only presented itself as a naked declaration, and would never in such a case have been able to form a community that would spread itself over the whole Roman Empire. It acquired its value only through the power of the Holy Ghost, passing from the apostles as they preached to the hearers; for He brought the confession from the very hearts of men (1 Colossians, 12, 3.), and like a burning flame made their souls glow with love. By the power of this Spirit, therefore, we behold the first Christians not only in a state of active fellowship, but also internally changed: the narrow views of the natural man are broken through; they have their possessions in common, and they regard themselves as one family. [OLSHAUSEN.]

CHAPTER III.

VER. 1-20. PETER HEALS A LAME MAN AT THE TEMPLE GATE—HIS ADDRESS TO THE WONDERING MULTITUDE. 1-11. Peter and John—already associated by their Master, first with James (Mark, 1. 29; 5. 37; 9. 2.), then by themselves (Luke 22. 8.; and see John, 13. 23, 24.): Now we find them constantly together, but John (yet young) only as a silent actor. went up—'were going up,' were on their way. a certain man lame from his mother's womb—and now "above 40 years old" (ch. 4. 22.), was carried—'was want to be carried.' Peter, fastening his eyes on him with John, said, Look on us . . . And he gave heed—that, through the eye, faith might be aided in its birth. Silver and gold have I none, but such as I have give I thee, &c.—What a lofty superiority breathes in these words! In the name of Jesus of Nazareth rise up and walk, &c.—These words, uttered with supernatural power, doubtless began in this poor man the faith that sent healing virtue through his diseased members. And he took . . . and lifted him up—precisely what his Lord had done to his own mother-in-law (Mark, 1. 31.). his feet (or soles) and ancle-bones, &c.—the technical language of a physician (Colossians, 4. 14.). leaping up, stood . . . walked . . . entered the temple walking, leaping, and praising God—Every word here is emphatic, expressing the perfection of the cure, as v. 7 its immediateness. all the people saw him, &c.—as they assembled at the hour of public prayer, in the temple courts; so that the miracle had the utmost publicity. they knew that it was he which sat for alms, &c.—(cf. John, 9. 8.) the lame man held, &c.—This is nature. all the people ran together unto them in the porch, &c.—How vividly do these graphic details bring the whole scene before us! Thus was Peter again furnished with a vast audience, whose wonder at the spectacle of the healed beggar clinging to his benefactors prepared them to listen with reverence to his words. 12-18. why marvel at this—For miracles are marvels only in relation to the limited powers of man, as though by our own power or holiness we had made this man to walk, &c.—Neither the might nor the merit of the cure are due to us, mere agents of Him whom we preach. The God of Abraham, &c.—see on ch. 2. 22, 26. hath glorified his Son Jesus—rather, 'his Servant Jesus,' as the same word is rendered in Matthew, 12. 18, but in that high sense in which Isaiah applies it always to Messiah (Isaiah, 42. 1; 49. 6; 62. 13; 53. 11.). When 'Son' is intended a different word is used. when ye delivered up, &c.—With what heroic courage does Peter here charge his audience with the heaviest of all conceivable crimes, and with what terrific strength of language are these charges clothed! killed the Princes of Life—Glorious paradox, but how piercing to the conscience of the auditors! His name through faith in his name hath made this man strong, &c.—With what skill does the apostle use the miracle both to glorify his ascended Lord and bring the guilt of His blood more resistlessly home to his audience! 17-21. And now, brethren, &c.—Our preacher, like his Master, "will not break the bruised reed." His heaviest charges are prompted by love, which now hastens to assuage the wounds it was necessary to inflict. I wot—or 'know,' through ignorance ye did it—(See marginal reference.), that Christ—the best MESSIAH, read, 'that His Christ,' should suffer, &c.—The doctrine of a SUFFERING MESSIAH was totally at variance with the current views of the Jewish Church, and hard to digest even by the Twelve, up to the day of their Lord's resurrection. Our preacher himself revolted at it, and protested against it, when first nakedly announced, for which he received a terrible rebuke. Here he affirms it to be the fundamental truth of ancient prophecy realized unwittingly by the Jews themselves, yet by a glorious divine ordination. How great a change had the Pentecostal illumination wrought upon his views! when the times of refreshing shall come—Rather, 'in order that the times of refreshing may come,' that long period of repose, prosperity and joy, which all the prophets hold forth to the distracted Church and this miserable world, as eventually to come, and which is here, as in all the prophets, made to turn upon the national conversion of Israel. He shall send Jesus Christ, &c.—The true reading is, 'He shall send your predestinated (or foreordained) Messiah, Jesus,' until the times, &c.—embracing the whole period between the ascension and the second advent of Christ. restraint of all things—comprehending, probably, the rectification of all the disorders of the fall, 22-26. a prophet like unto me—particularly in intimacy of communication with God (Numbers, 12. 6-8.), and as the mediatorial head of a new order of things (Hebrews, 3. 2-6.). Peter takes it for granted that, in the light of all he had just said, it would be seen at once that One only had any claim to be that Prophet. Him shall ye hear in all things, &c.—This part of the prediction is emphatically added, in order to shut up the audience to the obedience of faith, on pain of being finally "cut off" from the congregation of the righteous (Psalm 1. 1.). foretold of these days—of Messiah; all pointing to "the time of reformation" (Hebrews, 9. 16.), though with more or less distinctness. ye are the children . . . of the covenant—and so the natural heirs of its promises. in thy seed, &c.—(See on Galatians, 3. 8, &c.). 'Hitherto we have all been looking too much for a Messiah who should shed outward blessings upon the nation generally, and through it upon the world. But we have learnt other things, and now announce to you that the great blessing with which Messiah has come laden is the turning away of every one of you from his iniquities.' With what Divine skill does the apostle, founding on resistless facts, here drive home to the conscience of his auditors their guilt in crucifying the Lord of Glory; then soothe their awakened minds by assurances of forgiveness on turning to the Lord, and a glorious future as soon as this shall come to pass, and to terminate with the Personal Return of Christ from the heavens whither He has ascended; ending all with warnings, from their own Scriptures, to submit to Him if they would not perish, and calls to receive from Him the blessings of salvation.

Then Peter, &c.—See on ch. 2. 22, and on ch. 3. 13, &c. 31. Prince and Saviour—the one word expressing that Royalty which all Israel looked for in Messiah, the other the Saving character of it which they had utterly lost sight of. Each of these features in our Lord's work enters into the other, and both make one glorious whole (cf. ch. 3. 15; Hebrews, 2. 10.). to give—dispensing as "a Prince." repentance and remission of sins—as "a Saviour;" "repentance" embracing all that change which issues in the faith which secures 'forgiveness' (cf. ch. 2. 38; 20. 21.). How gloriously is Christ here exhibited; not, as in other places, as the Medium, but as the Dispenser of all spiritual blessings! 32, 33. we are witnesses . . . and the Holy Ghost—they as competent human witnesses to facts, (ch. 2. 37.) The words used in the two places are strikingly different. 34. Then stood up . . . Gamaliel—in all probability one of that name celebrated in the Jewish writings for his wisdom, the son of Simson (possibly the same who took the infant Saviour in his arms, Luke, 2. 25, &c.) and grandson of Hillel, another celebrated rabbi. He died eighteen years before the destruction of Jerusalem. [LIGHTFOOT.] 35-39. Theodos—not the same with a deceiver of that name whom Josephus mentions as heading an insurrection some twelve years after this (ANTIQUITIES, 20. 8. 1.), but some other of whom he makes no mention. Such insurrections were frequent. Judas of Galilee—See on Luke, 2. 2, and 23. 1-3. [JOSEPHUS' ANTIQUITIES, 12. 1. 1.] if of man, it will come to naught, &c.—This neutral policy was true wisdom, in the then temper of the council. But individual neutrality is hostility to Christ, as Himself teaches (Luke, 11. 22.). 40-42. beaten them—'for disobeying their orders' (cf. Luke, 23. 16.), departed rejoicing that they were counted worthy to suffer shame for His name—'thought worthy by God to be dishonoured by man' (Matthew, 5. 12; 1 Peter, 4. 14, 16.). [WIKKINSON & WILKINSON.] This was their first taste of persecution, and it felt sweet for His sake whose disciples they were. in every house—or 'in private.' VER. 1-7. FIRST ELECTION OF DEACONS. 1. the Grecians—the Greek-speaking Jews, mostly born in the provinces. the Hebrews—those Jews born in Palestine, who used their native tongue, and were wont to look down on the "Grecians" as an inferior class, were neglected—'overlooked,' by those whom the apostles employed, and who were probably of the Hebrew class, as being the most numerous. The complaint was in all likelihood well-founded, though we cannot suspect the distributors of intentional partiality. 'It was really just an emulation of love, each party wishing to have their own poor taken care of in the best manner.' [OLSHAUSEN.] the daily ministration—the daily distribution of alms or of food, probably the latter. 2-4. the multitude—the general body of the disciples. It is not reason—the Word expresses dislike: q.d., 'We cannot submit.' to leave the Word of God—to have our time and attention withdrawn from preaching; which, it thus appears, they regarded as their primary duty, to serve tables—oversee the distribution of provisions, look ye out (from) among you—i.e., ye "the multitude" from amongst yourselves. seven men of honest report—good reputation (ch. 10. 22; 1 Timothy, 3. 7.). full of the Holy Ghost—not full of miraculous gifts, which would have been no qualification for the duties required, but spiritually gifted; although on two of them miraculous power did rest, and wisdom—discretion, aptitude for practical business, whom we may appoint—for while the election was vested in the Christian people, the appointment lay with the apostles, as spiritual rulers. we will give ourselves to prayer—public prayer, as along with preaching their great work. Stephen, &c.—As this and the following names are all Greek, it is likely they were all of the "Grecian" class, which would effectually restore mutual confidence, when they had prayed, they laid their hands on them—the one proclaiming that all official gifts flowed from the Church's glorified Head, the other symbolizing the communication of these to the chosen office-bearers through the recognized channels. word of God increased . . . disciples multiplied in Jerusalem greatly—prosperity crowning the beautiful spirit which reigned in this mother-community.

company of the priests were obedient, &c.—This crowning triumph of the Gospel, whose peace-erity was now at its greatest height. After teaching and trial made it clear that sacerdotes could not stand with the Gospel, such concessions became rare indeed. Note (1.) how misunderstandings may arise among the most devoted followers of the Lord Jesus: but quickly and effectually such misunderstand-ings be healed, where honest intentions, love and reign: (2.) What a beautiful model for imita-tion by the class here complained of, who, themselves the majority, chose the new office-ness amongst the complaining minority! CHAPTER VII.

16. DEFENCE AND MARTYRDOM OF STEPHEN.
ing defence Stephen takes a much wider range, less directly into the point raised by his than we should have expected. His object has been to show (1) that so far from dispar- deeply revered and was intimately con- with, in the whole history of the ancient economy; hat in resisting the erection of the Gospel they were but treading in their fathers' foot- whole history of their nation being little else continued misapprehension of God's high wards fallen man and rebellion against them. led of glory—A magnificent appellation, fitted y outset to rivet the devout attention of his; denoting, not that visible glory which at any of the Divine manifestations, but the glory manifestations themselves, of which this was by every Jew as the fundamental one. It is of absolutely free grace, appeared unto our raham before he dwelt in Charran, and said, &c. a this first call is not expressly recorded in Genesis, it is clearly implied in Genesis, 15. 7; and Nehemiah, 9. 7; and the Jewish writers speak the same language. when his father was dead, he removed into this land—Though Abraham was in Canaan before Terah's death, his settlement in it as the land of promise is here said to be after it, as being in no way dependant on the family movements, but a transaction purely between Jehovah and Abraham himself. 6-8, four hundred years—using round numbers, as in Genesis, 15. 13, 16 (see on Galatians, 3. 17.). after that shall they come forth, and serve me in this place—Here the promise to Abraham (Genesis, 15. 16,) and that to Moses (Exodus, 3. 12., are combined; Stephen's object being merely to give a rapid summary of the leading facts, the covenant of circum-cision—i. e., the covenant of which circumcision was the token, and so—i. e., according to the terms of this cov-enant, on which Paul reasons (Galatians, 3.), the twelve patriarchs—so called as the founders of the twelve tribes of Israel. 9-16. the patriarchs, moved with envy, sold Joseph into Egypt, but God was with him—Here Stephen gives his first example of Israel's opposition to God's purposes, in spite of which and by means of which those purposes were accomplished, threescore and fifteen souls—according to the Septuagint version of Genesis, 46. 27, which Stephen follows, including the five children and grandchildren of Joseph's two sons. But when (rather 'as') the time of the promise—i. e., for its fulfilment, the people grew and multiplied in Egypt—For more than 200 years they amounted to no more than seventy-five souls: how prodigious, then, must have been their multiplication during the latter two centuries, when 600,000 men, fit for war, besides women and children, left Egypt! 20-22. In which time—of deepest depression. Moses was born—the destined deliverer, exceeding fair—lit., 'fair to God' (Marginal), or, perhaps, 'divinely fair' (see on Hebrews, 11. 23.). mighty in word—Though defective in utterance (Exodus, 4. 10.), his recorded speeches fully bear out what is here said, and deed—Referring probably to unrecorded circumstances in his early life. If we are to believe Josephus, his ability was acknowledged ere he left Egypt. 23-27. In verses 23, 29, and 36, the life of Moses is represented as embracing three periods, of forty years each; the Jewish writers say the same; and though this is not expressly stated in the Old Testament, his age at death, 120 years (Deuteronomy, 34. 7.), agrees with it. it came into his heart to visit his brethren—his heart yearning with love to them as God's chosen people, and heaving with the consciousness of a Divine vocation to set them free, avenged him that was oppressed, and smote the Egyptian—going further in the heat of his indignation than he probably intended. For he supposed his brethren would have understood, &c.—and perhaps imagined this a suitable occasion for rousing and rallying them under him as their leader; thus anticipating his work, and so running unsest, but they understood not—Reckoning on a spirit in them congenial with his own, he had the mortification to find it far otherwise. This furnishes to Stephen another example of Israel's slowness to apprehend and fall in with the divine purposes of love. next day he showed himself unto them as they strove—Here, not an Israelite and an Egyptian, but two parties in Israel itself, are in collision with each other; Moses, grieved at the spectacle, interposes as a mediator; but his in-terference, as unauthorised, is resented by the party in the wrong, whom Stephen identifies with the mass of the nation (x. 35.), just as Messiah's own interposition had been spurned. 28, 29. Will thou kill me, as thou didst the Egyptian yesterday?—Moses had thought the deed unseen (Exodus, 2. 12.), but it now appeared he was mistaken. Then fled Moses, &c.—for "when Pharaoh heard this thing he sought to slay Moses" (Exodus, 2. 15.). 30-34. an Angel of the Lord—Rather, 'the Angel' of the covenant, who immediately calls himself Jehovah (cf. v. 28.). 35-41. This Moses, whom they refused, saying,

Who made thee a ruler and a judge, &c.—Here, again, "the stone which the builders refused is made the head of the corner" (Psalm 118, 22.). This is that Moses which said . . . A prophet . . . him shall ye hear—This is quoted to remind his Moses-worshipping audience of the grand testimony of their faithful lawgiver, that himself was not the last and proper object of the Church's faith, but only a humble precursor and small model of Him to whom their absolute submission was due. In the church—the collective body of God's chosen people; hence used to denote the whole body of the faithful under the Gospel, or particular sections of them. This is he that was in the church in the wilderness, with the angel . . . and with our fathers—alike near to the Angel of the Covenant, from whom he received all the institutions of the ancient economy, and to the people, to whom he faithfully reported the living oracles and among whom he set up the prescribed institutions. By this high testimony to Moses, Stephen rebuts the main charge for which he was on trial, to whom our fathers would not obey, &c. Here he shows that the deepest dishonour done to Moses came from the nation that now professed the greatest jealousy for his honour. In their hearts turned back into Egypt. In this Stephen would have his hearers read the downward career on which they were themselves entering. 42-50, gave them up—judicially, as written in the book of the prophets—the twelve minor prophets, reckoned as one: the passage is from Amos, 5, 23. have ye offered to Me . . . sacrifices! The answer is, Yes, but as if ye did it not; for 'neither did ye offer to Me only, nor always, nor with a perfect and willing heart.' [BENGL.] Yes, ye took up the tabernacle of Moloch, &c. Two kinds of idolatry are charged upon the Israelites: that of the golden calf and that of the heavenly bodies; Moloch and Belphegor being deities, representing apparently the Divine powers ascribed to nature, under different aspects, carry you beyond Babylon—the well-known region of the captivity of Judah; while "Damascus" is used by the prophet (Amos, 5, 27.), whither the ten tribes were carried. Our fathers had the tabernacle of witness in the wilderness—which aggravated the guilt of that idolatry in which they indulged, with the tokens of the Divine presence constantly in the midst of them, which our fathers that came in after—rather (Maryin) 'having received it by succession,' i.e., the custody of the tabernacle from their ancestors, brought in with Jems—or Joshua. into the possession—rather, 'at the taking possession of [the territory of] the Gentiles,' unto the days of David—for till then Jerusalem continued in the hands of the Jebusites. But Stephen's object in mentioning David is to hasten from the tabernacle which he set up, to the temple which his son built, in Jerusalem; and this only to show, from their own Scriptures (Isaiah, 66, 1, 2), that even that temple, magnificent though it was, was not the proper resting-place of Jehovah upon earth, as his audience and the nation had all along been prone to imagine. (What that resting-place was, even "the contrite heart, that trembleth at God's word," he leaves to be gathered from the prophet referred to. 51-53. Ye stiffnecked . . . ye do always resist the Holy Ghost, &c. It has been thought that symptoms of impatience and irritation in the audience induced Stephen to cut short his historical sketch. But as little farther light could have been thrown upon Israel's obstinacy from subsequent periods of the national history on the testimony of their own Scriptures, we should view this as the summing up, the brief import of the whole Israelitish history—grossness of heart, spiritual deafness, continuous resistance of the Holy Ghost, down to the very council before whom Stephen was pleading. Which of, &c. Deadly hostility to the messengers of God, whose high office it was to tell of "the Righteous One"—that well-known prophetic title of Messiah (Isaiah, 53, 11; Jeremiah, 23, 4, &c.), and this consummated by the betrayal and murder of Messiah himself, on the part of those now sitting in judgment on the speaker, are the still darker features of the national character depicted in these withering words, who have received the law by the disposition ('at the appointment' or 'ordination,' i.e., by the ministry) of angels, and have not kept it. This closing word is designed to shut up those idolaters of the law under the guilt of high disobedience to it, aggravated by the august manner in which they had received it. 54-56. When they heard this, they were out to the heart, &c. If they could have entered Mm, how different would have been their temper of mind! But he, being full of the Holy Ghost, looked up steadfastly into heaven, and saw the glory of God. Ye who can transfer to canvases such scenes as these, in which the rage of hell grins horrible from men, as they sit condemned by a frail prisoner of their own, and see heaven beaming from his countenance and opening full upon his view—I envy you, for I find no words to paint what, in the majesty of the Divine text, is here so simply told. 'But how could Stephen, in the council chamber, see heaven at all!' I suppose this question never occurred but to critics of narrow soul, one of whom (Murray) conjectures that he saw it through the window! and another, of better mould, that the scene lay in one of the courts of the temple. [ALFORD.] As the sight was witnessed by Stephen alone, the opened heavens are to be viewed as revealed to his bright beaming spirit, and Jesus standing on the right hand of God. Why "standing," and not sitting, the posture in which the glorified Saviour is elsewhere represented? Clearly, to express the eager interest with which He watched from the skies the scene in that council chamber, and the full tide of His Spirit which he was at that moment engaged in pouring into the heart of his heretical witness, till it beamed in radiance from his very countenance. I see . . . the Son of Man standing, &c.—This is the only time that our Lord is by human lips called THE SON OF MAN after his ascension (Revelation, 1, 13; 14, 14, are not instances.). And why here? Stephen, full of the Holy Ghost, speaking now not of himself at all (v. 55), but entirely by the Spirit, is led to repeat the very words in which Jesus Himself, before this same council, had foretold His glorification (Matthew, 26, 64.), assuring them that that exaltation of THE SON OF MAN which they should hereafter witness to their dismay, was already begun and actual. [ALFORD.] 57, 58. Then they cried out and ran upon him with one accord, &c.—To men of their mould and in their temper, Stephen's last seraphic words could but bring matters to extremities, though that only revealed the diabolical spirit which they breathed. cast him out of the city—according to Leviticus, 24, 14; Numbers, 15, 35; 1 Kings, 21, 13; and see Hebrews, 13, 12, and stoned—"proceeded to stone" him. The actual stoning is recorded in next verse, and the witnesses—whose hands were to be first upon the criminal (Deuteronomy, 17, 7.). laid down their clothes—their loose outer garments, to have them taken charge of, at a young man's feet whose name was Saul—How thrilling is this our first introduction to one to whom Christianity—whether as developed in the New Testament or as established in the world—owes more perhaps than to all the other apostles together! Here he is, having perhaps already a seat in the Sanhedrim, some 30 years of age, in the thick of this tumultuous murder of a distinguished witness for Christ, not only "consenting unto his death" (ch. 8, 1.), but doing his own part of the dark deed. 59, 60. calling upon [God] and saying, Lord Jesus, &c.—An unhappy supplement of our translators is the word "God" here; as if, while addressing the Son, he was really calling upon the Father. The sense is perfectly clear without any supplement at all—"calling upon invoking, and saying, Lord Jesus;" Christ being the Person directly invoked and addressed by name (cf. ch. 9, 14.). Even

8. DE WETTE, MEYER, &c., admit this, adding other examples of direct prayer to Christ; and in his well-known letter to the Emperor Trajan (or III.) says it was part of the regular Christian to sing, in alternate strains, a hymn to a God. Lord Jesus, receive my spirit!—In pre- to Jesus the identical prayer which Himself he cross offered to His Father, Stephen renders glorified Lord absolute divine worship, in the blime form, and at the most solemn moment 6. In this commitment of his spirit to Jesus, afterwards followed his footsteps, with a calm confidence that with Him it was safe for (2 Timothy, 1. 12.) cried with a loud voice— something of the gathered energy of his dying ce on John, 19. 10-30, p. 89 [1] second column dille.) Lord—i.e., JESUS, beyond doubt, whom last before addressed as Lord, lay not this sta charge.—Comparing this with nearly the same of his dying Lord, it will be seen how very richly ty of Jesus had drunk into his Master's spirit, triment form, he fell asleep—never said of the Christ. See on 1 Thessalonians, 4. 14. How he record of this first martyrdom for Christ, all the darkness of its perpetrators; and how ave been cheered by it to life faithfulness even ath!

To whom all gave heed. . . because of long time he had bewitched them. This, coupled with the rapidity with which they deserted him and attached themselves to Philip, shows the ripeness of Samaria for some religious change. were baptized, both men and women—the detection of Simon's frauds helping to extend and deepen the effects of Philip's preaching. Then Simon himself believed also. Left without followers, he thinks it best to join the man who had fairly outstripped him, not without a touch of real conviction, and. . . was baptized. What a light does this throw on what is called Baptismal Regeneration! he continued with Philip—'was in constant attendance upon' him. 14-17, the apostles. . . sent Peter and John—showing that they regarded Peter as no more than their own equal, prayed. . . they might receive the Holy Ghost, for. . . only they were baptized in the name of the Lord Jesus. As the baptism of adults presupposed "the renewing of the Holy Ghost" (Titus, 3. 5-7; 1 Corinthians, 12. 13.), of which the profession of faith had to be taken for evidence, this communication of the Holy Ghost by the laying on of the apostles' hands was clearly a super-added thing; and as it was only occasional, so it was invariably attended with miraculous manifestations (see ch. 10. 44, where it followed Peter's preaching; and ch. 19. 1-7, where, as here, it followed the laying on of hands.) In the present case an important object was served by it—the sudden appearance of a body of baptized disciples in Samaria, by the agency of one who was not an apostle, requiring the presence and power of apostles to perform their special part as the divinely appointed founders of the Church. [ALFORD.] Beautiful, too, was the spectacle exhibited of Jew and Samaritan one in Christ. 18-24. offered them money. Hence the term Simony, to denote trafficking in sacred things, but chiefly the purchase of ecclesiastical offices, that on whomsoever I lay hands he may receive the Holy Ghost. Spiritual ambition here shows itself the key to this wretched man's character. Thy money perish with thee—g. d., 'Accused be thou and thy money with thee!' It is the language of mingled horror and indignation, not unlike our Lord's rebuke of Peter himself (Matthew, 16. 23.). thou hast neither put nor lot. . . thy heart is not right, &c.—This is the fidelity of a minister of Christ to one deceiving himself in a very awful manner. Repent. . . pray. . . if perhaps the thought of this heart may be forgiven—this expression of doubt being designed to impress upon him the greatness of his sin, and the need of alarm on his part. in the gall of bitterness and. . . bond of iniquity—Expressing both the awfulness of his condition and the captivity to it in which he was held. Pray ye to the Lord for me—Peter had urged him to pray for himself; he asks those wonder-working men to do it for him; having no confidence in the prayer of faith, but thinking that those men possessed some peculiar interest with heaven, that none of those things come upon me—not that the thought of his wicked heart might be forgiven him, but only that the evils threatened might be averted from him. While this throws great light on Peter's view of his melancholy case, it shows that Christianity, as something divine, still retained its hold of him. (Tradition represents him as turning out a great heresiarch, mingling Oriental or Grecian philosophy with some elements of Christianity.) 25. and they (Peter and John), when they had preached (in the city where Philip's labours had been so richly blessed) returned. . . and preached in many villages of the Samaritans—embracing the opportunity of their journey back to Jerusalem to fulfil their Lord's commission to the whole region of Samaria (ch. 1. 8.)

26-30. THE ETHIOPIAN EUNUCH. 'With this narrative of the progress of the Gospel among the Samaritans is connected another which points to the diffusion of the doctrine of the Cross among the remotest nations. The simplicity of the chamberlain of Meroe forms a remarkable contrast with the craft of the magician just described.' [OLSHAUSEN.] 26-28, the angel of the Lord—rather, 'an angel.' go south, the way that goeth down from Jerusalem to Gaza. There was such a road, across mount Hebron, which Philip might take without going to Jerusalem (as Von Raumer's "Palästina" shows), which is desert—i. e., the way; not Gaza itself, which was the southernmost city of Palestine, in the territory of the ancient Philistines. To go from a city, where his hands had been full of work, so far away on a desert road, could not but be staggering to the faith of Philip, especially as he was kept in ignorance of the object of the journey. But like Paul, he "was not disobedient to the heavenly vision," and like Abram, "he went out not knowing whither he went" (ch. 26. 19; Hebrews, 11, 8.), a man of Ethiopia—Upper Egypt, Meroe, an eunuch of great authority. Eunuchs were generally employed for confidential offices in the east, and to some extent are still. Candace—the family name of the queens of Upper Egypt, like Pharaoh, Caesar, &c. (See Isaiah, 56, 3-8, and John, 12, 20.) was returning—Having come so far, he not only staid out the days of the festival, but prolonged his stay till now. It says much for his fidelity and value to his royal mistress that he had such liberty. But the faith in Jehovah and love of his worship and word, with which he was imbued, sufficiently explain this, and sitting in his chariot, read Isaiah—Not content with the statutory services, in which he had

It stands out on the face of as just a repetition of what we read of thea phets, in 1 Kings, 18, 12; 2 Kings, 2, 16. Thither penetrated; and Saul, flashed with past rakes to crush it out, that if he found it, whether men or women. Arise, and go into the city, and it shall be told thee, &c. See on ch. 8. 25-28. 7. the men . . . stood speechless. This may mean merely that they 'remained' so; but if the standing posture be intended, we have only to suppose that though at first they "all fell to the earth" (ch. 26. 14), they arose of their own accord while Saul yet lay prostrate, hearing a (rather 'the') voice. Paul himself says they "heard not the voice of Him that spake to him" (ch. 22. 9). But just as "the people that stood by heard" the voice that saluted our Lord with recorded words of consolation and assurance, and yet heard not the articulate words, but thought "it thundered," or that some "angel spake to him" (John, 12. 28, 29.)—so these men heard the voice that spake to Saul, but heard not the articulate words. Apparent discrepancies like these, in the different narratives of the same scene in one and the same Book of Acts, furnish the strongest confirmation both of the facts themselves and of the book which records them. Saul arose . . . and when his eyes were opened, he saw no man—after beholding the Lord, since he "could not see for the glory of that light" (ch. 22. 11), he had involuntarily closed his eyes to protect them from the glare; and on opening them again he found his vision gone. 'It is not said, however, that he was blind, for it was no punishment.' [BENJEL.] 9. And he was three days without sight, and neither did eat nor drink—i. e.—according to the Hebrew mode of computation—he took no food during the remainder of that day, the entire day following, and so much of the subsequent day as elapsed before the visit of Ananias. Such a period of entire abstinence from food, in that state of mental absorption and revolution into which he had been so suddenly thrown, is in perfect harmony with known laws and numerous facts. But what three days must those have been! 'Only one other space of three days' duration can be mentioned of equal importance in the history of the world.' [Howe.] Since Jesus had been revealed not only to his eyes but to his soul (see on Galatians, 1. 15, 16), the double conviction must have immediately flashed upon him, that his whole reading of the Old Testament hitherto had been wrong, and that the system of legal righteousness in which he had, up to that moment, rested and prided himself was false and fatal. What materials these for spiritual exercise during those three days of total darkness, fasting, and solitude! On the one hand, what self-condemnation, what anguish, what death of legal hope, what difficulty in believing that in such a case there could be hope at all; on the other hand, what heart-breaking admiration of the grace that had "pulled him out of the fire," what resistless conviction that there must be a purpose of love in it, and what tender expectation of being yet honoured, as a chosen vessel, to declare what the Lord had done for his soul, and spread abroad the savour of that name which he had so wickedly, though ignorantly, sought to destroy—must have struggled in his breast during those memorable days! Is it too much to say that all that profound insight into the Old Testament, that comprehensive grasp of the principles of the divine economy, that penetrating spirituality, that vivid apprehension of man's lost state, and those glowing views of the perfection and glory of the divine remedy, that beautiful ideal of the loftiness and the lowliness of the Christian character, that large philanthropy and burning zeal to spend and be spent through all his future life for Christ, which distinguish the writings of this chiefest of the apostles and greatest of men—were all quickened into life during those three successive days? 10-16. a certain disciple Beautiful note of encouragement as to the frame in which Ananias would find the persecutor! And hath seen in a vision a man named Ananias, &c. Thus, as in the case of Cornelius and Peter afterwards, there was a mutual preparation of each for each. But we have no account of the vision which Saul had of Ananias coming in to him and putting his hands upon him for the restoration of his sight, save this interesting allusion to it in the vision which Ananias himself had. Ananias answered, Lord, I have heard by many of this man, &c. *The objections of Ananias, and the removal of them by the Lord, display in a very touching manner the childlike relation of the believing soul to its Redeemer. For this reason, even by other nations, it is usually carried on at some distance from towns; accordingly, Simon's house was "by the sea side" (ch. 10. 6). Peter's lodging there shows him already to some extent above Jewish prejudice.

CHAPTER X.

1-18. ACCESSION AND BAPTISM OF CORNELIUS AND HIS PARTY; OR, THE FIRST-FRUITS OF THE GENTILES. We here enter on an entirely new phase of the Christian Church, the "opening of the door of faith to the Gentiles;" in other words, the recognition of Gentile, on terms of perfect equality with Jewish, discipleship without the necessity of circumcision. Some beginnings appear to have been already made in this direction (see on ch. 11. 20, 21); and Saul probably acted on this principle from the first, both in Arabia and in Syria and Cilicia. But had he been the prime mover in the admission of uncircumcised Gentiles into the Church, the Jewish party, who were never friendly to him, would have acquired such strength as to bring the Church to the verge of a disastrous schism. But on Peter, "the apostle" specially "of the circumcision" was conferred the honour of initiating this great movement, as before of the first admission of Jewish believers. (See on Matthew, 16. 19.) After this, however, one who had already come upon the stage was to eclipse this "chiefest of the apostles." 1. 2. Caesarea. See on ch. 8. 40. the Italian band—a cohort of Italians, as distinguished from native-soldiers quartered at Caesarea, probably as a body-guard to the Roman procurator who resided there. An ancient coin makes express mention of such a cohort in Syria, (Akerman's Numismatic Illustrations of the New Testament.) A devout man, &c.—an uncircumcised Gentile proselyte to the Jewish faith, of whom there were a very great number at this time; a distinguished proselyte, who had brought his whole household establishment under the hallowing influence of the Jewish faith and the regular observance of its principal seasons of worship, gave much alms to the people—i.e., the Jewish people, on the same principle as another centurion before him (Luke, 7. 5; thinking it no "great thing," if they had "sown unto him spiritual things, that they should reap his carnal things" (1 Corinthians, 9. 11). prayed to God away—at the stated daily seasons. But he had been "fasting until that hour" (v. 30), perhaps from the sixth hour (v. 9). What is it, Lord!—language which, tremulously though it was uttered, betokened child-like reverence and humility. Thy prayers and thine alms. The way in which both are

Who this "devout soldier" was, can only be matter of conjecture. Da Costa ("Four Witnesses") gives a number of ingenious reasons for thinking that, having attached himself henceforth to Peter—whose influence in the composition of the second Gospel is attested by the earliest tradition, and is stamped on that Gospel itself—he is no other than the Evangelist Mark. 9-16. upon the housetop—the flat roof, the chosen place in the East for cool retirement, the sixth hour—noon, a trance—differing from the "vision" of Cornelius, in so far as the things seen had not the same objective reality, though both were supernatural. all manner of four-footed beasts, &c.—i.e., the clean and the unclean (ceremonially) all mixed together. Peter opened his mouth. Of a truth I perceive—i.e., 'I have demonstrated before mine eyes.' that God is seen of persons. Not 'I see there is no capriciousness with God,' for Peter would never imagine such a thing, but, 'as the next clause shows.' 'I see that God respects only to personal character and state in the acceptance of men, national and ecclesiastical distinctions being of no account.' but in every nation—not, 'not in every religion;' according to a common distinction these words. he that feareth him, and worketh righteousness. This being the well-known phraseology of the Testament in describing the truly godly man, the pale of revealed religion, it cannot be alleged that Peter meant it to denote a merely virtuous character in the heathen sense; and as Peter had learnt this from the messengers of Cornelius and from his lips, to convince him that the whole religious character of the Roman officer had been moulded in the will—whether in the form of demoniac possession or more indirectly as in her "whom Satan had filled with a spirit of infirmity eighteen years" (Luke 13:16); thereby showing Himself the Redeemer from all sin for God was with him. Thus gently does the Lord rise to the supreme dignity of Christ with which, as, accommodating Himself to his hearers, 39-44, are witnesses of all he did—not objects of reverence, but simply witnesses to the great facts on which the Gospel is founded. slow angel (i.e., slow by hanging) on a tree. Not the less certain, therefore, was the fact of resurrection, though withholding Himself from all gaze in His risen body. he which was ordained to be the Judge of quick and dead. He had before named Him "Lord of all," for the dispensing of life to all alike: now he announces Him in the supreme lordship, for the exercise of judgment to all alike. On this divine ordination, see John, 5:27; ch. 17:31. Thus we have here all Gospel truth in a few words. But, Forciveness through this exalted One is a striking note of Peter's beautifully simple discourse. It gives all the prophetic witness—i.e., This is the Lord, generally, of the prophetic testimony. It was thus to give the spirit of their testimony, than to dwell in detail on such an occasion. But let this be the statement of the evangelical import of the Old Testament writings be devoutly weighed by those who are disposed to rationalize away this element in the testament, whosoever believeth in him. This was not only said with special reference to the Gentiles seen there before him, and formed a noble practical conclusion to the whole discourse. 44, 45. While he spake, the Holy Ghost fell—by visible and audible manifestation (e. 46). they of the circumcision . . . were amazed. . . because that on the Gentiles also was bestowed, &c.—without circumcision, heard them speak in tongues and magnify God. As on the day of Pentecost, it was no empty miracle, no mere speaking of tongues in languages, but utterance of "the wonderful works of God" in tongues to them unknown (ch. 2:11), and; but more remarkable in this case, as the Jews were perhaps less familiar with the Old Testament prophecies of praise. 46-48. Then answered Peter, Can men be saved by water . . . which have received the Holy Spirit, &c. Mark, he does not say They have received the Spirit, what need have they of water? but, Having first discipleship imparted to them and visibly and audibly upon them, what objection can there be to their being, by the seal of baptism, into the full membership of the Church? who have received the Holy Spirit as well as we—and are thus, in all that is essential to salvation, on a level with ourselves. he commanded them to be baptized—not doing it with his own hands, thus did Paul, save on rare occasions, 1 Corinthians 12:13; cf. ch. 2:38, and John, 4:2. prayed him to remain days—"golden days," [BENONI.] spent, less, in refreshing Christian fellowship, and in teaching and receiving fuller teaching on the several points of the apostle's discourse.

These objectors scruple not to demand from Peter, though the first among the apostles, an explanation of his conduct; nor is there any intimation on Peter's part of disrespect towards his authority in that demand—a manifest proof that such authority was unknown both to the complainers and to himself. 12-18. we entered the man's house. The historian makes an angry express this much more generally, ch. 10:6. So also the subsequent report of it by the deputies and by Cornelius himself to Peter, ch. 10:22, 32. But as Peter tarried with Cornelius certain days, and they doubtless talked over the wonderful scene together, perhaps this fuller and richer form of what the angel said was given to Peter; or the apostle himself may have expressed what the angel certainly designed by directing them to send for him. Observe, "Salvation" is here made to hang upon "words," i.e., the Gospel message concerning Christ. But on the "salvation" of Cornelius, see on ch. 10:34, 35; On that of his "house," see on Luke, 10:10. Then remembered I the words . . . John . . . baptized with water; but ye shall be baptized with the Holy Ghost. Forasmuch then, &c.—q.d., 'Since God himself has put them on a level with ourselves, by bestowing on them what the Lord Jesus pronounced the higher baptism of the Holy Ghost, would it not have been to withstand God if I had withheld from them the lower baptism of water, and kept aloof from them as still "unclean?" held their peace and glorified God. Well had it been if, when Paul afterwards adduced equally resistless evidence in justification of the same line of procedure, this Jewish party had shown the same reverential and glad submission! Then hath God also granted to the Gentiles, &c.—rather, "granted to the Gentiles also." (See a similar misapprehension of "also" in Hebrews, 12:1.) To "grant repentance unto life"—i.e., 'such as issues in life' (cf. 2 Corinthians, 7:10, "repentance unto salvation")—is more than to be willing to pardon upon repentance. [GROTIUS.] The case of Cornelius is so manifestly one of grace reigning in every stage of his religious history, that we can hardly doubt that this was just the feature of it which they meant here to express. And this is the grace that reigns in every conversion.

19-24. THE GOSPEL BEING PREACHED TO GENTILES AT ANTIOCH ALSO, BARNABAS IS SENT THITHER FROM JERUSALEM, WHO HALLS THEIR ACCESSION AND LABOURS AMONG THEM. 19-24. they which were scattered abroad upon the persecution that arose about Stephen—and who "went everywhere preaching the word" (ch. 8:4), travelled as far as Phoenice—that part of the Mediterranean coast which, commencing a little North of Caesarea, stretches northwards for upwards of 100 miles, half-way to Antioch, and Cyprus. See on ch. 4:36. An active commercial intercourse subsisted between Phoenice and Cyprus, and Antioch—near the head of the North-East coast of the Mediterranean, on the river Orontes, and containing a large colony of Jews, to whose religion there were there numerous proselytes. "It was almost an oriental Rome, in which all the forms of the civilized life of the empire found some representative; and through the two first centuries of the Christian era it was what Constantinople became afterwards, 'the Gate of the East.'" [HOWES.] some of them were men of Cyprus and Cyrene—(see on Luke 23:26)—as Lucius, mentioned ch. 13:1. spake unto the Grecians—rather, "the Greeks," i.e., uncircumcised Gentiles (as the true reading beyond doubt is). The Gospel had, from the first, been preached to "the Grecians" or Greek-speaking Jews, and these 'men of Cyprus and Cyrene,' were themselves "Grecians." How, then, can we suppose that the historian would note, as something new and singular (c. 23), that some of the dispersed Christians preached to them? a great number believed. Thus the accession of Cornelius and his party was not the first admission of uncircumcised Gentiles into the Church. (See on ch. 10. 1.) Nay, we read of no influence which the accession of Cornelius and his house had on the further progress of the Gospel among the Gentiles; whereas there here open upon us operations upon the Gentiles from quite a different quarter, and attended with ever-growing success. The only great object served by the case of Cornelius was the formal recognition of the principles which came afterwards secured. (See on ch. 15.) sent . . . Barnabas . . . as far as Antioch—implying that even on the way to Antioch he found churches to visit. [OLSHOUSEN.] It was in the first instance, no doubt, a mission of enquiry; and no one could be more suitable to enquire into the proceedings of those Cyprians and Cyrenians than one who was himself a "Grecian" of Cyprus (ch. 1. 30), and "a son of consolation." when he . . . had seen the grace of God (in the new converts) was glad—owned and rejoiced in it at once as divine, though they were uncircumcised, exhorted them all that with purpose of heart (as opposed to a hasty and fickle discipleship) they would cleave unto the Lord—the Lord Jesus. For he was a good man. The sense of "good" here is plainly 'large-hearted,' 'liberal-minded,' rising above narrow Jewish sectarianism, and that because, as the historian adds, he was "full of the Holy Ghost and of faith." and much people were added unto the Lord. This proceeding of Barnabas, so full of wisdom, love, and zeal, was blessed to the great increase which the Church regarded Christ—honouring in their only Lord and Saviour, dwelling continually His name, and glorying in it—so it was felt to be apposite and beautiful to be allowed to die.

27-30. BY OCCASION OF A FAMINE, BARNABAS SAUL RETURN TO JERUSALEM WITH A CONTRIBUTION FOR THE RELIEF OF THEIR SUFFERING BRETHREN came prophets from Jerusalem—inspired teachers, as we shall afterwards frequently meet with, whose times, but not necessarily, foretold future events. They are classed next to apostles, 1 Corinthians, ii 20; Ephesians, 4. 11. that there should be great doings throughout all the world—the whole Roman Empire which came to pass in the days of Claudius Cesar. This, however, argues not so much hard unbelief as that kind of it incident to the best, in this land of shadows, which perceives not so clearly as it might how very near heaven and earth, the Lord and his praying people, are to each other. Peter continued knocking—delay being dangerous. But he, beckoning . . . with his hand to hold their peace—so lively touch this. In the hubbub of joyful and wonder- ing interrogatories there might mingle reflections, thrown out by one against another, for holding out so long against the testimony of Rhoda; while the emo- tion of the apostle's own spirit would be too deep and solemn to take part in such demonstrations, or utter a word till, with his hand, he had signified his wish for perfect silence. Go show these things unto James and to the brethren. Whether James the son of Alphaeus, one of the twelve, usually known as 'James the Less,' and "James the Lord's brother" Galatians, 1. 19) were the same person; and if not, whether the James here referred to, was the former or the latter, critics are singularly divided, and the whole question is one of the most difficult. To us, it appears that there are strong reasons for thinking that they were not the same persons, and that the one here meant, and throughout the Acts, is the apostle James. (But on this more hereafter.) James is singled out, because he had probably begun to take the oversight of the Church in Jerusalem, which we afterwards find him exercising (ch. 16). And he departed, and went into another place—according to his Lord's express command, Matthew, 10. 23. When told, on a former miraculous liberation from prison, to go and speak unto the people (ch. 6. 20), he did it; but in this case to present himself in public would have been to tempt God by rushing upon certain destruction, 18. 19, as soon as it was day, &c. His deliverance must have been during the fourth watch (three to six A. M.); else he must have been missed by the keepers at the change of the watch. [Wims.] examined the keepers—who, either like the keepers of our Lord's sepulchre, had "shaken and become as dead men" (Matthew, 28. 4), or had slept on their watch and been divinely kept from speaking—commanded that they should be out to swept from the stage, while his intended victim was spared to the Church, but the cause which he and his Jewish investigators sought to crush was only furthered and glorified. How full of encouragement and consolation is all this to the Christian Church in every age! 23. Barnabas and Saul returned from Jerusalem—where, it thus appears, they had remained during all this persecution, when they had fulfilled their ministry—or service; that mentioned ch. 11. 29, 30. took with them John . . . Mark. (See on v. 12)—not to be confounded with the second evangelist, as is often done. As his uncle was Barnabas, so his spiritual father was Peter (1 Peter, 5. 12).

CHAPTER XIII.

(CHAPTERS XIII. XIV.)

IN COMPANY WITH BARNABAS.

VER. 1-3. BARNABAS AND SAUL, DIVINELY CALLED TO LABOUR AMONG THE GENTILES, ARE SET APART AND SENT FORTH BY THE CHURCH AT ANTIOCH. The first seven chapters of this Book might be entitled, The Church among the Jews; the next five chap. 8-12, The Church in transition from Jews to Gentiles; and the last sixteen ch. 13-28, The Church among the Gentiles. [BAUMGARTEN.] "Though Christianity had already spread beyond the limits of Palestine, still the Church continued a stranger to formal missionary effort. Casual occurrences, particularly the persecution at Jerusalem ch. 8. 2, had hitherto brought about the diffusion of the Gospel. It was from Antioch that teachers were first sent forth with the definite purpose of spreading Christianity, and organizing churches, with regular institutions (ch. 14. 23., [OLSHAUSEN.] 1. there were . . . certain prophets see on ch. 11. 27.) and teachers, as Barnabas, &c.—implying that cool basin-like hollows on the mountains, moving in the same direction with our missionaries.' [How's.] 15-17. Then Paul stood up, and beckoning with his hand—as was his manner on such occasions, ch. 21. 40; and see ch. 26. 1. Men of Israel, and ye that fear God—by the latter expression meaning religious proselytes, who united with the Jews in all acts of ordinary worship, and exalted them when they dwelt as strangers in Egypt—by marvellous interpositions for them in their deepest depression. 18-22. forty years suffered he their manners—rather, according to what appears the true reading, 'cherished he them' (as a nurse the infant in her bosom), after that he gave . . . Judges . . . by the space of four hundred and fifty years. As this appears to contradict 1 Kings, 6. 1, various solutions have been proposed. Taking the words as they stand in the Greek, thus, 'after that, by the space of 450 years, he gave Judges,' the meaning may be, that about 450 years elapsed from the time of the covenant with Abraham until the period of the Judges; which is historically correct, the word "about" showing that chronological exactness was not aimed at. But taking the sense to be as in our version, that it was the period of the judges itself which lasted about 450 years, this statement also will appear historically correct, if we include in it the interval of subjection to foreign powers which occurred during the period of the judges, and understand it to describe the whole period from the settlement of the tribes in Canaan to the establishment of royalty. Thus, from the Exodus to the building of the temple were 492 years [JOSEPHUS' ANTIQUITIES, 8. 3. 1]; deduct forty years in the wilderness; twenty-five years of Joshua's rule [JOSEPHUS' ANTIQUITIES, 5. 1. 20]; forty years of Saul's reign (v. 21); forty of David's; and the first four years of Solomon's reign (1 Kings, 6. 1), and there remain, just 443 years; or, in round numbers, 'about 450 years.' God gave them Saul . . . of the tribe of Benjamin. That the speaker was himself of the same name and the same tribe, has often been noticed as in all likelihood present to the apostle's mind while speaking. forty years. With this length of Saul's reign (not mentioned in the Old Testament.) JOSEPHUS coin- cides [Antiquities, vi. 14. 9.]. I have found David, &c. This quotation is the substance of Psalm 89. 20; 1 Samuel, 13. 14; and perhaps also of Psalm 78. 70-72. 23-25. Of this man's seed hath God, according to . . . promise, raised unto Israel a Saviour, Jesus. The emphasis of this statement lies (1) in the seed from which Christ sprang—David's—and the promise to that effect, which was thus fulfilled; (2) on the character in which this promised Christ was given of God—"A SAVIOUR." His personal name "JESUS" is emphatically added, as designed to express that very character. (See on Mat- thew, 1. 21.) 26-31. children . . . of Abraham, and who- soever among you feareth God (Gentile proselytes) to you is the word of this salvation sent—both being regarded as one class, as "the Jew first," to whom the Gospel was to be addressed in the first instance. For they that dwell at Jerusalem, and their rulers, because they knew him not, &c. The apostle here speaks as if the more immediate guilt of Christ's death lay with the rulers and people of the metropolises, to which he fondly hoped that those residing at such a distance as Antioch would not set their seal. found no cause of death—though they sought it, Matthew, 26. 59, 60. they took him down . . . and laid him in a sepulchre. Though the burial of Christ was thus fulfilled, and love to him by the disciples to whom the body was committed, yet since his enemies looked after it, and obtained a guard of soldiers to keep watch over it, as the remains of their own victim, the apostle regards this as the last manifestation on their part of enmity to the Saviour, that they might see how God laughed all their precautions to scorn by "raising him from the dead." he was seen many days of them which came up with him from Galilee to Jerusalem, &c.—i.e., by those who, having gone out and in with him in closest intimacy during all his public ministry, which lay chiefly in Galilee, and having accompanied him on his last journey to Jerusalem, could not possibly be mistaken as to the identity of the risen One, and were therefore unexceptionable and sufficient witnesses. 32, 33. God hath fulfilled the same—'hath completely fulfilled.' in that he hath raised up Jesus again—lit., 'raised up;' but the meaning is 'notwithstanding the contrary opinion of many excellent interpreters,' 'from the dead;' as the context plainly shows. as it is written in the second psalm—in many MSS. As the apostle in Romans, 1. 4, regards the resurrection of Christ merely as the manifestation of a prior Sonship, which he afterwards, ch. 8. 32, represents as essential, it is plain that this is his meaning here. [Such declarative meaning of the verb 'to be' is familiar to every reader of the Bible: See ex. gr. John, 15. 8, "So shall ye be," i. e., be seen to be "my disciples." It is against the whole sense of the New Testament to ascribe the origin of Christ's Sonship to His resurrection. 34-37. now no more to return to corruption—i. e., to the grave where death reigns and, cf. Romans, 6. 9, "Christ being raised from the dead (lieth no more, death hath no more dominion over him." I will give you the sure mercies of David. (Isaiah, 55. 3.) The word rendered "mercies" is peculiar, denoting the sincerity of them, as comprehending the whole riches of the new covenant; while the other word, "sure," points to the certainty with which they would, through David's Seed, be at length all substantiated. See on John, 1. 14. But how do these words prove the resurrection of Christ? They pre-suppose it; for since an eternal kingdom was

This was something more than that abhorrence of idolatry which took possession of the Jews as a nation from the time of the Babylonish captivity: it was that delicate sensibility to everything which affects the honour of God which Christianly, giving us in God a reconciled Father, alone can produce; making the Christian instinctively feel himself to be wounded in all dishonour done to God, and filling him with mingled horror and grief when such gross insults as this are offered to him. we are men of like passions, &c. How unlike either imposture or enthusiasm is this, and how high above all self-seeking do these men of Christ show themselves to be! unto the living God. This is the most glorious and distinctive of all the names of God. It is the familiar phraseology of the Old Testament, which, in such contrast with all that is to be found within the literature of heathenism, is shown to be, with its sequel, the New Testament, the one Book of the true religion. who made heaven, and earth, and the sea, and all therein. This idea of creation, utterly unknown alike to rude and to cultivated heathenism, would not only define what was meant by "the living God," but open up a new world, on after reflection, to the more thoughtful part of the audience. who in times past suffered all nations to walk in their own ways—i.e., without extending to them the revelation vouchsafed to the seed of Abraham, and the grace at- tending it: cf. ch. 17. 30; 1 Corinthians, 1. 21. (Yet not without guilt on their part was this privation, Romans, 1. 20, &c.) Nevertheless he left not himself without witness, in that, &c. Though the heinousness of idolatry is represented as so much less in the heathen, by how much they were outside the pale of revealed religion, he takes care to add that the heathen have divine "witness" enough to leave them "without excuse," he did good—scattering his beneficence everywhere and in a thousand forms. rain from heaven and fruitful seasons—on which human subsistence and all human enjoyment depend. In spite of this, and Peter's repudiation of all such honour (ch. 10. 26), how soon did idolatrous tendencies begin to show themselves in the Christian Church, at length to be systematised and enjoined in the Church of Rome! came thither Jews from Antioch and Iconium—Furious zeal that would travel so far to counteract the missionaries of the Cross! persuaded the people—"the multitudes," and having stoned Paul. See on v. 5. Barnabas they seem to have let alone; Paul, as the prominent actor and speaker, being the object of all their rage. The words seem to imply that it was the Jews who did this; and no doubt they took the lead (v. 19), but it was the act of the instigated and fickle multitudes along with them. drew him out of the city. By comparing this with ch. 7. 58, it will be seen that the Jews were the chief actors in this scene, as the disciples stood round about him—sorrowing. So his labours here had not been in vain: "Disciples" had been gathered, who now rallied around the bleeding body. And one appears to have been gained on this occasion, of far more importance than all the rest—TIMOTHEUS. See on ch. 16. 1-3. (It could scarcely have been at the subsequent visit, v. 21, for the reason given on 2 Timothy, 3. 10, 11; while at the third visit, ch. 16. 1-3, he was already a Christian.) he rose up—It is just possible that this recovery was natural; the insensibility occasioned by such treatment as he had received, sometimes passing away of itself, and leaving the patient less hurt than appeared. But certainly the impression naturally left on the mind by the words is that the restoration was miraculous; and so the best interpreters understand the words. This is confirmed by what follows, came into the city. Noble intrepidity! next day he departed with Barnabas to Derbe—a journey for which he could hardly be fit if his recovery had been natural. (See as to Derbe, on s. 6.) and when they had preached to that city and had taught many—rather, 'had made many disciples' (Margin); but probably without suffering any persecution, as Derbe is not mentioned along with Antioch, Iconium, and Lystra, 2 Timothy, 3. 11.

21-25. PAUL AND BARNABAS REHEARCE THEIR STEPS, RETURN TO ANTIOCH IN SYRIA, AND THUS COMPLETE THEIR FIRST MISSIONARY JOURNEY. 21, 22, they returned to Lystra, Iconium, and Antioch, confirming the souls, &c. At Derbe, Paul was not far from the well-known pass which leads down from the central tableland to Cilicia and Tarsus. But his thoughts did not centre in an earthly home. He revisited the places where he had been reviled and persecuted, but where he had left as sheep in the desert the disciples whom his Master had enabled him to gather. They needed building up and strengthening in the faith, comforting in the midst of their inevitable suffering, and fencing round by permanent institutions. Undaunted therefore by the dangers that awaited them, our missionaries return to them, using words of encouragement which none but the founders of a true religion would have ventured to address to their earliest converts, that "we can only enter into the kingdom of God by passing through much tribulation." [How's.] 23, 24. when they had ordained them elders—lit., 'chosen by show of hands.' But as that would imply that this was done by the apostles' own hands, many render the word, as in our version, "ordained." Still, as there is no evidence in the New Testament that the word had then lost its proper meaning; as this is beyond doubt its meaning in 2 Corinthians, 8. 19; and as there is indisputable evidence that the concurrence of the people was required in all elections to sacred office in the earliest ages of the Church—It is perhaps better to understand the words to mean, 'when they had made a choice of elders,' i.e., superintended such choice on the part of the disciples, and had prayed with fasting—lit., 'fastings,' thus setting them solemnly apart. This last clause confirms our interpretation of the former. For if "ordination" was by prayer and fasting, see ch. 13. 3, why should it be said they first "ordained elders," and after that "prayed with fasting?" Whereas if the first clause refer to the choice and the second to the ordination, i.e., all natural, they commended ('committed') them—i.e., all these churches. To the Lord—Jesus, when they had preached the word in Perga—now doing what, for some reason, they had not done on their former visit, but probably with no visible fruit. They went down into Attaleia—a seaport on the Gulf of Pamphylia, drawing to itself the commerce of Egypt and Syria. 26, called to Antioch, from whence they had been recommended. See on ch. 13. 3. 27, when they had gathered the church together, they rehearsed all that God had done with them, &c.—As their call and mission had been solemn and formal, in the presence of and by the Church as well as the Holy Ghost, they dutifully, and no doubt with eager joy, conveyed the Church and gave in their report of "all that God had done with them," i.e., by and for them, and how [in particular] he had opened the door of faith to the Gentiles—to such even as before had not been proselytes. See on ch. 11. 21; and of the language—see 1 Corinthians, 16. 9; 2 Corinthians, 2. 12; Colossians, 4. 3. The ascribing directly to God of such access to the Gentiles is to be noted. 28, there they abode long time ("no little time"). From the commencement of the mission till they left Antioch to go up to attend the council at Jerusalem, some four or five years elapsed; and as the missionary journey would probably occupy less than two years, the rest of the time would be the period of their stay at Antioch. (But see Chronological Table.)

CHAPTER XV.

VER. 1-35. COUNCIL AT JERUSALEM TO DECIDE ON THE NECESSITY OF CIRCUMCISION FOR THE GENTILE CONVERTS. 1, 2, certain men. See the description of them in Galatians, 2. 4. Paul and Barnabas (now the recognised heads of the church at Antioch,) had no small discussion and disputation with them, they determined (i.e., the church did) that Paul and Barnabas, and certain others of them—Titus was one, Galatians, 2. 1; probably as an uncircumcised Gentile convert endowed with the gifts of the Spirit. He is not mentioned in the Acts, but only in 2 Corinthians, Galatians, 2 Timothy, and the Epistle addressed to him. [ALFORD.] they determined that Paul and Barnabas should go up to Jerusalem . . . about this question. That such a deputation should be formally despatched by the church of Antioch was natural, as it might be called the mother-church of Gentile Christianity. 3-6, being brought on their way by the church—a kind of official escort, they passed through Phenice. See on ch. 11. 19, and Samaria, declaring the conversion of the Gentiles, and they caused great joy to the brethren. As the converts in those parts were Jewish (ch. 11. 19), their spirit contrasts favourably with that of others of their nation, and when they were come to Jerusalem. This was Paul's THIRD VISIT TO JERUSALEM after his conversion, and on this occasion took place what is related in Galatians, 2. 1-10. (See there.) were received of the church, and the apostles and elders—evidently at a meeting formally convened for this purpose; the deputation being one so influential, and from a church of such note, they declared all things that God had done with them. See on ch. 14-27, the apostles and elders came together to consider of this—but in presence, as would seem, of the people (v. 13, 22, 23, 7. Peter, &c. This is the last mention of him in the Acts, and one worthy of his standing, as formally pronouncing, from the divine decision of the matter already in his own case, in favour of the views which Paul's whole labours were devoted to establishing, a god while ago—probably about fifteen years before this, made choice . . . that the Gentiles by my mouth. See on ch. 11. 21. God which knoweth the hearts—implying that the real question for admission to full standing in the visible church is the state of the heart. Hence, though that cannot be known by men, no principle of admission to church privileges which reverses this can be sound, put no difference between us and them: Purifying their hearts by faith. "Purification" here refers to "sprinkling" (of the conscience by the blood of Jesus) from dead works to serve the living God." (See on 1 Corinthians, 6. 11.) How rich is this brief description of the inward revolution wrought upon the genuine disciples of the Lord Jesus! 10, why tempt ("try," provoke,) ye God—by standing in the way of his declared purpose, to put a yoke upon the neck of the disciples, &c. He that was circumcised became thereby bound to keep the whole law. (See Galatians, 5. 1-6.) It was not then the mere yoke of burdensome ceremonies, but of an obligation which, the more earnest and spiritual men became, the more impossible they felt it to fulfil. (See Romans, 5. 5; Galatians, 2. &c.) 11, through the grace of the Lord Jesus—i.e., by that only, we shall be saved even as they:—Circumcision in our case being no advantage, and in their case uncircumcision no loss; but grace doing all

Judaical and legal bondage. our beloved Barnabas and Paul. Barnabas is put first here, and in v. 12, on account of his former superior position in the church at Jerusalem (see ch. 9. 27; 11. 23)—an evidence this that we have the document precisely as written, as also of the credibility of this precious history. Men that have listened to from their own lips, v. 12, and judiciously inserted in this letter, to give them the highest weight as the bearers of it, along with their own deputies, Judas and Silas shall tell you the same by mouth. Mark here how considerate and tender it was to send men who would be able to say of Barnabas and Paul what could not be

(The authorities against the insertion of this verse are strong. It may have been afterwards added to explain v. 40.) Doubtless the attraction to Antioch for Silas was Paul's presence there, to whom he seems to have now formed that permanent attachment which the sequel of this Book and Paul's Epistles show to have existed. Paul and Barnabas continued in Antioch, teaching (to the disciples) and preaching (to those without) the word of the Lord, with many others (other labourers) also—How rich must Antioch at this time have been in the ministrations of the Gospel! (For a painful scene on this occasion, between Paul and Peter, see Galatians, 2, 11, &c.)

36-46. DISSENSION BETWEEN PAUL AND BARNABAS—THEY PART COMPANY TO PROSECUTE SEPARATE MISSIONARY TOURS. And some days after—how long, is matter only of conjecture. Paul said to Barnabas, Let us go again and visit our (the true reading is, 'the') brethren in every city where we have preached . . . and see how they do—whether they were advancing or declining, &c.: a pattern for churches and successful missionaries in every age. ('Reader, how stands it with thee?') [BENGEL.] 'Paul felt that he was not called to spend a peaceful, though laborious life at Antioch, but that his true work was "far off among the Gentiles." We place between Paul and him, so cordial expresses more than once the confidence in him, and the value he set upon his service. 4, 10, 11; 2 Timothy, 4, 11)—It may be shown Barnabas to be in the right, and not hasty in his judgment. But, in the future he had only the unfavourable; that the gentleness of Barnabas (already laid him open to imposition (2, 13), to which near relationship would make him more liable; and that in John Mark on this missionary journey judging his Christian character nor his fitness for future service, but mere the meantime against being again put to penance and having their hands visible second desertion. On the whole clear that each of these great servants something to say for himself, in defence which they respectively took up; that was quite able to appreciate the ground proceeded, Paul was not so competent considerations which Barnabas probably while Paul had but one object in view companion of their arduous work was congenial spirit and sufficient nerve, and above the same desire, might not be afraid for the soul of his nephew, lest allow him to accompany them on the injure his Christian character and dep of a true servant of Jesus Christ; and sought only the glory of their common looked at the question at issue to some, the medium of his own temperance

CHAPTER XVI.

PS. 15. 41—15. 22.—PAUL'S SECOND

MISSIONARY JOURNEY.

41—16. 5. VISITATION OF THE CHURCHES ESTABLISHED, TIMOTHEUS HERE JOINING LABY PARTY. Ch. xv. 41. he went through Asia (see on v. 23)—taking probably the same n despatched in haste from Jerusalem to en went by land (see on ch. 9, 30). Ch. xvi. me he to Derbe and Lystra; and, behold, a de was there—i.e., at Lystra (not Derbe, as de from ch. 20, 4), named Timotheus. See As Paul styles him "his own son in the 10thy, 1, 2), he must have been gained to e apostle's first visit; and as Paul says he nown his persecutions which came on him 2 Timothy, 3, 10, 11), he may have been in f disciples that surrounded the apparently of the apostle outside the walls of Lystra, a time of life when the mind receives its rissions from the spectacle of innocent undant courage. [HOWS.] His would be souls of the disciples confirmed" at the ond visit, "exhorted to continue in the warned "that we must through much trib- r into the kingdom of God" (ch. 14, 21, 22). ertain . . . Jewess. "The unfeigned faith i first in his grandmother Lois" descended her Eunice," and thence it passed to this nothy, 1, 6), who "from a child knew the nres" (2 Timothy, 3, 15). His gifts and destinuation to the ministry of Christ had already been attested (1 Timothy, 1, 15; 4, 14); and though some ten years after this Paul speaks of him as still young (1 Timothy, 4, 12), "he was already well reported of by the brethren that were at Lystra and Iconium" (v. 2), and consequently must have been well known through all that quarter, but his father was a Greek. Such mixed marriages, though little practised, and disliked by the stricter Jews, in Palestine, must have been very frequent among the Jews of the dispersion, especially in remote districts, where but few of the scattered people were settled. [HOWS.] Him would Paul have to go forth with him. This is in harmony with all we read in the Acts and Epistles, of Paul's affectionate and confiding disposition. He had no relative ties which were of service to him in his work; his companions were few and changing; and though Silas would supply the place of Barnabas, it was no weakness to yearn for the society of one who might become, what Mark once appeared to be, a son in the Gospel. [HOWS.] And such he indeed proved to be, the most attached and serviceable of his associates (Philippians, 2, 19-23; 1 Corinthians, 4, 17; 16, 10, 11; 1 Thessalonians, 3, 1-6). His double connexion, with the Jews by the mother's side and the Gentiles by the father's, would strike the apostle as a peculiar qualification for his own sphere of labour. 'So far as appears, Timothy is the first Gentile who after his conversion comes before us as a regular missionary; for what is said of Titus (Galatians, 2, 3) refers to a later period.' [WIES.] But before his departure, Paul—took and circumcised him (a rite which every Israelite might perform) because of the Jews. . . for they knew all that his father was a Greek. This seems to imply that the father was no proselyte. Against the wishes of a Gentile father no Jewish mother was, as the Jews themselves say, permitted to circumcise her son. We thus see why all the religion of Timothy is traced to the female side of the family (2 Timothy, 1, 5). 'Had Timothy not been circumcised, a storm would have gathered round the apostle in his further progress. His fixed line of procedure was to act on the cities through the synagogues; and to preach the Gospel to the Jew first and then to the Gentile. But such a course would have been impossible had not Timothy been circumcised. He must necessarily have been repelled by that people who endeavoured once to murder St. Paul because they imagined he had taken a Greek into the temple (ch. 21, 29). The very inter- course of social life would have been almost impossible, for it was still "an abomination" for the circumcised to eat with the uncircumcised.' [HOWS.] In refusing to compel Titus afterwards to be circumcised, (Galatians, 2, 3) at the bidding of Judaizing Christians, as necessary to salvation, he only vindicated "the truth of the Gospel" (Galatians, 2, 5); in circumcising Timothy, "to the Jews he became as a Jew that he might gain the Jews." Probably Timothy's ordination took place now (1 Timothy, 4, 14; 2 Timothy, 1, 6); and it was a service, apparently, of much solemnity—"before many witnesses" (1 Timothy, 6, 12). And as they went through 'the cities' they delivered the decrees . . . And so were the churches established in the faith, and increased in number daily—not the churches, but the number of their members, by this visit and the written evidence laid before them of the triumph of Christian liberty at Jerusalem, and the wise measures there taken to preserve the unity of the Jewish and Gentile converts.

6-12. THEY BREAK NEW GROUND IN PHRYGIA AND GALATIA—THEIR COURSE IN THAT DIRECTION BEING MYSTERIOUSLY HEDGED UP, THEY TRAVEL WESTWARD TO TRÖAS, WHERE THEY ARE DIVINELY DIRECTED TO MACEDONIA—THE HISTORIAN HIMSELF HERE JOINING THE MISSIONARY PARTY, THEY EMBARK FOR NEAPOLIS, AND REACH PHILIPPI. 6-8. Now when they had gone throughout Phrygia and the region of Galatia—proceeding in a north-westerly direction. At this time must have been formed "the churches of Galatia" (Galatians, 1.2; 1 Corinthians, 16. 1); founded, as we learn from the Epistle to the Galatians, particularly ch. 4. 19, by the apostle Paul, and which were already in existence when he was on his third missionary journey, as we learn from ch. 18. 23, where it appears that he was no less successful in Phrygia. Why these proceedings, so interesting as we should suppose, are not here detailed, it is not easy to say; for the various reasons suggested are not very satisfactory: ex. gr. that the historian had not joined the party [ALFORD]; that he was in haste to bring the apostle to Europe [OLSHAUSEN]; that the main stream of the Church's development was from Jerusalem to Rome, and the apostle's labours in Phrygia and Galatia lay quite out of the line of that direction. [BAUMGARTEN.] and were forbidden of the Holy Ghost [speaking by some prophet, see on ch. 11. 27] to preach the word in Asia—not the great Asiatic Continent, nor even the rich Peninsula now called Asia Minor, but only so much of its western coast as constituted the Roman province of Asia. After they were come to Mysia—where, as being part of Roman Asia, they were forbidden to labour (v. 8), they assayed (or attempted) to go into (or 'towards') Bithynia—to the North East, but the Spirit (speaking as before) suffered them not:—probably because (1) Europe was ripe for the labours of this missionary party; and (2) other instruments were to be honoured to establish the Gospel in the eastern regions of Asia Minor, especially the apostle Peter (see 1 Peter, 1. 1). By the end of the first century, as testified by Pliny the governor, Bithynia was filled with Christians. 'This is the first time that the Holy Ghost is expressly spoken of as determining the course they were to follow in their efforts to evangelize the nations, and it was evidently designed to show that whereas hitherto the diffusion of the Gospel had been carried on in unbroken course, connected by natural points of junction, it was now to take a leap to which it could not be impelled but by an immediate and independent operation of the Spirit; and though primarily, this intimation of the Spirit was only negative, and referred but to the immediate neighbourhood, we may certainly conclude that Paul took it for a sign that a new epoch was now to commence in his apostolic labours.' [BAUMGARTEN.] came down to Troas—a city on the North East coast of the Egean Sea, the boundary of Asia Minor on the West; the region of which was the scene of the great Trojan war. 9. 10, a vision appeared to Paul (while awake, for it is not called a dream) in the night: There stood a man of Macedonia, and prayed him, saying, Come over into Macedonia, and help us. Stretching his eye across the Egean Sea, from Troas on the North East to the Macedonian hills visible on the North West, the apostle could hardly fall to think this the destined scene of his future labours; and if he retired to rest with this thought, he would be thoroughly prepared for the remarkable intimation of the divine will now to be given him. This visional Macedonian discovered himself by what he said. But it was a cry not of conscious desire for the Gospel, but of deep need of it and unconscious preparedness to receive it, not only in that region, but, we may well say, throughout all that western empire which Macedonia might be said to represent. It was a virtual confession 'that the highest splendour of Heathendom, which we must recognise in the arts of Greece and in the polity and imperial power of Rome, had arrived at the end of all its resources. God had left the Gentile world to walk in their own ways (ch. 14. 2). They had sought to gain salvation for themselves; but those who had carried it farthest along the paths of natural development were now pervaded by the feeling that all had indeed been vanity. This feeling is the simple, pure result of all the history of Heathendom. And Israel, going along the way which God had marked out for him, had likewise arrived at his end. At last he is in a condition to realise his original vocation, by becoming the guide who is to lead the Gentiles unto God, the only Author and Creator of man's redemption; and St. Paul is in truth the very person in whom this vocation of Israel is now a present divine reality, and to whom, by this nocturnal apparition of the Macedonian, the preparedness of the heathen world to receive the ministry of Israel towards the Gentiles is confirmed.' [BAUMGARTEN.] This voice cries from Heathendom still to the Christian Church, and never does the Church undertake the work of missions, nor any missionary go forth from it, in the right spirit, save in obedience to this cry, and after he had seen the vision, immediately we endeavoured to go into Macedonia. The "we," here first introduced, is a modest intimation that the historian himself had now joined the missionary party. (The modern objections to this are quite frivolous.) Whether Paul's broken health had anything to do with this arrangement for having "the beloved physician" with him [WRES], can never be known with certainty; but that he would deem himself honoured in taking care of so precious a life, there can be no doubt. 11, 12, therefore leaving from Troas, we came (i.e., 'ran') with a straight course (i.e., 'ran before the wind') to Samothracia—a lofty island on the Thracian coast, North from Troas, with an inclination westward. The wind must have set in strong from the South or South South East to bring them there so soon, as the current is strong in the opposite direction, and they afterwards took five days to what they now did in two (ch. 20. 6). [HOWS.] next day to Neapolis—on the Macedonian, or rather Thracian, coast, about sixty-five miles from Samothracia, and ten from Philippi, of which it is the harbour. Philippi . . . the chief (rather, perhaps, 'the first') city of that part of Macedonia. The meaning appears to be—the first city one comes to, proceeding from Neapolis. The sense given in our version hardly consists with fact, a colony—i.e., possessing all the privileges of Roman citizenship, and, as such, being exempted from scourging and (in ordinary cases) from arrest, and entitled to appeal from the local magistrate to the emperor. Though the Pisidian Antioch & Troas were also "colonies," the fact is mentioned in this history of Philippi only on account of the numerous references to Roman privileges and duties in the rest of the chapter.

And teach customs which are not lawful for us to receive, neither to observe, being Romans. Here also there was a measure of truth; as the introduction of new gods was forbidden by the laws, and this might be thought to apply to any change of religion. But the whole charge was pure hypocrisy; for as these men would have let the missionaries preach what religion they pleased if they had not dried up the source of their gains, so they conceal the real cause of their rage under colour of a zeal for religion, and law, and good order; so ch. 17. 6, 7; and 19. 25, 27. 22. the multitude rose up together against them; so ch. 19. 28, 34; 21. 30; Luke, 23. 18. the magistrates rent off their (Paul's and Silas's) clothes—i.e., ordered the lictors, or rod bearers, to tear them off, so as to expose their naked bodies (see on v. 37). The word expresses the roughness with which this was done to prisoners preparatory to whipping, and commanded to beat them—without any trial (v. 37), to appease the popular rage. Thrice, it seems, Paul endured this indignity, 2 Corinthians, 11. 25. 23, 24. when they had laid many stripes upon them—the bleeding wounds from which they were not washed till it was done by the converted jailor (v. 38). charged the jailor . . . who thrust them into the inner prison—pestilential cells, damp and cold, from which the light was excluded, and where the chains rusted on the prisoners. One such place may be seen to this day on the slope of the Capitol at Rome. [HOWS.] he made their feet fast in the stocks—an instrument of torture as well as confinement, made of wood bound with iron, with holes for the feet which were stretched more or less apart according to the severity intended. (Origin at a later period, besides having his neck thrust into an iron collar, lay extended for many days with his feet four holes on the rack). Though jailors were proverbially unfeeling, the manner in which the order was given in this case would seem to warrant all that was done. 25. And at midnight Paul and Silas prayed and sang praises—lit., 'praying, were singing praises'; i.e., while engaged in pouring out their hearts in prayer, had broken forth into singing, and were hymning loud their joy. As the word here employed is that used to denote the Paschal hymn sung by our Lord and His disciples after their last passover (Matthew, 26. 30), and which we know to have consisted of Psalm 113-118, which was chaunted at that festival, it is probable that it was portions of the Psalms, so rich in such matter, which our joyous sufferers chaunted forth; nor could any be more reasonable and inspiring to them than those very six Psalms, which every devout Jew would no doubt have by heart. "He giveth songs in the night" (Job, 35. 10). Though their bodies were still bleeding and tortured in the stocks, their spirits, under 'the expulsive power of a new affection,' rose above suffering, and made the prison walls resound with their song. 'In these midnight hymns, by the imprisoned witnesses for Jesus Christ, the whole might of Roman injustice and violence against the Church is not only set at nought but converted into a foil to set forth more completely the majesty and spiritual power of the Church, which as yet the world knew nothing of. And if the sufferings of these two witnesses for Christ are the beginning and the type of numberless martyrdoms which were to flow upon the Church from the same source, in like manner the unparalleled triumph of the Spirit over suffering was the beginning and the pledge of a spiritual power which we afterwards see shining forth so triumphantly and irresistibly in the many martyrs of Christ who were given up as a prey to that same imperial might of Rome.' [NEANDER IN BAUMGARTEN.] and the prisoners heard them—lit., 'were listening to them,' i.e., when the astounding events immediately to be related took place; not asleep, but wide awake and ray,

(no doubt) in wonder at what they heard. 26-28. And suddenly there was a great earthquake—in answer, doubtless, to the prayers and expectations of the sufferers that, for the truth's sake and the honour of their Lord, some interposition would take place. Every one's hands (i.e., the hands of all the prisoners) were loosed—not by the earthquake of course, but by a miraculous energy accompanying it. By this, and the joyous strains which they had heard from the sufferers, not to speak of the change wrought on the jailor, these prisoners could hardly fail to have their hearts in some measure opened to the truth; and this part of the narrative seems the result of information afterwards communicated by one or more of these men. The keeper . . . awaking . . . drew his sword, and would have killed himself, &c.—knowing that his life was forfeited in that case ch. 12. 10; and cf. 27. 42. But Paul cried with a loud voice—the better to arrest the deed. Do thyself no harm, for we are all here. What divine calmness and self-possession! No elation at their miraculous liberation, or haste to take advantage of it: but one thought filled the apostle's mind at that moment, anxiety to save a fellow-creature from sending himself into eternity ignorant of the only way of life; and his presence of mind appears in the assurance which he so promptly gives to the desperate man, that his prisoners had none of them fled as he feared. But how, it has been asked by recent sceptical critics, could Paul in his inner prison know what the jailor was about to do? In many conceivable ways, without supposing any supernatural communication. Thus, if the jailor slept at the door of "the inner prison," which suddenly flew open when the earthquake shook the foundations of the building; if, too, as may easily be conceived, he uttered some cry of despair on seeing the doors open; and if the clash of the steel, as the

All this, in nothing with such a man, until, on an earthquake which made the jailor despair seizing him at the sight of a sword of self-destruction was a sword from one of those prisoners never imagine could be spoken in words evidencing; something divine would flash across him the light. all came to pass in consequence simply of the Gospel; the second was the fruit only sealed and ennobled by suffering; [see.] 35, 36. when it was day, the magistrates came, saying, Let those men go. The cause can only be conjectured. When the cause ceased, reflection would soon convince that injustice they had done, even supposing they had been entitled to special privileges; but reached them that the prisoners were under supernatural protection, they might have desired to get rid of them. The magistrates (joyed to have such orders to execute) told Paul . . . now therefore . . . go in peace. Very likely Paul receive such orders. 37. Paul said to the sergeants who had entered the prison the jailor, that they might be able to report to him had departed. They have beaten us openly, the injury done them, exposing their bleeding bodies to the rude populace, was the most stinging feature of it to the apostle's feeling, and to this accordingly he alludes elsewhere, probably a year after: "Even had I suffered before, and were shamefully (or insulted) as ye know at Philippi" (1. 13. 2. 2. uncondemned (unconvicted on the Roman, see on ch. 22. 28., and cast us into an illegal. In ch. 17., the narrative is again in the third person, and the pronoun is not changed to the second till we come to ch. 20. 5. The modesty with which St. Luke leaves out all mention of his own labours need hardly be pointed out. We shall trace him again when he rejoins St. Paul in the same neighbourhood. His vocation as a physician may have brought him into connexion with these contiguous coasts of Asia and Europe, and he may (as Mr. Smith suggests, "Shipwreck," &c.) have been in the habit of exercising his professional skill as a surgeon at sea. CHAPTER XVII.

VEL. 15. AT THESSALONICA THE SUCCESS OF PAUL'S PREACHING ENDANGERING HIS LIFE, HE IS DESPATCHED BY NIGHT TO BERRA, WHERE HIS MESSAGE MEETS WITH ENLIGHTENED ACCEPTANCE—A HOSTILE MOVEMENT FROM THESSALONICA OCCASIONS HIS SUDDEN DEPARTURE FROM BERRA.—HE ARRIVES AT ATHENS. 1. when they had passed through Amphipolis—thirty-three miles South West of Philippi, on the river Strymon, and at the head of the Gulf of that name, on the Northern coast of the Egean Sea, and Appollonia—about thirty miles South West of Amphipolis; but the exact site is not known. they came to Thessalonica—about thirty-seven miles due West from Appollonia, at the head of the Thermaic (or Thessalonian) Gulf, at the North-Western extremity of the Egean Sea; the principal and most populous city in Macedonia. We see at once how appropriate a place it was for one of the starting-points of the Gospel in Europe, and can appreciate the force of what Paul said to the Thessalonians within a few months of his departure from them: "From you, the word of the Lord sounded forth like a trumpet, not only in Macedonia and Achaia, but in every place" (1 Thessalonians, 1. 8.) (How.) where was a synagogue of the Jews—implying that (as at Philippi there was none at Amphipolis and Appollonia. 2-4. Paul, as his manner was—always to begin with the Jews, went in unto them. In writing to the converts but a few months after this, he reminds them of the courage and superiority to indignity, for the Gospel's sake, which this required after the shameful treatment he had so lately experienced at Philippi (1 Thessalonians, 2. 2.) opening and alleging that Christ must needs have suffered, &c. His preaching, it seems, was chiefly expository, and designed to establish from the Old Testament Scriptures (1. that the predicted Messiah was to be suffering and dying, and therefore a rising Messiah; (2.) that this Messiah was none other than Jesus of Nazareth, consorted (cast in their lot) with Paul and Silas; cf. 2 Corinthians, 8. 5. of the chief women—female proselytes of distinction. From the First Epistle to the Thessalonians it appears that the converts were nearly all Gentiles; not only such as had before been proselytes, who would be gained in the synagogue, but such as up to that time had been idolaters (1 Thessalonians, 1. 9, 10). During his stay, while Paul supported himself by his own labour (1 Thessalonians, 2. 9; 2 Thessalonians, 3. 7-9); he received supplies once and again from the Philippians, of which he makes honourable acknowledgment (Philippians, 4. 15, 16. 5-8. the Jews . . . moved with envy—seeing their influence undermined by this stranger. few fellows of the baser sort—better, perhaps, 'worthless market-people,' i.e., idle loungers about the market-place, of indifferent character. Having gathered a company—rather, 'having raised a mob,' assailed the house of Jason—with whom Paul and Silas abode (v. 7), one of Paul's kinsmen, apparently (Romans, 16. 21), and from his name, which was sometimes used as a Greek form of the word Joshua (GROTIUS), probably a Hellenistic Jew, sought to bring them Jason's lodgers) out to the people. And when they found them not, they draw Jason and certain brethren unto the rulers—lit., 'the politarchs'; the very name given to the magistrates of Thessalonica in an inscription on a still remaining arch of the city—so minute is the accuracy of this history. crying, These that have turned the world upside down. See on ch. 16. 20. all do contrary to the decrees of Cesar, &c.—meaning, probably, nothing but what is specified in the next words. saying, . . . there is another king, one Jesus. See on John, 19. 12. having taken security of Jason and of the other ('the others')—probably making them deposit a money-pledge that the preachers should not again endanger the public peace. 10-12, the brethren immediately sent away Paul and Silas by night—for it would have been as useless as rash to attempt any further preaching at that time, and the conviction of this probably made his friends the more willing to pledge themselves against any present continuance of missionary effort. to Berea—fifty or sixty miles South West of Thessalonica; a town even still of considerable population and importance. These were more noble than those in Thessalonica. The comparison is between the Jews of the two places; for the triumphs of the Gospel at Thessalonica were mostly among the Gentiles. See on v. 2-4. in that they received the word with all readiness of mind—heard it not only without prejudice, but with eager interest. "in an honest and good heart" (Luke, 3. 15, with sincere desire to be taught aright see John, 7. 17). Mark the "nobility" ascribed to this state of mind. searched the Scriptures daily whether these things were so—whether the Christian interpretation which the apostle put upon the Old Testament Scriptures was the true one. Therefore many of them believed—convinced that Jesus of Nazareth whom Paul preached was indeed the great Promise and Burden of the Old Testament. From this it is undeniorganizing the converts. Timotheus followed the apostle to Thessalonica, probably, one of the Philippian "own necessity" (Philippians, 4, 16, 16), and would with Silas accompany him to Berea and Timotheus to come to him with all probably wished their company and a himself to so new and great a sphere as Berea; it is added that he "waited for them" unwilling to do any thing till they came, there is no good reason to doubt that the Thessalonians that he "thought it great Athens alone" (1 Thessalonians, 3. 1) adds that he "sent Timotheus to comfort them" (1 Thessalonians, 3. 2) meaning, surely, to send him from Athens back to Thessalonica; but, probably that little fruit was to be reaped at Berea was in too interesting a state to be abandoned, he seems to have thought it best to go back again. (The other explanations suggested seem less satisfactory.) To Berea the apostle at Corinth (ch. 18. 5.).

16-34. PAUL AT ATHENS. 18, 17. idolatry—'covered with idols;' mean the inhabitants. Petronius, a content Nero's court, says satirically that it was a god at Athens than a man. This is the first impression of man's taste for art left by St. Paul was a revolting one, since and beauty had placed itself between the Creator, and bound him the faster were not God. Upon the first contact,

the most solemn questions connected with no place in Athens was so suitable for a divine mystery of religion.' [Howe.] The answer was not here on his trial, but to express fully what he had thrown out in broken ones in the Agora. all the Athenians . . . spent no nothing else but to tell or hear some new "newer thing," as if what was new becoming stale, they craved something still more new.

This lively description of the Athenian is abundantly attested by their own writers. Paul stood . . . and said—more graphically, in the midst of Mars' hill, said. This position to the position he occupied shows the risk to bring the situation vividly before us. [Howe.] I perceive that in all things ye are too gods—rather, (with most modern interpreters ancient Greek ones) 'in all respects extremely idol' or 'much given to religious worship,' a dry and commendatory introduction, founded on observation of the symbols of devotion with which the city was covered, and from which all Greek as well as the apostle, inferred the exemplary piety of the Athenians. (The authorized translation would imply that only too much superstition was, and represents the apostle as repelling his in the very first sentence; whereas the whole is so studiously courteous. 23. as I passed by your devotions—rather, 'the objects of your devotion,' as is plain from the next words, to be of art consecrated to religion. I found an altar for 'an' unknown god—erected, probably to commemorate some divine interposition, which was unable to ascribe to any known deity. That such altars, Greek writers attest; and on this skillfully fastens at the outset, as the discourse, taking it as evidence of that divine conception which, in virtue of his betwixt was prepared to dissipate. whom therewith worship—rather, 'Whom, therefore, not, ye worship,' alluding to "The Unholy declare" (announce) I unto you. This is his previous discourses, save that to the mones (ch. 14. 15-17). His subject is not, however, the Messiahship of Jesus, but god, in opposition to the materialistic polytheism of Greece, which subverted it. Nor does he come with speculation of subject—of which they had had enough but an authoritative "announcement" of god they were groping; not giving Him any name, nor even naming the Saviour Himself, as the true character of both as they were god. 24. 25. god that made the world and all is most profound philosophers of Greece to conceive any real distinction between god and universe. Thick darkness, therefore, best on all their religious conceptions. To this, the apostle sets out with a sharp statement of creation as the central principle of religion — not less needed now, against the dual idealism of our day. seeing he is Lord (or god) of heaven and earth—holding in free and subjection all the works of His hands; presiding against royalty over them, as well as pervading all as the principle of their being. How different from the blind Force or Fate to which all creatures regarded as in bondage! dwelleth not in temples with hands. This thought, so familiar to Jewish (1 Kings, 8. 7; Isaiah, 66. 1, 2; ch. 7. 48), and so elementary to Christians, would serve only more sharply to show to his heathen audience the spirituality of living, personal God, whom he announced" to them. Neither is worshipped with 'ministered unto,' 'served by' men's hands, as though he needed any thing. No less familiar as this thought also is to us, even from the earliest times of the Old Testament (Job, 35. 8, 9; Psalm 16. 2, 3; 50. 12-14; Isaiah, 46. 14-15), it would pour a flood of light upon any candid heathen mind that heard it. seeing he ('he himself') giveth to all life, and breath, and all things. The Giver of all cannot surely be dependent for aught upon the receivers of all (1 Chronicles, 29. 14). This is the culminating point of a pure Theism. 26, 27. and hath made of one blood all nations of men to dwell on all the face of the earth. Holding with the Old Testament teaching, that in the blood is the life (Genesis, 9. 4; Leviticus, 17. 11; Deuteronomy, 12. 23), the apostle sees this life-stream of the whole human race to be one, flowing from one source. [BAUMGARTEN.] and hath determined the times before appointed, and the bounds of their habitation. The apostle here opposes both Stoical Fate and Epicurean Chance, ascribing the periods and localities in which men and nations flourish to the Sovereign will and prearrangements of a living God, that they should seek the Lord. That is the high end of all these arrangements of Divine Power, Wisdom, and Love. if haply they might feel after him (as men groping their way in the dark) and find him—a lively picture of the murky atmosphere of Natural Religion. though he be not far from every one of us. The difficulty of finding God outside the pale of revealed religion lies not in His distance from us but in our distance from Him, through the blinding effect of sin. 28. For in him we live, and move, and have our being (or, more briefly, 'exist'). This means, not merely, 'Without Him we have no life, nor that motion which every inanimate nature displays, nor even existence itself' [MEYER], but that God is the living immanent Principle of all these in men, as certain also of your own poets have said. For we are also his offspring—the first half of the fifth line, word for word, of an astronomical poem of Aratus, a Greek countryman of the apostle's, and his predecessor by about three centuries. But, as he hints, the same sentiment is to be found in other Greek poets. They meant it doubtless in a pantheistic sense; but the truth which it expresses the apostle turns to his own purpose—to teach a pure, personal, spiritual Theism. (Probably during his quiet retreat at Tarsus, ch. 9. 30, revolving his special vocation to the Gentiles, he gave himself to the study of so much Greek literature as might be turned to Christian account in his future work. Hence this and his other quotations from the Greek poets, 1 Corinthians, 15. 33; Titus, 1. 12.) 29. Forasmuch then as we are the offspring of God, we ought not to think:—The courtesy of this language is worthy of notice, that the Godhead is like unto gold, or silver, or stone, graven by art and man's device—('graven by the art or device of man'). One can hardly doubt that the apostle would here point to those matchless monuments of the plastic art, in gold and silver and costliest stone which lay so profusely beneath and around him. The more intelligent Pagan Greeks no more pretended that these sculptured gods and goddesses were real deities, or even their actual likenesses, than Romanist Christians do their images; and Paul doubtless knew this: yet here we find him condemning all such efforts visibly to represent the invisible God. How shamefully inexcusable then are the Greek and Roman Churches in paganizing the worship of the Christian Church by the encouragement of pictures and images in religious service! (In the eighth century, the second council of Nicaea decreed that the image of God was as proper an object of worship as God himself.) 30. the times of this ignorance God winked at—lit., [and far better: 'overlooked,' i.e., bore with, without interposing to punish it, otherwise than suffering the debasing tendency of such worship to develop itself, (cf. ch. 14. 16, and see on Romans, 1. 24, &c.) but now—that a new light was risen upon Colossians, 1. 6, 23; Titus, 1. 11) — a tacit allusion to the narrow precincts of favoured Judaism, within which immediate and entire repentance was ever urged. The word "repentance" is here used (as in Luke, 13. 3, 5; 15. 10) in its most comprehensive sense of "repentance unto life." 31. Because he hath appointed a day in the which he will judge the world. Such language beyond doubt teaches that the judgment will, in its essence, be a solemn judicial assize held upon all mankind at once. 'Aptly is this uttered on the Areopagus, the seat of judgment.' [BENNETT.] by that man whom he hath ordained;—cf. John, 5. 22, 23, 27; ch. 10. 42. whereof he hath given assurance unto all men, in that he hath raised him from the dead — the most patent evidence to mankind at large of the judicial authority with which the Risen One is clothed. 32-34. when they heard of the resurrection of the dead, some mocked. As the Greek religion was but the glorification of the present life, by the worship of all its most beautiful forms, the Resurrection, which presupposes the vanity of the present life, and is nothing but life out of the death of all that sin has blighted, could have no charms for the true Greek. It gave the death-blow to his fundamental and most cherished ideas; nor, until these were seen to be false and fatal, could the Resurrection, and the Gospel of which it was a primary doctrine, seem otherwise than ridiculous. So Paul departed. Whether he would have opened, to any extent, the Gospel scheme in this address, if he had not been interrupted, or whether he reserved this for exposition afterwards to earnest enquirers, we cannot tell. Only the speech is not to be indeed of as quite

From names one would conclude that they had been in Rome as to sink their Jewish family roots in Pontus — the most easterly province stretching along the southern shore of the Black Sea. From this province there were Jews at the great Pentecost (ch. 2. 9), and the couple are included among "the strangers of the city" to whom Peter addressed his first Epistle. Whether this couple were converted before their acquaintance, commentators are divided. They may have brought their Christian faith from Rome [OLSHAUSEN], or Paul may have converted them merely by like occupation, and then, have been the instrument of their conversion [MEYER.] They appear to have been settled at Ephesus. The Christian friends formed, continued warm and unbroken, and their testimony is once and again borne to them by Claudius, &c. over those parts and gave them much exhortation. 13 Thus not having reached Philippi so soon as apostle, his flesh had no rest, but he was led on every side; without were fightings, within fears (2 Corinthians, 7. 5). 14 At length Titus led to the joy of the apostle, the bearer of better news from Corinth than he had dared to expect (2 Thim. 7. 6, 7, 13., but chequered by painful instances of the efforts of a hostile party to undermine apostolic reputation there (2 Corinthians). 15 Under sad feelings which this produced, he wrote—Macedonia, and probably Philippi—his SECOND LETTER TO THE CORINTHIANS (see Introduction to 2 Thim.; despatching Titus with it, and along with other unmarried deputies, expressly chosen to go and bring their collection for the poor saints in Jerusalem, and to whom he bears the beautiful testimony that they were "the glory of Christ" (1 Corinthians, 23. 23). 16 It must have been at this time that he strated as far as to the confines of "Illyricum," among the shores of the Adriatic (Romans, 15. 19.). 17 He naturally wish that his second Letter to the saints should have some time to produce its present effect he re-visited them, and this would appear a convenient opportunity for a north-western circuit, could enable him to pay a passing visit to the cities at Thessalonica and Berea, though of this we have no record. 18 On his way southward to Greece, he preached the Gospel in the intermediate regions of Bessaly, and Bœotia (see Romans, 15. 19., though we have no record. 19 he came into Greece—or a pursuance of the second part of his plan, ch. 19. 20 And there he abode three months. Though the only is here mentioned, it is the city of Corinth, & is meant as the province of "Macedonia," of the city of Philippi. Some rough work he did on his arrival at Corinth (2 Corinthians, 10. 1-19., though he had reason to expect satisfaction the whole; and as we know there were other in Achaea besides that at Corinth (2 Corinthians, 11. 19., he would have time enough to pay a brief visit during the three months of his stay. This period was rendered further memorable by the despatch of the EPISTLES TO THE ROMANS, during his stay at Corinth, and sent by "Phœbe" (see Romans, 16. 1.) of the church at Cenchrea" (see Romans, 16. 1.) apparently of some standing and one who was going thither on private business.

He had intended to embark at Cenchrea, the eastern harbour of the city, on his route to Jerusalem, the third part of his plan, ch. 19. 22 But having detected some conspiracy against his life by his bitter Jewish enemies (as he charged his plans, and determined "to return" as he is called on, "through Macedonia." As he was never more to return to Corinth, so this route would bring him, for the last time, face to face with the attached disciples of Berea, Thessalonica, and Philippi. 23 4. 5. there accompanied him into (the province of) Asia, Sopater of Bœotia, the true reading, beyond doubt, is, 'Sopater (the son) of Pyrrhus of Berea.' Some think this mention of his name was to distinguish him from Sospater (the same name used in fuller form mentioned Romans, 16. 21. But that they were the same person seems more probable. 24 One of the Thessalonians, Aristarchus. See on ch. 19. 29. and Sopater—of whose nothing else is known. Gains of Troas. Though the Gains of ch. 19. 29. is said to be of Macedonia, and this one "of Berbe," there is no sufficient reason for supposing them different persons; on the contrary, Romans, 16. 23. cf. with 3 J. 1. where there is hardly any reason to doubt that the same Gains is meant, seems to show that though he spent an important part of his Christian life away from his native Berbe, he had latterly retired to some place not very far from it, and Timotheus—not probably of Berbe, as one might suppose from this verse, but of Lystra (see on ch. 16. 1.); both being so associated in his early connexion with the apostle, that the mention of the one in the previous clause would recall the other on the mention of his name. and of Asia, Tychicus and Trophimus. (See on Mark, 6. 33.) In sailing southward from Troas to Assos, one has to round Cape Lectum, and keeping due east to run along the northern shore of the Gulf of Adramyttium, on which it lies. This is a sail of nearly forty miles; whereas by land, cutting right across, in a south-easterly direction, from sea to sea, by that excellent ROMAN ROAD

Spirit at Pentecost had thrown upon the Redeemer's Death and Resurrection; as appears from ch. 19. 2, 3. being fervent in the spirit: His heart warm, and cheerful, probably, of his gifts and attainments, he burned to impart to others the truth he had himself received. he spake and taught diligently—rather, 'accurately' (it is the same word as is rendered "perfectly" in v. 26). 26. speak boldly in the synagogue, when when Aquila and Priscilla heard—joying; to observe the extent of Scripture knowledge and evangelical truth which he displayed, and the fervency, courage, and eloquence with which he preached the truth. they took him unto them privately, and expounded unto him the way of God more perfectly—opening up those truths, to him as yet unknown, on which the Spirit had shed such glorious light. (In what appears to be the true reading of this verse, Priscilla is put before Aquila, as in v. 18, on which see; she being probably the more intelligent and devoted of the two.) One cannot but observe how providential it was that this couple should have been left at Ephesus when Paul sailed thence for Myria; and no doubt it was chiefly to pave the way for the better understanding of this episode that the fact is expressly mentioned by the historian in v. 19. We see here also an example of not only lay agency (as it is called) but female agency of the highest kind and with the most admirable fruit. Nor can one help admiring the humility and teachableness of so gifted a teacher in sitting at the feet of a Christian woman and her husband. 27, 28. And when he was disposed ("minded," "resolved": to pass into Achaia—of which Corinth, on the opposite coast (see on v. 1) was the capital; there to proclaim that Gospel which he now more fully comprehended. the brethren. We had not before heard of such gathered at Ephesus. But the desire of the Jews to whom Paul preached to retain him amongst them for some time (v. 20), and his promise to return to them (v. 21 seem to indicate some drawing towards the Gospel, which, no doubt, the zealous private labours of Priscilla and Aquila would ripen into discipleship. wrote, exhorting the disciples to receive him—a beautiful specimen of 'letters of recommendation' (as ch. 16. 23, 25-27, and see 2 Corinthians, 3. 1); by which, as well as by interchange of deputations, &c., the early churches maintained active Christian fellowship with each other. when he was come, helped them much—was a great ac-

ence to Paul's (1 Corinthians, 1. 12; 3. the marked infusion of Greek philosophy distinguished it, and which the apostle called 1 Corinthians, 2. 1-5). Paul having the upper cases or 'parts'—the interior, which, with reference to the sea-coast came to Ephesus—thus fulfilling his promise of finding certain disciples—in the same knowledge as Apollon at first, newly arrived and having had no communication with the church at Ephesus. Have ye received that ye believed?—rather, 'Received ye the things ye believed?' implying, certainly, that of necessity carry the other along with it (14-17). Why this question was asked but it was probably in consequence of passed between them from which they were to suspect the imperfection of their light, so much as heard whether there be any cannot be the meaning, since the person of the Holy Ghost, in connexion with an especial subject of the Baptist's teaching the words are, 'We did not even hear the Ghost was 'given'; meaning, at the baptism. That the word 'given' is the same as in John. 7. 39, seems plain from the case. 4. Then said Paul, John . . . baptism of (water unto) repentance, saying that they should believe on him which he baptized—i.e., who should baptize with him. The point of contrast is not between personally, but between the water baptism, repentance, and the promised baptism, the hands of his coming Master unto the facts, or at least the significance, which made the whole life and work of him from what it was conceived to be. 5-7. When they heard this—not the men in v. 4, but the subject expounded accord of those words. they were baptised—Paul himself (1 Corinthians, 1. 14). 8. Lord Jesus—into the whole fulness of it as now opened up to their believing in Paul had laid his hands upon them they sp

(see on ch. 20. 2, 3.) is twice called his third visitation, 12. 14; 13. 1. See on 2 Corinthians, which might seem inconsistent with this. The cross was quite a short one (see on ch. 18. 19) the close of this long stay at Ephesus, as we see in 1 Corinthians, 16. 8, he wrote his FIRST TO THE CORINTHIANS; also (though on this is divided), the EPISTLE TO THE GALATIANS, addressed to those Epistles.) And just as at the greatest success was after his withdrawal to the place of meeting (ch. 18. 7-10), so at Ephesus, they which dwell in (the Roman province of) the word of the Lord Jesus, both Jews and Gentiles, this is the "great door and effectual opened" while resident at Ephesus, 1 Corinthians, ch. 16. 8, induced him to make it his head-quarters for a period. The unwearied and varied charitable labours here are best seen in his own subscriptions to the Elders of Ephesus, ch. 20. 17, &c. Ephesus became the 'ecclesiastical centre for the region, as indeed it remained for a very long period. Churches arose at Colosse, Hierapolis eastward, either through his labours or those of his faithful helpers whom he sent in different directions, Epaphras, Archippus, &c. (presuming it to be the drachma, the current coin of the Levant, of about 10d. value). From their nature they would be costly, and books then bore a value above any standard we are familiar with. The scene must have been long remembered at Ephesus, as a strong proof of honest conviction on the part of the sorcerers and a striking triumph of Jesus Christ over the powers of darkness. The workers of evil were put to scorn, like Baal's priests on Carmel, and the word of God mightily grew and prevailed. [How.] 21, 22. After these things were ended ("completed")—implying something like a natural finish to his long period of labour at Ephesus, Paul purposed . . . when he had passed through Macedonia and Achaia, to go to Jerusalem . . . After I have been there I must see Rome also. Mark here the vastness of the apostle's missionary plans. They were all fulfilled, though he "saw Rome" only as a prisoner. So he sent into Macedonia Timotheus and Erastus—as his pioneers, in part to bring "them into remembrance of his ways which were in Christ" (1 Corinthians, 4. 17, and 1 Corinthians, 16. 10), partly to convey his mind on various matters. After a brief stay he was to return (1 Corinthians, 16. 11). It is very unlikely that this Erastus was "the chamberlain of the city" of Corinth, of that name (Romans, 16. 23). he himself staid in (the province of) Asia for a season—i.e., at Ephesus, its chief city. (Asia is mentioned in contrast with Macedonia in the previous clause.) 23. the same time—of Paul's proposed departure. about that 'the' way. So the new religion seemed then to be designated (ch. 9. 2; 22. 4; 24. 14). 24-26. silver shrines for ('of') Diana—small models of the Ephesian temple and of the shrine or chapel of the goddess, or of the shrine and statue alone, which were purchased by visitors as memorials of what they had seen, and were carried about and deposited in houses as a charm. (The models of the chapel of our Lady of Loretto, and such like which the Church of Rome systematically encourages, are such a palpable imitation of this heathen practice that it is no wonder it should be regarded by impartial judges as Christianity Paganized.) gain to the craftsmen—the master-artificers. Whom the called together with the workmen of like occupation—rather, 'with the workmen (or fabricators) of such articles,' meaning the artisans employed by the master-artificers, all who manufactured any kind of memorial of the temple and its worship for sale. ye see and hear—the evidences of it were to be seen, and the report of it was in everybody's mouth. that not alone at Ephesus, but almost throughout all Asia, this Paul hath turned away much people:—Noble testimony this to the extent of Paul's influence! saying that they be no gods which are made with hands. The universal belief of the people was that they were gods, though the more intelligent regarded them only as habitations of Deity, and some, probably, as mere aids to devotion. It is exactly so in the Church of Rome. 27. So that not only this our craft is in danger, but, &c.—i.e., 'that indeed is a small matter; but there is something far worse.' So the masters of the poor Pythoness put forward the religious revolution which Paul was attempting to effect at Philippi, as the sole cause of their zealous alarm, to cloak the self-interest which they felt to be touched by his success (ch. 16. 19-21). In both cases religious zeal was the hypocritical pretext; self-interest, the real moving cause of the opposition made. also the temple of the great goddess Diana . . . despised, and her magnificence . . . destroyed, whom all Asia and the world worshipped. It was reckoned one of the wonders of the world. It was built about 550 b.c., of pure white marble, and though burned by a fanatic on the night of the birth of Alexander the Great, b.c. 356 was rebuilt with more splendour than before. It was 435 feet long, by 230 broad, and the columns, 127 in number, were sixty feet in height, each of them the gift of a king, and thirty-six of them enriched with ornament and colour. It was which then existed, the distance was scarcely more than half. The one way Paul wished his companions to take, while he himself, longing perhaps to enjoy a period of solitude, took the other, joining the ship, by appointment, at Assos, came to Mitylene—the capital of the beautiful and classical island of Lesbos, which lies opposite the eastern shore of the Egean Sea, about thirty miles south of Assos; in whose harbour they seem to have lain for the night. 15, 16. came the next day over against Chios—now Scio: one of the most beautiful of those islands between which and the coast the sail is so charming. They appear not to have touched at it. next day we arrived ('touched' or 'put in') at Samos—another island coming quite close to the mainland, and about as far South of Chios as it is South of Lesbos. tarried (for the night) at Tragyllium—an anchorage on the projecting mainland, not more than a mile from the southern extremity of the island of Samos. next day we came to Miletus—on the mainland; the ancient capital of Ionia, near the mouth of the Meander. For Paul had determined to sail by (or 'sail past') Ephesus. He was right opposite to it when approaching Chios, because he would not spend time in Asia; (the Asian province of which Ephesus was the chief city, for he hastened, if possible . . . to be at Jerusalem the day of Pentecost—as a suitable season for giving in the great collection from all the western churches, for keeping the feast, and clearing his apostolic position with the church, then represented in large number at Jerusalem. The words imply that there was considerable ground to doubt if he would attain this object—for more than three of the seven weeks from Passover to Pentecost had already expired—and they are inserted evidently to explain why he did not once more visit Ephesus. 17. from Miletus he sent to Ephesus, and called the elders of the church. As he was now some forty miles South of Ephesus, we might think that more time would be lost by sending thus far for the elders to come to him, than by going at once to Ephesus itself, when so near it. But if unfavourable winds and stormy weather had overtaken them, his object could not have been attained, and perhaps he was unwilling to run the risk of detention at Ephesus by the state of the church and other causes. Those here called "elders" or "presbyters," are in v. 28 called "bishops." (See note there.) The identity of presbyters and bishops in the New Testament is beyond all reasonable dispute. 18. Ye know . . . after what manner I have been with you at all seasons, &c. for the Christian integrity and fidelity of his whole official intercourse with them he appeals to themselves. 19. Serving the Lord (Jesus) with all humility, . . . and many tears and temptations. Self-exaltation was unknown to him, and ease of mind: He "sowed in tears" from anxieties both on account of the converts for whom he "travell'd in birth" and of the Jews, whose bitter hostility was perpetually plotting against him, interrupting his work and endangering his life. 20. kept back—timidly withheld from fear of consequences. nothing that was profitable—edification directing all. have taught you publicly, and from house to house. Did an apostle, whose functions were of so wide a range, not feel satisfied without private as well as public ministrations? How then must pastors feel! [BENCKL.] 21. testifying both to Jews and Greeks (labouring under a common malady, and recoverable only by a common treatment) repentance toward God and faith towards our Lord Jesus Christ. See on ch. 5. 31. REPENTANCE, as distinguished from faith, is that state of the "honest and good heart" which arises from a discovery of one's contrariety to the righteous demands of the divine law. This is said to be "towards God," because seeing Him to be the party dishonoured by sin, it feels all its acknowledgments and compensations to be properly due to Him, as the great Lawgiver, and directs them to Him accordingly; condemning, humbling itself, and grieving before Him, looking also to Him as its only Hope of deliverance. FAITH is said to be "towards our Lord Jesus Christ," because, in that frame of mind just described, it eagerly credits the testimony of relief divinely provided in Christ, gladly embraces the overtures of reconciliation in Him, and directs all its expectations of salvation, from its first stage to its last, to Him as the one appointed Medium of all grace from God to a sinful world. Thus we have here a brief summary of all Gospel preaching. And it is easy to see why Repentance is here put before faith; for the former must of necessity precede the latter. There is a repentance subsequent to faith, the fruit of felt pardon and restoration. It was this which drew the tears with which the Saviour's feet were once so copiously moistened. (Luk. 7. 37, 38, 47; and cf. Ezekiel, 16. 63.) But that is not the light in which it is here presented. 22, 23. And now, behold, I ("I" is emphatic here) bound in the Spirit; cf. ch. 18. 21. This internal pressure, unattended with any knowledge of "what was to befall him there" was the result of that higher guidance which shaped all his movements. Says that the Holy Ghost witnesseth in every city, &c.—by prophetic utterances from city to city, as ch. 11. 4; 21. 10, 11. Analogous premonitions of coming events are not unknown to the general method of God's providence. They would tend to season the apostle's spirit. 24. But none of these things move me, neither, &c. — In this noble expression of absolute dedication to the service of Christ and preparedness for the worst that could befall him in such a cause, note (1) his jealousy for the peculiar character of his mission, as immediately from Christ Himself, on which all the charges against him turned; (2) the Burden of that Gospel which he preached—GRACE; it was "the Gospel of the Grace of God." 25-27. I know that ye all . . . shall see my face as men—not an inspired prediction of what was certainly to be, but what the apostle, in his peculiar circumstances, fully expected. Whether, therefore, he ever did see them again, is a question to be decided purely on its own evidence. I am pure from the blood of all men (ch. 18. 6; and cf. 1 Samuel, 12. 3, 6; Ezekiel, 3. 17-21; 33. 8, 9). For I have not shunned to declare all the counsel of God—God's way of Salvation, and His kingdom of souls saved by His Son Jesus Christ. See Luke, 7. 30. 28. Take heed . . . unto yourselves: cf. 1 Timothy, 3. 2-7; 4. 16; 6. 11. and to the flock: cf. Hebrews, 13. 17. Observe here how the personal is put before the pastoral care. ever . . . which the Holy Ghost hath made you—cf. John, 30. 23, 24; Ephesians, 4. 8, 11, 12; Revelation, 3. 1. (Ch. 14. 23, shows that the apostle did not mean to exclude human ordination.) overseers—or, as the same word is everywhere else rendered in our version, 'bishops.' The English Version has hardly dealt fair in this case with the sacred text, in rendering the word "overseers," whereas it ought here, as in all other places, to have been 'bishops,' in order that the fact of elders and bishops having been originally and apostolically synonymous, might be apparent to the ordinary English reader, which now it is not. [ALFORD.] The distinction between these offices cannot be certainly traced till the second century, nor was it established till late in that century, to feed the church of God—or 'the Church of the Lord.' Which of these two readings of the text is the true one, is a question which has divided the best critics. The evidence of MSS. preponderates in favour of 'THE LORD'; some of the most ancient Versions, though not all, so read; and Athanasius, the great champion of the supreme divinity of Christ early in the fourth century, says the expression 'Blood of God' is unknown to the Scriptures. Which reading, then, does the internal evidence favour? As 'Church of God' occurs nine times elsewhere in Paul's writings, and 'Church of the Lord' nowhere, the probability, it is said, is, that he used his wonted phraseology here also. But if he did, it is extremely difficult to see how so transcribers should have altered it into the phrase, 'Church of the Lord'; whereas, if did use this latter expression, and the note it so accordingly, it is easy to see how might, from being so accustomed to the word, write it 'Church of God.' On the whole, accept the second reading as most probable one. But see what follows, which he ed 'made his own,' 'acquired' with his own own' is emphatic; q. d. 'That glorified Lord is right hand of power in the heavens is id ruling the Church, and by His Spirit, nan agency, hath set you over it, cannot be its welfare in your hands, seeing He hath His own most precious blood, thus making y the dearest of all ties.' The transcendent y the Church of Christ is thus made to rest ty of its Lord and the consequent precious blood which He shed for it. And as the oning character of Christ's death is here used, so His supreme dignity is implied as a second reading as it is expressed by the a motive to pastoral fidelity is here fur- 30. after my departure shall grievous wolves g you—Two classes of coming enemies are sed, the one more external to themselves, d in the bosom of their own community: o be teachers, but the one, "grievous sparing, i. e., making a prey of the flock; mply sectarian "perverters" of the truth, v of drawing a party after them. VER. 1-16. SAILING FROM EPHEBUS, THEY LAND AT TYRE, AND THENCE SAILING TO PTOLEMAIS, THEY PROCEED BY LAND TO CESAREA AND JERUSALEM. 1. we were gotten ('torn') from them—expressing the difficulty and pain of the parting, with a straight course—running before the wind, as ch. 16. 11. unto Coos ('Cos')—an island due South from Miletus, which they would reach in about six hours, and coming close to the mainland, the day following unto Rhodes—another island, some fifty miles to the South East, of brilliant classic memory and beauty, thence unto Patara—a town on the magnificent mainland of Lycia, almost due East from Rhodes. It was the seat of a celebrated oracle of Apollo. 2. And finding a ship (their former one going no further, probably) to Phenicia. See on ch. 11. 19. went aboard. One would almost think this extracted from a journal of the voyage, so graphic are its details. 3. when we . . . discovered ('sighted,' as the phrase is.) Cyprus, we left it on the left hand—i. e., steered South East of it, leaving it on the North West, sailed into ('unto') Syria, and landed at Tyre—the celebrated seat of maritime commerce for East and West. It might be reached from Patara in about two days. There the ship was to unlade her burden—which gave the apostle time for what follows. 4-6. finding disciples ('finding out the disciples')—implying some search. They would expect such, from what is recorded, ch. 11. 19. Perhaps they were not many; yet there were gifted ones among them, who said to Paul . . . that he should not go to Jerusalem. See on ch. 20. 23; also on v. 11-14. they all brought us on our way with wives and children, . . . and we kneeled down on the shore and prayed, &c. See on ch. 20. 36-38. Observe here that the children of these Tyrian disciples not only were taken along with their parents, but must have joined in this act of solemn worship. See on Ephesians, 6. 1. 7. when we had finished our course ('completing the voyage') from Tyre, we came (which they would do the same day) to Ptolemais—anciently called Accho (Judges, 1. 31) now St. Jean d'Acree, or Acree. and saluted the brethren, and abode, &c.—disciples gathered probably as at Tyre, on the occasion mentioned ch. 11. 19. 8-10. next day [that were of Paul's company] departed. Finding himself in good time for Pentecost at Jerusalem, he would feel it a refreshing thing to his spirit to hold Christian communion for a few days with such a family. there came down from Judea (the news of Paul's arrival having spread) a certain prophet, . . . Agabus—no doubt the same as in ch. 11. 28. 11-14. So shall the Jews bind the man that owneth this girdle, &c. For though the Romans did it, it was at the Jews' instigation, v. 33; ch. 28. 17. Such dramatic methods of announcing important future events would bring the old prophets to remembrance. (cf. Isaiah, 20. 2, &c.; Jeremiah, 13. 1, and Ezekiel, 4. 1, &c.) This prediction and that at Tyre (v. 4) were intended, not to prohibit him from going, but to put his courage to the test, and, when he stood the test, to deepen and mature it. We and they at that place (the Cæsarean Christians) besought him (even with tears, v. 12) not to go to Jerusalem. Then Paul answered, What mean ye to weep and break mine heart, &c. Beautiful union of manly resoluteness and womanly tenderness, alike removed from mawkishness and stoicism! I am ready not to be bound only. g.d. 'If that is all, let it come.' but to die, &c. It was well he could add this, for he had that also to do. 15, 16. We took up our baggage, ('our baggage') and went up to Jerusalem—for the A/11 time after his conversion, thus concluding his third missionary tour, which proved his last, so far as recorded; for though he accomplished the fourth and last part of the missionary plan sketched out, ch. 18, 21—"After I have been at Jerusalem, I must also see Rome"—it was as "a prisoner of Jesus Christ." went with us... and brought with them (rather, 'brought us to') one Mnason of Cyprus, an old disciple, &c.—not an aged disciple, but probably 'a disciple of old standing,' perhaps one of the 3,000 converted on the day of Pentecost, or, more likely still, drawn to the Saviour Himself during His lifetime. He had come, probably, with the other Cyprians (ch. 11, 29) to Antioch, "preaching the Lord Jesus unto the Grecians," and now he appears settled at Jerusalem.

17-40. PAUL REPORTS THE EVENTS OF HIS THIRD MISSIONARY JOURNEY—IN THE TEMPLE, PURIFYING HIMSELF FROM A JEWISH VOW, HE IS SEIZED BY A MOB AND BEATEN TO THE DANGER OF HIS LIFE—THE UPROAR BECOMING UNIVERSAL, THE ROMAN COMMANDANT HAS HIM BROUGHT IN CHAINS TO THE FORTRESS, FROM THE STAIRS OF WHICH HE IS PERMITTED TO ADDRESS THE PEOPLE. The apostle was full of anxiety about this visit to Jerusalem, from the numerous prophetic intimations of danger awaiting him, and having reason to expect the presence at this feast of the very parties from whose virulent rage he had once and again narrowly escaped with his life. Hence we find him asking the Roman Christians to wrestle with him in prayer, "for the Lord Jesus Christ's sake, and for the love of the Spirit, that he might be delivered from them that believed not in Judea," as well as "that his service which he had for Jerusalem (the great collection for the poor saints there) might be accepted of the saints," Romans, 15, 30, 31. 17-19. The brethren received us gladly—the disciples generally, as distinguished from the official reception recorded in v. 18. Paul went in with us unto James; and all the elders were present—to "report himself" formally to the acknowledged head of the church at Jerusalem, and his associates in office. See on ch. 15, 13. Had any other of the apostles been in Jerusalem on that occasion, it could hardly fail to have been noted, he declared particularly (in detail) what God had wrought among the Gentiles by his ministry—as on previous occasions, ch. 14, 27; and see Romans, 15, 16; no doubt referring to the insidious and systematic efforts of the Judaizing party in a number of places, to shrive the Church of Christ into a Jewish sect, and his own counterprocedure. 20-25. they glorified the Lord, &c.—constrained to justify his course, notwithstanding the Jewish complexion of the Christianity of Jerusalem, they are informed... that thou testest all the Jews which are among the Gentiles (those residing in heathen countries) to forsake Moses, &c. PAUL’S DEFENCE BEFORE THE SANHEDRIM THE RIVAL FACTIONS, FROM WHOM THE COMMANDANT HAD THE APOSTLE RECOVERED THE FORTRESS. 1. PAUL, INSTANTLY BEHOLDING—with a look of conscious integrity and courage, perhaps also recognising some of low-pupils. I have lived in all good conscience still this day, &c. The word has an indirect ‘the polity’ or ‘commonwealth of Israel,’ would signify that he had been, and was r, an honest and God-fearing member. 2. Iest . . . commanded . . . to smite him on the ethod of silencing a speaker, common in this day. [HACKET.] But for a judge thus isomer on his trial, for merely prefacing his protestation of his integrity, was infamous,

3, 4. God shall smite thee—as indeed He did; for he was killed by an assassin during the Jewish war. (JOSEPHUS’ Jewish War, ii. 17. 9.) thou whited wall—i.e., hypocrite (Matthew, 23. 27). This epithet, however, correctly describing the man, must not be defended as addressed to a judge, though the remonstrance which follows—“for sittest thou,” &c.—ought to have put him to shame. 5. I wist not that he was the high priest. All sorts of explanations of this have been given. The high priesthood was in a state of great confusion and constant change at this time (as appears from Josephus’, and the apostle’s long absence from Jerusalem, and perhaps the manner in which he was habited, or the seat he occupied, with other circumstances to us unknown, may account for such a speech. But if he was thrown off his guard by an insult which touched him to the quick, ‘what can surpass the grace with which he recovered his self-possession, and the frankness with which he acknowledged his error? If his conduct in yielding to the momentary impulse was not that of Christ himself under a similar provocation (John, 18. 22, 23), certainly the manner in which he atoned for his fault was Christ-like.’ [HACKET.] 6-9. when Paul perceived (from the discussion which plainly had by this time arisen between the parties) that the one part were Sadducees, and the other Pharisees, he cried out (raising his voice above both parties), I am a Pharisee, the son of a Pharisee (the true reading seems to be, ‘the son of Pharisees,’ i.e., belonging to a family who from father to son had long been such): of the hope and resurrection of the dead (i.e., not the vague hope of immortality, but the definite expectation of the resurrection) I am called in question. By this adroit stroke, Paul engages the whole Pharisaic section of the council in his favour; the doctrine of a resurrection being common to both, though they would totally differ in their application of it. This was, of course, quite warrantable, and the more so as it was already evident that no impartiality in trying his cause was to be looked from such an assembly. the Sadducees say . . . there is no resurrection, neither angel, nor spirit. See on Luke, 20. 37. the scribes . . . of the Pharisees’ part . . . strive, saying, We find no evil in this man, but (as to those startling things which he brings to our ears) if a spirit or an angel hath spoken to him—referring, perhaps, to his trance in the temple, of which he had told them, ch. 22. 17. They put this favourable construction upon his proceedings for no other reason than that they had found him one of their own party. They care not to enquire into the truth of what he alleged, over and above their opinions, but only to explain it away as something not worth raising a noise about. (The following words, “Let us not fight against God,” seem not to belong to the original text, and perhaps are from ch. 5. 39. In this case, either the meaning is, ‘If he has had some divine communication, what of that!’ or, the conclusion of the sentence may have been drowned in the hubbub which the next verse shows to have been intense.) 10. the chief captain, fearing lest Paul should have been pulled to pieces . . . commanded the soldiers to go down and take him by force, &c. This shows that the commandant was not himself present, and further, that instead of the Sanhedrim trying the cause, the proceedings quickly consisted in the one party attempting to seize the prisoner, and the other to protect him.

11-35. IN THE FORTRESS PAUL IS CREED BY A NIGHT VISION—AN INFAMOUS CONSPIRACY TO ASSASSINATE HIM IS PROVIDENTIALLY DEFEATED, AND HE IS DESPATCHED BY NIGHT WITH A LETTER FROM THE COMMANDANT TO FELIX AT CESAREA, BY WHOM ARRANGEMENTS ARE MADE FOR A HEARING OF HIS CAUSE. 11. the night following—his heart perhaps sinking, in the solitude of his barrack-ward, and thinking perhaps that all the predictions of danger at Jerusalem were now to be fulfilled in his death there. the

Lord (i.e., Jesus) stood by him. . . He of good cheer, Paul; for as thou hast testified of me in Jerusalem, so must thou also at Rome; q.d. 'Thy work in Jerusalem is done, faithfully and well done; but thou art not to die here; thy purpose next to "see Rome" (ch. 19, 21) shall not be disappointed, and there also must thou bear witness of Me.' As this vision was not unneeded now, so we shall find it cheering and upholding him throughout all that befell him up to his arrival there. 13-14. bound themselves with a curse. . . that they would neither eat . . . till they had killed Paul; cf. 1 Samuel, 2, 25; 1 Samuel, 14, 24. 15. Now . . . ye with the counsel signify by the chief captain. . . as though, &c. That these high ecclesiastics fell in readily with this infamous plot is clear. What will not unscrupulous and hypocritical religionists do under the mask of religion! The narrative bears unmistakable internal marks of truth, or ever he came near. Their plan was to assassinate him on his way down from the barracks to the council. The case was critical, but He who had pledged His word to him that he should testify for Him at Rome provided unexpected means of defeating this well-laid scheme. 18-22. Paul's sister's son. See on ch. 9, 29. If he was at this time residing at Jerusalem for his education, like Paul himself, he may have got at the schools those hints of the conspiracy on which he so promptly acted. Then Paul called one of the centurions. Though divinely assured of safety he never allows this to interfere with the duty he owed to his own life and the work he had yet to do. (See on ch. 27, 23-25, 31.) took him by the hand. This shows that he must have been quite in his boyhood, and throws a pleasing light on the kind-hearted impartiality of this officer. and now are they ready, looking for a promise from thee. Thus, as is so often the case with God's people, not till the last moment, when the plot was all prepared, did deliverance come. 23, 24. two hundred soldiers—a formidable guard for such an occasion; but Roman officials felt their honour concerned in the preservation of the public peace, and the danger of an attempted rescue would seem to require it. This was not done when he wrote, but would be ere the letter reached. 31, 32. brought him to Antipatris—nearly forty miles from Jerusalem, on the way to Caesarea; so named by Herod in honour of his father, Antipater. On the morrow they (the infantry) left the horse—themselves no longer needed as a guard. The remaining distance was about twenty-five or twenty-six miles. 34, 35. asked of what province he was—the letter describing him as a Roman citizen. I will hear thee. The word means, 'give thee a full hearing,' to be kept in Herod's judgment-hall—'pretorium,' the palace built at Caesarea by Herod, and now occupied by the Roman procurators; in one of the buildings attached to which Paul was ordered to be kept.

CHAPTER XXIV.

But. . . Lytias came upon us, and with great violence took him out of our hands—a wilful falsehood and calumnious charge against a public officer. He had commanded the Sanhedrim to meet for no other purpose than to "judge him according to their law;" and only when, instead of doing so, they fell to disputing among themselves, and the prisoner was in danger of being "pulled in pieces of them" (ch. 23, 10)—or as his own letter says "killed of them" (ch. 23, 27)—did he rescue him, as was his duty, "by force" out of their hands. commanding his accusers to come unto thee. Here they insinuate that, instead of troubling Felix with the case, he ought to have left it to be dealt with by the Jewish tribunal; in which case his life would soon have been taken, by examining whom (Lytias, as would seem, v. 22) thyself mayest, &c.—referring all, as if with confidence to Felix. The Jews assailed, &c. See on ch. 23, 15, 10. thou hast been many years a judge to this nation. He had been in this province for six or seven years, and in Galilee for a longer period. Paul uses no flattery, but simply expresses his satisfaction at having to plead before one whose long official experience of Jewish matters would enable him the better to understand and appreciate what he had to say. 11. thou mayest understand (cannot easily learn) that there are but twelve days since I went up to Jerusalem; viz., 1. The day of his arrival in Jerusalem (ch. 21, 15-17); 2. the interview with James (ch. 21, 18, &c.); 3. The assumption of the vow (ch. 21, 20); 4, 5, 6, continuance of the vow, interrupted by the arrest (ch. 21, 27, &c.); 7. Arrest of Paul (ch. 21, 27); 8. Paul before the Sanhedrim (ch. 22, 30; 23, 1-10); 9. Conspiracy of the Jews and defeat of it (ch. 23, 12, &c.), and despatch of Paul from Jerusalem on the evening of the same day (ch. 23, 23, 31); 10, 11, 12, 13, the remaining period referred to, ch. 24, 1. [MEYER.] This short period is mentioned to show how unlikely it was that he should have had time to do what was charged against him. for to worship—a very different purpose from that imputed to him. 12, 13. they neither found me. . . neither can they prove the things, &c. After specifying several particulars, he challenges proof of any one of the charges brought against him. So much for the charge of sedition. 14, 15. But this I confess to thee (in which Felix would see no crime), that after the way they call heresy (id., and better, 'a sect'), so worship I the God of my fathers ('the ancestral God'). Two arguments are contained here: (1.) Our nation is divided into what they call 'sects'—the sect of the Pharisees, and that of the Sadducees—all the difference between them and me is, that I belong to neither of these, but to another sect, or religious section of the nation, which from its Head they call Nazarenes;—for this reason, ed in some measure his safety at the recent 23. 6-9, had been quite momentary. 16. On this account, 'Accordingly': q.d. look to that awful day. (cf. 2 Corinthians, 5. 12. myself. The "I" here is emphatic: q.d. they do, this is my study.' to have always had of offence, &c. See ch. 23. 1; 2 Corinthians 17, &c. q.d. 'These are the great principles of conduct—how different from turbulence and anarchy? 17. Now, after many (several) years in Jerusalem I came to bring alms to my ring to the collection from the churches of Asia and Greece, which he had taken such pains his only allusion in the Acts to what is so frequently in his own epistles (Romans, Corinthians, 16. 1-4; 3 Corinthians, 8. 1-4) cast a light on the truth of this History. (How Pauline.) and (to present) offerings with his Jewish vow: see next verse. 18. sacrificed in the temple—not polluting it, therein presence, and neither gathering a crowd about: If then these Asiatic Jews have any objection against me in justification of their why are they not here to substantiate it? as . . . here say:—'Or, passing from all that trial, let those of the Sanhedrim here (I was guilty of aught there, &c. No doubt such to the high priest might occur to them, occasion to it on his own part was more than he willing to recall. Except . . . this one seeking the resurrection, &c. This would Pharisees present their own inconsistency, against him then and now accusing him. 23. we have perfect knowledge of that ('the') way. 23; and on v. 10. when Lytias . . . shall all know, &c. Felix might have dismissed Lytias and others involved, a brief delay worthy of him as a judge. Certainly, so he did, neither Lytias nor any other parties in the case. Verse 23, however, seems at that time his prepossessions in favour of Lytias. 24. 25. Felix . . . with his wife Drusilla. This beautiful but infamous woman and relying on the influence of his brother Pallas at court, he thought himself at liberty to commit every sort of crime with impunity. How noble the fidelity and courage which dared to treat of such topics in such a presence, and what withering power must have been in those appeals which made even a Felix to tremble! Go thy way for this time; and when I have a convenient season I will call for thee. Alas for Felix! This was his golden opportunity, but—like multitudo stultorum—he missed it. Convenient seasons in abundance he found to call for Paul, but never again to "hear him concerning the faith in Christ," and writhe under the terrors of the wrath to come. Even in these moments of terror he had no thought of submission to the Cross or a change of life. The word described the thoughts and intents of his heart, but that heart even then clung to its idols; even as Herod who "did many things and heard John gladly," but in his best moments was enslaved to his lusts. How many Felixes have appeared from age to age! He hoped . . . that money should have been given him . . . wherefore he sent for him the oftener, and communed with him. Bribery in a judge was punishable by the Roman law, but the spirit of a slave to use the words of Tacitus: was in all his acts, and his "communing with Paul"—as if he cared for either him or his message—simply added hypocrisy to meanness. The position in life of Paul's Christian visitors might beget the hope of extracting something from them for the release of their champion; but the apostle would rather lie in prison than stoop to this! after two years, &c. What a trial to this burning missionary of Christ, to suffer such a tedious period of inaction! How mysterious it would seem! But this repose would be medicine to his spirit; he would not, and could not, be entirely inactive, so long as he was able by pen and message to communicate with the churches; and he would doubtless learn the salutary truth that even he was not essential to his Master's cause. That Luke wrote his Gospel during this period, under the apostle's superintendence, is the not unlikely conjecture of able critics. Forcius Festus. Little is known of him. He died a few years after this. (JOSEPHUS' Antiquities, xx. 8. 9, to 9. 1.) came into Felix' room. He was recalled, on accusations against him by the Jews of Caesarea, and only acquitted through the intercession of his brother formed him against Paul . . . desired favour (in v. 14, "judgment") against him. It would seem that they had the insolence to ask him to have the prisoner executed even without a trial (v. 16). laying wait . . . to kill him. How deep must have been their hostility, when two years after the defeat of their former attempt, they thirst as keenly as ever for his blood. Their plea for having the case tried at Jerusalem, where the alleged offence took place was plausible enough; but from v. 10 it would seem that Festus had been made acquainted with their causeless malice, and that in some way which Paul was privy to. 4-6. answered . . . that Paul should be kept (rather, 'is in custody') at Caesarea, and himself would depart shortly thither. Let them . . . which among you are able, go down—'your leading men,' the Jews . . . from Jerusalem—clamorously, as at Jerusalem, see v. 34. many and grievous complaints against Paul. From his reply, and Festus' statement of the case before Agrippa, these charges seem to have been a jumble of political and religious matter which they were unable to substantiate, and vociferous cries that he was unfit to live. Paul's reply, not given in full, was probably little more than a challenge to prove any of their charges, whether political or religious. 9, 10. Festus, willing to do the Jews a pleasure (to ingratiate himself with them), said, Wilt thou go up to Jerusalem, and . . . be judged . . . before me (or 'under my protection'). If this was meant in earnest, it was temporizing and vacillating. But, possibly, anticipating Paul's refusal, he wished merely to avoid the odium of refusing to remove the trial to Jerusalem. Then said Paul, I stand at Cesar's judgment-seat—i.e., I am already before the proper tribunal. This seems to imply that he understood Festus to propose handing him over to the Sanhedrim for judgment (and see on v. 11, with a mere promise of protection from him. But from going to Jerusalem at all he was too well justified in shrinking, for there assassination had been quite recently planned against him. to the Jews have I done no wrong, as thou knowest very well—hi, 'better,' i.e., 'perhaps' better than to press such a proposal. If there be none of these things . . . no man may deliver me unto them. The word signifies 'surrender in order to gratify' another. I appeal to Cesar. The right of appeal to the supreme power, in cases of life and death, was secured by an ancient law to every Roman citizen, and continued under the empire. Had Festus shown any disposition to pronounce final judgment, Paul, strong in the consciousness of his innocence and the justice of a Roman tribunal, would not have made this appeal. But when the only other alternative offered him was to give his own consent to be transferred to the great hotbed of plots against his life, and to a tribunal of unscrupulous and bloodthirsty ecclesiastics whose vociferous cries for his death had scarcely subsided, no other course was open to him. 12. Festus little expecting such an appeal, but bound to respect it having conferred with the council 'his assessors in judgment, as to the admissibility of the appeal, said, Hast thou for 'thou hast' . . . to Cesar shalt thou go—as if he would add 'perhaps' and see if thou fare better.

13-27. HEROD AGRIPPA II., ON A VISIT TO FESTUS, BEING CONSULTED BY HIM ON PAUL'S CASE, DESIRES TO HEAR THE APPEAL, WHO IS ACCORDINGLY BROUGHT FORTH. 13. King Agrippa—great grandson of Herod the Great, and Drusilla's brother (see on ch. 24, 24). On his father's awful death (ch. 12, 23), being thought too young (17) to succeed, Judea was attached to the province of Syria. Four years after, on the death of his uncle Herod, he was made king of the northern principalities of Chalcis, and afterwards got Batanea, Iturea, Trachonitis, Abilene, Galilee, and Perea, with the title of king. He died A. D. 100, after reigning fifty-one years, and Bernice—his sister. She was married to her uncle Herod, king of Chalcis, on whose death she lived with her brother Agrippa—not without suspicion of incestuous intercourse, which her subsequent licentious life tended to confirm. came to salute Festus—to pay his respects to him on his accession to the procuratorship. 14, 15. when there many ('several') days, Festus desired Paul's cause—taking advantage of the presence of one who might be presumed to know such matters better than himself; though the lapse of "several days" ere the subject was touched on shows that it gave Festus little trouble. 16-21. to deliver any man to die. See on the word "deliver up" v. 11. as I supposed ('suspected')—crimes punishable by civil law, questions of their own superstitions—rather 'religion' (see on ch. 17, 22). It cannot be supposed that Festus would use the word in any discourteous sense in addressing his Jewish guest, one Jesus. 'Thus speaks this miserable Festus of Him to whom every knee shall bow.' [EXEGET.] whom Paul affirmed ('kept affirming') was alive—showing that the resurrection of the Crucified One had been the burden, as usual, of Paul's pleading. The insignificance of the whole affair in the eyes of Festus is manifest, because I doubted of such manner of questions. The "I" is emphatic:—I, as a Roman judge, being at a loss how to deal with such matters, the hearing of Augustus—the imperial title first conferred by the Roman Senate on Octavia. 23-27. I would also hear 'should like to hear' the man myself. No doubt Paul was right when he said, "The king knoweth of these things . . . for I am persuaded that none of these things are hidden from him; for this thing was not done in a corner" (ch. 26, 26). Hence his curiosity to see and hear the man who had raised such commotion and was remodelling to such an extent the old Jewish life, when Agrippa was come, and Bernice, with great pomp—in the same city in which their father, on account of his pride, had perished, eaten up of worms. [WYLLIE.] with the chief captains. See on ch. 21, 32. Josephus' Jewish War, iii. 4, 2, says that five cohorts, whose full complement was 1000 men, were stationed at Caesarea, principal men of the city—both Jews and Romans. 'This was the most dignified and influential audience Paul had yet addressed, and the prediction, ch. 9, 15, was fulfilled, though afterwards still more remarkably at Rome, ch. 27, 24; 2 Timothy, 4, 16, 17.' [WEBSTER & WILKINSON.] I have no certain ('definite') thing to write to my lord—Nero. 'The writer's accuracy should be remarked here. It would have been a mistake to apply this term ("lord") to the emperor a few years earlier. Neither Augustus nor Tiberius would let himself be so called, as implying the relation of master and slave. But it had now come rather, was coming' into use as one of the imperial titles.' [HACKET.]

CHAPTER XXVI.

VER. 1-32. PAUL'S DEFENCE OF HIMSELF BEFORE AGRIPPA, WHO PRONOUNCES HIM INNOCENT, BUT CONCLUDES THAT THE APPEAL TO CESAR MUST BE CARRIED OUT. This speech, though in substance the same as that from the fortress-stairs of Jerusalem (ch. 22), differs from it in being less directed to meet the charge of apostasy from the Jewish faith, and giving more enlarged views of his remarkable change and apostolic commission, and the divine support under which he was enabled to brave the hostility of his countrymen. 1-3. Agrippa said, Being a king he appears to have presided, Paul stretching forth the hand—chained to a soldier (v. 29, and see on ch. 12, 6. I know thee to be expert, &c. His father was zealous for the law, and himself had the office of president of the temple and its treasures, and the appointment of the high priest. [JOSEPHUS' Antiquities, xx. 1, 3.] hear me patiently—The idea of 'indulgently' is also conveyed. 4, 5. from my youth, which was at the first, at Jerusalem, know all the Jews; which knew me from the beginning—plainly showing that he received his education even from early youth, at Jerusalem. See on ch. 22. 3. if they would ('were willing to') testify—but this, of course, they were not, it being a strong point in his favour. after the most strictest—"the strictest" sect—as the Pharisees confessedly were. This was said to meet the charge, that as a Hellenistic Jew he had contracted among the Hellenistic Jews ideas of Jewish peculiarities. 6, 7, 1... am judged for the hope of the promise made... to our fathers—for believing that the promise of Messiah, the Hope of the Church (ch. 13. 23; 28, 20) has been fulfilled in Jesus of Nazareth risen from the dead, unto which promise (the fulfilment of it our twelve tribes—James, 1. 1; and see on Luke, 2. 36. instantly—'intently'; see on ch. 12. 5. serving God—in the sense of religious worship; see on "ministered," ch. 13. 2. day and night hope to come. The apostle rises into language as catholic as the thought—representing his despised nation, all scattered though it now was, as twelve great branches of one ancient stem, in all places of their dispersion offering to the God of their fathers one unbroken worship, resting on one great 'promise' made of old unto their fathers, and sustained by one "hope" of "coming" to its fulfilment; the single point of difference between him and his countrymen, and the one cause of all their violence against him, being, that his hope had found rest in One already come, while theirs still pointed to the future. For which hope's sake, king Agrippa, I am accused of the Jews—"I am accused of Jews, O king" so the true reading appears to be); of all quarters the most surprising for such a charge to come from. The charge of sedition is not so much as alluded to throughout this speech. It was indeed a mere pretext. 8. Why should it be thought a thing incredible... that God should raise the dead?—rather, 'Why is it judged a thing incredible if God raises the dead? the case being viewed as an accomplished fact. No one dared to call in question the overwhelming evidence of the resurrection of Jesus, which proclaimed Him to be the Christ, the Son of God; the only way of getting rid of it, therefore, was to pronounce it incredible. But why, asks the apostle, is it so judged? Leaving this pregnant question to find its answer in the breasts of his audience, he now passes to his personal history. 9-15. See on ch. 8. 1, &c., and of ch. 22. 4, &c. 16-18. But rise, &c. Here the apostle appears to condense into one statement various sayings of his Lord to him in visions at different times, in order to present at one view the grandeur of the commission with which his Master had clothed him. [ALFORD.] a minister... both of these things which thou hast seen (putting him on a footing with those "eye-witnesses and ministers of the word" mentioned Luke, 1. 2; and of those in which I will appear to thee—referring to visions he was thereafter to be favoured with; such as ch. 18. 9, 10; 22. 17-21; 23. 11; 2 Corinthians, 12. &c. [Galatians, 1. 12.] delivering thee from the people (the Jews) and from the Gentiles. He was all along the object of Jewish malignity, and was at that moment in the hands of the Gentiles; yet he calmly reposes on his Master's assurances of deliverance from both, at the same time taking all precautions for safety and vindicating all his legal rights. unto whom now I send thee. The emphatic "I" here denotes the authority of the Sender. [BENGEL.] To open their eyes, [and] to turn them from darkness to light—rather, 'that they may turn' (as in v. 20.) i.e., as the effect of their eyes being opened. The whole passage leans upon Isaiah, 61. 1 (Luke, 4. 18.) and from the power of Satan. Note the connexion here between being "turned from darkness" and "from the power of Satan," whose whole power over men lies in keeping them in the dark; Hence he is called "the ruler of the darkness of this world." See on 2 Corinthians, 4. 4. that they may receive forgiveness... and inheritance among the sanctified by faith that is in me. Note: Faith is here made the instrument of salvation at once in its first stage, forgiveness, and its last, admission to the home of the sanctified; and the faith which introduces the soul to all this is emphatically declared by the glorified Redeemer to rest upon Himself—"FAITH, even THAT WHICH IS IN ME." And who that believes this can refrain from casting his crown before Him or resist offering Him supreme worship? 19-21. Whereupon, O king Agrippa, I was not disobedient unto the heavenly vision. This musical and elevated strain, which carries the reader along with it, and doubtless did the hearers, bespeaks the lofty region of thought and feeling to which the apostle had risen while rehearsing his Master's communications to him from heaven. showed to them of Damascus and at Jerusalem—omitting Arabia; because, beginning with the Jews, his object was to mention first the places where his former hatred of the name of Christ was best known; the mention of the Gentiles, so unpalatable to his audience, is reserved to the last. repent and turn to God, and do works meet for repentance—a brief description of conversion and its proper fruits, suggested, probably, by the Baptist's teaching, Luke 3. 7, 8. 22, 23. having obtained help (succour) from God (that [which cometh] from God, I continue 'stand.' 'hold my ground') unto this day, witnessing, &c.: q.d. This life of mine, so marvellously preserved, in spite of all the plots against it, is upheld for the Gospel's sake; therefore I "witnessed," &c. that Christ should suffer, &c. The construction of this sentence implies that in regard to the question 'whether the Messiah is a suffering one and whether, rising first from the dead, he should show light to the [Jewish] people and to the Gentiles,' he had only said what the prophets and Moses said should come. 24. Festus said with a loud voice—surprised and bewildered. Paul, thou art beside thyself, much learning doth make thee mad—q.d. is turning thy head. The union of flowing Greek, deep acquaintance with the sacred writings of his nation, reference to a resurrection and other doctrines to a Roman utterly unintelligible, and above all, lofty religious earnestness, so strange to the cultivated, cold-hearted sceptics of that day—may account for this sudden exclamation. 25, 26. I am not mad, most noble Festus, but, &c. Can any thing surpass this reply, for readiness, self-possession, calm dignity? Every word of it refuted the rude charge, though Festus, probably, did not intend to hurt the prisoner's feelings, the king knoweth, &c. See on v. 1-3. 27-29. believest thou the prophets? I know that thou believest. The courage and confidence here shown proceeded from a vivid persuasion of Agrippa's knowledge of the facts and faith in the predictions which they verified; and the king's reply is the highest testimony to the correctness of these presumptions and the immense power of such bold yet courteous appeals to conscience. Almost or 'in a little time' thou persuadest me to be a Christian. Most modern interpreters think the ordinary translation inadmissible, and take the meaning to be, 'Thou thinkest to make me with little persuasion (or small trouble) a Christian—but I am not to be so easily turned.' But the apostle's reply can scarcely suit any but the sense given in our authorized version, which is that adopted by CREECHSTON and some of the best scholars since. The objection on which so much stress is laid, that the word "Christian" was at that time only a term of contempt, has no force except on the other side; for taking it in that view, the sense is, 'Thou wilt soon have me one of that despised sect.' I would to God, &c. What unequalled magnanimity does this speech breathe! Only his Master ever towered above this. not only... almost... but altogether—or, 'whether soon or late,' or 'with little or much difficulty.' These three bonds—doubtless holding up his two chained hands (see on ch. 12. 6; which in closing such a noble utterance must have had an electrical effect. 30-32. when he had thus spoken, the king rose—not over-easy, we may be sure. This man might have been set at liberty if he had not appealed to Cæsar. It would seem from this that such appeals, once made, behoved to be carried out.

CHAPTER XXVII.

Ver. 1-44. THE VOYAGE TO ITALY—THE SHIPWRECK AND SAFE LANDING AT MALTA. 1. we should sail, &c. The "we" here re-introduces the Historian as one of the company. Not that he had left the apostle from the time when he last included himself—ch. 21. 15—but the apostle was parted from him by his arrest and imprisonment, until now, when they met in the ship. delivered Paul and certain other prisoners—state-prisoners going to be tried at Rome; of which several instances are on record. Julius—who treats the apostle throughout with such marked courtesy (v. 2, 43; ch. 28. 16, that it has been thought [BENSON] he was present when Paul made his defence before Agrippa (see ch. 26. 29), and was impressed with his lofty bearing, a centurion of Augustus' band—the Augustan cohort, an honorary title given to more than one legion of the Roman army, implying, perhaps, that they acted as a body-guard to the emperor or procurator, as occasion required. 2. a ship of (belonging to) Adramyttium—a port on the North East coast of the Egean Sea. Doubtless the centurion expected to find another ship, bound for Italy, at some of the ports of Asia Minor, without having to go with this ship all the way to Adramyttium; and in this he was not disappointed. See on v. 6. meaning to sail by the coasts ('places') of Asia—a coasting vessel, which was to touch at the ports of proconsular Asia. [one] Aristarchus, a Macedonian of Thessalonica, being with us—rather, 'Aristarchus the Macedonian,' &c. The word "one" should not have been introduced here by our translators, as if this name had not occurred before; for we find him seized by the Ephesian mob as a "man of Macedonia and Paul's companion in travel," ch. 19. 29, and as a "Thessalonian" accompanying the apostle from Ephesus on his voyage back to Palestine, ch. 20. 4. Here both these places are mentioned in connexion with his name. After this we find him at Rome with the apostle, Colossians, 4. 10; Philimon, 24. 3. next day touched at Sidon. To reach this ancient and celebrated Mediterranean port, about seventy miles North from Cesarea, in one day, they must have had a fair wind. Julius courteously (see on v. 1 gave him liberty to go to his friends—no doubt disciples, gained, it would seem, by degrees, all along the Phœnician coast since the first preaching there (see on ch. 11. 19; and 21. 4). to refresh himself—which after his long confinement would not be unnecessary. Such small personal details are in this case extremely interesting. 4. when we had launched ('set sail') from Tyane, we sailed under Cyprus, because the winds were contrary. The wind blowing from the westward, probably with a touch of the North, which was adverse, they sailed under the lee of Cyprus, keeping it on their left, and steering between it and the mainland of Phœnicia. 5. when we had sailed over the sea of Cilicia and Pamphylia—coasts with which Paul had been long familiar, the one, perhaps, from boyhood, the other from the time of his first missionary tour. we came to Myra, a city of Lycia—a port a little East of Patara (see on ch. 21. 1). 6. there... found a ship of Alexandria, sailing into Italy, and he put us therein. (See on v. 2.) As Egypt was the granary of Italy, and this vessel was laden with wheat (v. 36), we need not wonder it was large enough to carry 276 souls, passengers and crew together (v. 37). Besides, the Egyptian merchantmen, among the largest in the Mediterranean, were equal to the largest merchantmen in our day. It may seem strange that on their passage from Alexandria to Italy they should be found at a Lycian port. But even still it is not unusual to stand to the N. towards Asia Minor, for the sake of the current. 7. sailed slowly many days (owing to contrary winds), and scarce ('with difficulty') were come over against Sidon—a town on the promontory of the peninsula of that name, having the island of Ocos (see on ch. 21. 1) to the West of it. But for the contrary wind they might have made the distance from Myra (130 miles) in one day. They would naturally have put in at Onidus, whose larger harbour was admirable, but the strong westerly current induced them to run South, under (the lee of) Crete (see on Titus, 1. 4). over against Salmene—the cape at the eastern extremity of the island. 8. and hardly passing it—'with difficulty coasting along it'; from the same cause as before, the westerly current and head-winds, came to... the Fair Havens—an anchorage near the centre of the South coast, and a little East of Cape Malata, the southernmost point of the island. high whereabouts was the city Lasea—identified, but quite recently, by the Rev. George Brown (SMITH'S Voyages and Shipwreck of St. Paul, App. iii., 2nd Ed., 1868. To this invaluable book all recent commentators on this chapter, and these notes, are mostly indebted.) 9, 10. when much time was spent—since leaving Usmara. But for unforeseen delays they might have reached the Italian coast before the stormy season, and sailing (the navigation of the open sea, was now dangerous, because the fast was now... past—that of the Day of Atonement, answering to the end of September, and beginning of October, about which time the navigation is pronounced unsafe by writers of authority. Hence all hope of completing the voyage during that season was abandoned, the question next was, whether they should winter at Fair Havens, or move to Port Phœnicia, a harbour about forty miles to the westward. St. Paul assisted at the consultation and strongly urged them to winter where they were. But, I perceive, that this voyage will be with hurt and much damage, &c.—not by any divine communication, but simply in the exercise of a good judgment aided by some experience. The event justified his decision. 11. Nevertheless the centurion believed the master and owner... more than Paul. He would naturally think them best able to judge; and there was much to say for their opinion, as the Bay at Fair Havens, being open to nearly one-half of the compass, could not be a good winter harbour. Phœnicia ('Phœnix,' now called Lutro, which lieth toward the south-west and north-west. If this mean that it was open to the West, it would certainly not be good anchorage. It is thought, therefore, to mean that a wind from that quarter would lead into it, or that it lay in a easterly direction from such a wind. [SMITH.] The next verse seems to confirm this. 13. when the south wind blew sorely, supposing they had attained their purpose. With such a wind they had every prospect of reaching their destination in a few hours. 14, 16. a tempestuous ('typhonic') wind—i.e., like a typhoon or tornado, causing a whirling of the clouds, owing to the meeting of opposite currents of air, called Euroclydon. The true reading appears to be Euro-aquilo, or East North East, which answers all the effects here ascribed to it, could not bear up into (or 'face') the wind, we let her drift—before the gale. 16, 17. under (the lee of) a certain ('small') island... Glauca—South West of Crete, now called Gonzo; about twenty-three miles to leeward. We had much work to come by (i.e., to hoist up and secure) the boat—now become necessary. But why was this difficult? Independently of the gale, raging at the time, the boat had been towed between twenty and thirty miles after the gale sprung up, and could scarcely fall to be filled with water. [SMITH.] undergirding the ship—i.e., passing four or five turns of a cable-laid rope round the hull or frame of the ship, to enable her to resist the violence of the seas, an operation rarely resorted to in modern seamanship, fearing lest they should fall into the quicksands—'be cast ashore' or 'stranded upon the Syrtis'; the Syrtis Major, a gulf on the African coast, South West of Crete, the dread of mariners, owing to its dangerous shoals, they strike (struck) sail. This cannot be the meaning, for to strike sail would have driven them directly towards the Syrtis. The meaning must be, 'lowered the gear' (appurtenances of every kind); here, perhaps referring to the lowering of the heavy mainyard with the sail attached to it. [SMITH.] 18-20, cast out with our own hands (passengers and crew together) the tackling of the ship—whatever they could do without, that carried weight. This further effort to lighten the ship seems to show that it was now in a leaking condition, as will presently appear more evident. neither sun nor stars appeared many (several) days—probably most of the fourteen days mentioned v. 27. This continued thickness of the atmosphere prevented their making the necessary observations of the heavenly bodies by day or by night; so that they could not tell where they were, all hope that they should be saved was taken away. 'Their exertions to mend the leak had been unavailing; they could not tell which way to make for the nearest land, in order to run their ship ashore, the only resource for a sinking ship; but unless they did make the land, they must founder at sea. Their apprehensions, therefore, were not so much caused by the fury of the tempest, as by the state of the ship.' [SMITH.] From the inferiority of ancient to modern naval architecture, leaks were sprung much more easily, and the means of repairing them were fewer than now. Hence the far greater number of shipwrecks from this cause. 21-26. But after long abstinence. See on v. 33. 'The hardships which the crew endured during a gale of such continuance, and their exhaustion from labouring at the pumps and hunger may be imagined, but are not described.' [SMITH.] Paul stood forth in the midst of them, and said, Sirs, ye should have hearkened to me, &c.—not meaning to reflect on them for the past, but to claim their confidence for what he was now to say . . . there stood by this night the angel of God (as ch. 16, 9, and 23, 11), whose I am (1 Corinthians, 6, 19, 20) and whom I serve in the sense of worship or religious consecration: see on ch. 13, 2, saying, Fear not, Paul; thou must be brought before Cesar; and, lo, God hath given thee all . . . that sail with thee. While the crew were toiling at the pumps, Paul was wrestling in prayer, not for himself only and the cause in which he was going a prisoner to Rome, but with true magnanimity of soul for all his shipmates; and God heard him, "giving him" (remarkable expression!) all that sailed with him. 'When the cheerless day came he gathered the sailors (and passengers) around him on the deck of the labouring vessel, and raising his voice above the storm, [HOWE], reported the divine communication he had received; adding with a noble simplicity, "for I believe God that it shall be even as it was told me," and encouraging all on board to "be of good cheer" in the same confidence. What a contrast to this is the speech of Cesar in similar circumstances to his pilot, bidding him keep up his spirit because he carried Cesar and Cesar's Fortune. [PLUTARCH.] The Roman general knew no better name for the Divine Providence by which he had been so often preserved, than Cesar's Fortune. [HUMPHREY.] From the explicit particulars—that the ship would be lost, but not one that sailed in it, and that they "must be cast on a certain island"—one would conclude that a visional representation of a total wreck, a mass of human beings struggling with the angry elements, and one and all of those whose figure and countenance had daily met his eye on deck, standing on some unknown island shore. From what follows, it would seem that Paul from this time was regarded with a deference akin to awe. 27-29, when the fourteenth night was come (from the time they left Fair Havens), as we were driven (drifting) up and down in Adria—the Adriatic, that sea which lies between Greece, Italy, and Africa, about midnight the shipmen deemed (no doubt) from the peculiar sound of the breakers) that they drew near some country 'that some land was approaching them'. This nautical language gives a graphic character to the narrative, they cast four anchors out of the stern. The ordinary way was to cast the anchor, as now, from the bow; but ancient ships; built with both ends alike, were fitted with hawse-holes in the stern, so that in case of need they could anchor either way. And when the fear was, as here, that they might fall on the rocks to leeward, and the intention was to run the ship ashore as soon as daylight enabled them to fix upon a safe spot, the very best thing they could do was to anchor by the stern. [SMITH.] In stormy weather two anchors were used, and we have instances of four being employed, as here, and wished (anxiously or 'devoutly wished') for day—the remark this of one present, and with all his shipmates alive to the horrors of their condition. 'The ship might go down at her anchors, or the coast to leeward might be iron-bound, affording no beach on which they could land with safety. Hence their anxious longing for day, and the ungenerous but natural attempt, not peculiar to ancient times, of the seamen to save their own lives by taking to the boat.' [SMITH.] 30. As the shipmen were about to flee out of the ship (under cover of night) when they had let down the boat . . . as though they would . . . cast anchors out of the foreship ('bow')—rather, 'carry out' anchors, to hold the ship fore as well as aft. 'This could have been of no advantage in the circumstances, and as the pretext could not deceive a seaman, we must infer that the officers of the ship were parties to the unworthy attempt, which was perhaps detected by the nautical skill of St. Luke, and communicated by him to St. Paul.' [SMITH.] 31. Paul said to the centurion and to the soldiers—the only parties now to be trusted, and whose own safety was now at stake, except ye abide in the ship ye cannot be saved. The soldiers and passengers could not be expected to possess the necessary seamanship in so very critical a case. The flight of the crew, therefore, might well be regarded as certain destruction to all who remained. In full assurance of ultimate safety, in virtue of a DIVINE pledge, to all in the ship, Paul speaks and acts throughout this whole scene in the exercise of a sound judgment as to the indispensable HUMAN conditions of safety; and as there is no trace of any feeling of inconsistency between these two things in his mind, so even the centurion, under whose orders the soldiers acted on Paul's views, seems never to have felt perplexed by the twofold aspect, divine and human, in which the same thing presented itself to the mind of Paul. Divine agency and human instrumentality are in all the events of life quite as much as here. The only difference is that the one is for the most part shrouded from view, while the other is ever naked and open to the senses. 32. Then the soldiers cut off the ropes of the boat (already lowered), and let her fall off—let the boat drift away. 33-37, while day was coming on—until it should be day; i.e., in the interval between the cutting off of the boat and the approach of day, which all were 'anxiously looking for' (v. 29). Paul—now looked up to by all the passengers as the man to direct them, besought them all to take meat ('partake of a meal') saying, This is the fourteenth day ye have tarried ('waited for a breathing time') . . . having eaten nothing (i.e., taken no regular meal). The impossibility of cooking, the occupation of all hands to keep down leakage, &c., sufficiently explain this, which is indeed a common occurrence in such cases. I pray you to take some meat, for this is for your health, for there shall not a hair fall from . . . any of you. On this beautiful union of confidence in the divine pledge and care for the whole ship's health and safety see on v. 31. when he had thus spoken he took bread (assuming the lead) and gave thanks to God in presence of them all—an impressive act in such circumstances, and fitted to plant a testimony for the God he served in the breasts of all, when he had broken it, he began to eat—not understood by the Christians in the ship as a love-feast, or a celebration of the Lord's Supper, as some think, but a meal to recruit exhausted nature, which Paul shows them by his own example how a Christian partakes of. Then were they all of good cheer, and they also took some meat — 'look food;' the first full meal since the commencement of the gale. Such courage in desperate circumstances as Paul here showed is wonderfully infectious. 36-40, when they had eaten enough, &c. With fresh strength after the meal, they make a third and last effort to lighten the ship, not only by pumping, as before, but by throwing the whole cargo of wheat into the sea (see on v. 6). when it was dry they knew not the land. This has been thought surprising in sailors accustomed to that sea. But the scene of the wreck is remote from the great harbour, and possesses no marked features by which it could be recognised, even by a native if he came unexpectedly upon it [SMITH], not to speak of the rain pouring in torrents (ch. 28. 3) which would throw a haze over the coast even after day broke. Immediately on landing they knew where they were (ch. 28. 1). discovered a creek with a shore. Every creek of course must have a shore; but the meaning is, a practicable shore, in a nautical sense, i. e., one with a smooth beach, in contradistinction to a rocky coast (as v. 41 shows.) into which they were minded, if . . . possible, to thrust the ship. This was their one chance of safety, taken up the anchors, they committed themselves to the sea. The Marg. is here evidently right, 'cut the anchors away) they left them in the sea.' loosed the rudder-bands. Ancient ships were steered by two large paddles, one on each quarter. When anchored by the stern in a gale, it would be necessary to lift them out of the water and secure them by lashings or rudder-bands, and to loose these when the ship was again got under way. [SMITH.] hoisted up the mainsail—rather, 'the fore-sail,' the best possible sail that could be set in the circumstances. How necessary must the crew have been to execute all these movements, and how obvious the foresight which made their stay indispensable to the safety of all on board (see on v. 31). 41, falling into a place where two seas met. Mr. Smith thinks this refers to the channel, not more than 100 yards broad, which separates the small Island of Salmone from Malta, forming a communication between the sea inside the bay and that outside, the fore part stuck fast, and remained immovable. 'The rocks of Malta disintegrate into extremely minute particles of sand and clay, which, when acted upon by the currents or surface agitation, form a deposit of tenacious clay; but, in still waters, where these causes do not act, mud is formed; but it is only in creeks, where there are no currents, and at such a depth as to be undisturbed by the waves, that the mud occurs. A ship, therefore, impelled by the force of a gale, into a creek, with such a bottom, would strike a bottom of mud, graduating into tenacious clay, into which the fore-part would fix itself, and be held fast, while the stern was exposed to the force of the waves.' [SMITH.] hinder part was broken. The continued action denoted by the tense here is to be noted—'was fast breaking,' going to pieces. 42-44, the soldiers' counsel was to kill the prisoners, lest any . . . should escape. Roman cruelty, which made the keepers answerable for their prisoners with their own lives, is here reflected in this cruel proposal, the centurion, &c. Great must have been the influence of Paul over the centurion's mind to produce such an effect. All followed the swimmers in committing themselves to the deep, and according to the divine pledge and Paul's confident assurance given them, every soul got safe to land—yet without miracle. (While the graphic minuteness of this narrative of the shipwreck puts it beyond doubt that the narrator was himself on board, the great number of nautical phrases, which all critics have noted, along with the unpra/sesonal ae which the whole narrative wears, agrees singularly with all we know and have reason to believe of "the beloved physician;" see on ch. 12. 48.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

VER. 1-31. THE WINTERING AT MALTA AND NOTABLE OCCURRENCES THEREIN—PROSECUTION OF THE VOYAGE TO ITALY AS FAR AS PUTEOLI, AND LAND-JOURNEY THENCE TO ROME—SUMMARY OF THE APOSTLE'S LABOURS THERE FOR THE TWO FOLLOWING YEARS. 1. Knew the island was called Malta. See on ch. 27. 28. The opinion that this island was not Malta to the south of Sicily, but Meleida in the Gulf of Venice—which till lately had respectable support among competent judges—is now all but exploded; recent examination of all the places on the spot, and of all writings and principles bearing on the question, by gentlemen of the highest qualifications, particularly Mr. Smith (see on ch. 27. 41), having set the question, it may now be affirmed, at rest. 2. the barbarous people—so called merely as speaking neither the Greek nor the Latin language. They were originally Phœnician colonists, showed us no little ('no ordinary') kindness, for they kindled a fire, and received us every one, because of the present rain ('the rain that was on us'—not now first-falling, but then falling heavily) and because of the cold—welcomed us all, drrenched and shivering, to these most reasonable marks of friendship. In this these "barbarians" contrast favourably with many since, bearing the Christian name. The life-like style of the narrative here and in the following verses gives it a great charm. 3. when Paul had gathered a bundle of sticks ('a quantity of dry sticks'). The vigorous activity of Paul's character is observable in this comparatively trifling action. [WEBSTER & WILKINSON.] and laid them on the fire, there came a viper out of the heat. Having laid itself up among the sticks on the approach of the cold winter season, it had suddenly recovered from its torpor by the heat, and fastened (its fangs) on his hand. Vipers dart at their enemies sometimes several feet at a bound. They have now disappeared from Malta, owing to the change which cultivation has produced. 4-6. No doubt this man is a murderer: his chains, which they would see, might strengthen the impression whom . . . vengeance suffereth not to live. They believed in a Supreme, Resistless, Avenging Eye and Hand, however vague their notions of where it resided, shook off the beast and felt no harm. See Mark, 16. 18. they looked ('continued looking'; when he should have swollen or fallen down dead (familiar with the effects of such bites) and saw no harm come to him, they changed their minds, and said . . . he was a god—from "a murderer" to "a God," as the Lycaonian greeting of Paul and Silas from "sacrificing to them" to "stoning them" ch. 14. 13, 19. What has not the Gospel done for the uncultivated portion of the human family, while its effects on the educated and refined, though very different, are not less marvellous. Verily it is God's chosen restorative for the human spirit, in all the multitudinous forms and gradations of its lapsed state. 7, 8. possessors of the chief man ('the First man') of the island. He would hardly be so styled in the life-time of his father, if his distinction was that of the family. But it is now ascertained that this was the proper official title of the Maltese representative of the Roman Pretor of Sicily, to whose province Malta belonged; two inscriptions having been discovered in the island, one in Greek, the other in Latin, containing the same words which Luke here employs, who received us (of Paul's company, but doubtless including the "courteous" Julia) and lodged us three days courteously—till proper winter-lodgings could be obtained for them. the father of Publius lay sick of a fever—'fevers.' The word was often thus used in the plural number, probably to express recurring attacks, and of a bloody flux—'of dysentery.' (The medical accuracy of our historian's style has been

here.] to whom Paul entered in, and prayed, precluding the supposition that any charm in himself and laid his hands on him, and healed us, as our Lord rewarded Peter for the use of (Luke, 6. 3, 4, &c.), so Paul richly repays for his hospitality. Observe the fulfilment of things predicted in Mark, 16. 18, the "takings," and "recovering of the sick by laying them." this done, others . . . came and were left coming to [us] and getting healed, i.e., to stay, not all at once. [WESSER & WILKINSON also honoured us . . . and when we departed us, &c. This was not taking hire for the wrought amongst them [Matthew, 10. 5], but such expressions of feeling, particularly in providential minister to their comfort during the labours of the apostle amongst them, and it would have hurt their feelings to refuse any permanent effects of this three-months' greatest of the apostles were left at Malta, certainly say. But though little dependence placed upon the tradition that Publius became Malta and afterwards of Athens we may well be accredited tradition that the beginnings of the church at Malta sprang out of this visit. 11. we departed in a ship of Alexandria (see 27. 6) which had wintered in the late—no doubt by the same storm which had wrecked on the apostle's vessel—an incidental mark of the figure, whose sign—or figure—figure, curved or painted on the bow, which was common as now, was Castor and Pollux—the gods of mariners, to whom all their good is ascribed. St. Anthony is substituted for them in modern superstitions of Mediterranean Romanesque. They carry his image in their boats and it is highly improbable that two ships of Alexandria have been casually found, of which the crew are able and willing to receive on board such a number of passengers ch. 27. 6. We may then only conceive that it was compulsory on the convey soldiers and state-travellers. [WESSER & WILKINSON.] 12, 13. landing at Syracuse—the ancient and celebrated capital of Sicily, on its eastern coast eighty miles, or a day's sail, North from the wind. Doubtless Paul would wish to go to find out and break ground amongst the Jews of Sicily whom such a mercantile centre would attract; and if this was allowed at the outset of the ch. 27. 3, much more readily would it be now had gained the reverence and confidence of all with whom he came in contact. At any rate we order that he should be regarded by the Sicilian founder of the church of that island. from fetched a compass—i.e., proceeded circuitously, working to windward probably, and availing of the sinuosities of the coast, the wind not favourable. [SMITH.] What follows confirms came to Rhegium—now Reggio, a seaport on the West point of the Italian coast, opposite the East point of Sicily, and at the entrance of the narrow straits of Messina. after one day the south wind—'a South wind having sprung up'; being aided with a fair wind, for want of which they were obliged first to stay three days at Syracuse, and then to tack and put in for a day at Rhegium. the town of Puteoli—now Pozzuoli, situated on the north-west of the magnificent bay of Naples, about 180 miles from Rhegium, a distance which they might have covered in about 12 hours. The Alexandrian corn-ships enjoyed a peculiar to themselves, of not being obliged to strike their top-sail on landing. By this they were easily recognised as they hove in sight by the crowds that we find gathered on the shore on such occasions. [HOWS.] 14, 15. Where we found brethren—not "the brethren" (see on ch. 21. 4), from which one would conclude they did not expect to find such. [WESSER & WILKINSON.] and were desired ('requested') to tarry with them seven days. If this request came from Julius, it may have proceeded partly from a wish to receive instructions from Rome, and make arrangements for his journey thither, partly from a wish to gratify Paul, as he seems studiously and increasingly to have done to the last. One can hardly doubt that he was influenced by both considerations. However this may be, the apostle had thus an opportunity of spending a Sabbath with the Christians of the place, all the more refreshing from his long privation in this respect, and as a seasoning for the unknown future that lay before him at the metropolis, so we went toward Rome. And from thence, when the brethren (of Rome) heard of us—by letter from Puteoli, and probably by the same conveyance which took Julius's announcement of his arrival. they came to meet us as far as Appii Forum—a town forty-one miles from Rome. and the Three Taverns—thirty miles from Rome. Thus they came to greet the apostle in two parties, one stopping short at the nearer, the other going on to the more distant place. whom when Paul saw, he thanked God—for such a welcome. How sensitive he was to such Christian affection all his Epistles show. (Romans, 1. 9; &c.) and took courage—his long-cherished purpose to "see Rome" (ch. 19. 21.) there to proclaim the unsearchable riches of Christ, and the divine pledge that in this he should be gratified (ch. 23. 11), being now about to be auspiciously realized. 16. when we came to Rome—the renowned capital of the ancient world, situated on the Tiber, the centurion delivered the prisoners to the captain of the guard—the Pretorian Prefect, to whose custody, as commander of the Pretorian guard, the highest military authority in the city, were committed all who were to come before the Emperor for trial. Ordinarily there were two such Prefects; but from A.D. 61 to 62, one distinguished general—Burrus Afranius, who had been Nero's tutor—held that office; and as our Historian speaks of "the captain," as if there were but one, it is thought that this fixes the apostle's arrival at Rome to be not later than the year 62. [WIES.] But even though there had been two when Paul arrived, he would be committed only to one of them, who would be "the captain" who got charge of him. (At most, therefore, this can furnish no more than confirmation to the chronological evidence otherwise obtained.) but Paul was suffered to dwell by himself with a ('the') soldier that kept ('guarded') him. (See on ch. 12. 6.) This privilege was allowed in the case of the better class of prisoners, not accused of any flagrant offence, on finding security—which in Paul's case would not be difficult among the Christians. The extension of this privilege to the apostle may have been due to the terms in which Festus wrote about him; but far more probably it was owing to the high terms in which Julius spoke of him, and his express intercession in his behalf. It was overruled, however, for giving the fullest scope to the labours of the apostle compatible with confinement at all. As the soldiers who kept him were relieved periodically, he would thus make the personal acquaintance of a great number of the Pretorian guard; and if he had to appear before the Prefect from time to time, the truth might thus penetrate to those who surrounded the emperor, as we learn from Philipians, 7. 12, 13, that it did. 17-20. Paul called the chief of the Jews together. Though banished from the capital by Claudius, the Jews enjoyed the full benefit of the toleration which distinguished the first period of Nero's reign, and were at this time in considerable numbers, wealth, and influence settled as

Rome. We have seen that long before this a flourishing Christian Church existed at Rome, to which Paul wrote his Epistle (see on ch. 29. 3), and the first members of which were probably Jewish converts and proselytes. (See Introduction to Epistle to Romans.) yet was I delivered prisoner from Jerusalem into the hands of the Romans (the Roman authorities, Felix and Festus) . . . I was constrained to appeal . . . not that I had ought to accuse my nation of—q. d. I am here not as their accuser but as my own defender, and this not of choice but necessity. His object, in alluding thus gently to the treatment he had received from the Jews, was plainly to avoid whatever might irritate his visitors at the first; especially as he was not aware whether any or what information against him had reached their community. For this cause . . . have I called for you, . . . because . . . for the hope of Israel (see on ch. 26. 6, 7: I am bound with this chain—q. d. 'This cause is not so much mine as yours; it is the nation's cause: all that is dear to the heart and hope of Israel is bound up with this case of mine.' From the touching allusions which the apostle makes to his chains, before Agrippa first, and here before the leading members of the Jewish community at Rome, at his first interview with them, one would gather that his great soul felt keenly his being in such a condition; and it is to this keenness of feeling, under the control of Christian principle, that we owe the noble use which he made of it in these two cases. 21, 22. We neither received letters out of Judea concerning thee, &c. We need not suppose [with THROLOCK and others] that there was any dishonest concealment here. The distinction made between himself, against whom they had heard nothing, and, his "sect," as "every where spoken against," is a presumption in favour of their sincerity; and there is ground to think discussion being felt by both parties after Paul had spoken one word—on testimony, from those Scriptures I alike as "the Holy Ghost speaking" & ye shall hear, &c. See on Matthew, 11. 12, 33-40. With what pain would this wrong from him whose "heart's dex God for Israel was that they might be "had great heaviness and continual sorrow on their account! (Romans, 10. 1; 2. 1 God is sent to the Gentiles, and they will 13. 44-48. 'This "departure to the intimated to the perverse Jews at A and at Corinth (ch. 18. 6); now at Ron Greece, and Italy. [BENNETT.] the had great ('much' reasoning among verse is wanting in many MSS. [and recent editors], but certainly probably the words were regarded as so seem to tell us what we were told "departed" (see v. 23). But in v. 25 off of the discourse that is meant, I parture from the house.' [OLSHAUSE hired house (see on v. 23), yet still in c "received all that came to him;" s that he went to the synagogue or any all confidence, no man forbidding him -uninterrupted exercise of his minist of a guarded man.

Thus closes this most precious morning of the Christian Church, in East to West, among the Jews first, Jerusalem; next among the Gentiles, its head-quarters; finally, its banne in the Pastoral Epistles—to Timothy and Titus which, in our judgment, are of subsequent date. From the former class of Epistles we learn the following particulars: (1) That the trying restraint laid upon the apostle's labours by his imprisonment had only turned its influence into a new channel; the Gospel having in consequence penetrated even into the palace, and pervaded the city, while the preachers of Christ were emboldened; and though the Judaizing portion of them, serving his success among the Gentiles, had been directed to inculcate with fresh zeal their own narrower Gospel, even this had done much good by extending the truth common to both (See on Philippians, 1, 12-18; 22: 2). That as in addition to all his other labours, the care of all the churches pressed upon him from day to day" (2 Corinthians, 11, 28), so with these churches he kept up an active correspondence by means of letters and messengers, and on such errands he wanted not faithful and beloved brethren enough, ready to be employed—Luke; Timotheus; Tycheus; (John) Mark; Onesimus; Aristarchus; Epaphrus; Onesimus; Jesus, called Justus; and, for a short time, Epaphroditus (See on Galatians, 4, 7, 9-12, 14; Philemon, 23, 24; and Introduction to Ephesians, Philippians, and Philemon.) That the apostle suffered martyrdom under Nero at Rome has never been doubted. But that the appeal which brought him to Rome issued in his liberation, that he was at large for some years thereafter and took some wide missionary circuits, and, that he was again arrested, carried to Rome, and then executed—was the undisputed belief of the early Church, as expressed by Chrysostom, Jerome, and Eusebius, in the fourth century, up to Clement of Rome, the "fellow-labourer" of the apostle himself (Philippians, 4, 3), in the first century. The strongest possible confirmation of this is found in the Pastoral Epistles which bear marks throughout of a more advanced state of the Church, and more matured forms of error, than can well have existed at any period before the appeal which brought the apostle to Rome; which refer to movements of himself and Timothy, that cannot without some straining (as we think) be made to fit into any prior period; and which are couched in a manifestly ripper style than any of his other Epistles. (See Introduction to Timothy, and Titus, and Notes.) All this has been called in question by modern critics of great research and acuteness (Petavius, Lorriner, De Wette, Wieseler, Davidson, &c.). But those who maintain the ancient view are of equal authority and more numerous, while the weight of argument appears to us to be decidedly on their side.

CHRONOLOGICAL TABLE OF THE PRINCIPAL EVENTS CONNECTED WITH THE LIFE OF THE APOSTLE PAUL.

Certainty in these dates is not to be had, the notes of time in the Acts being few and vague. It is only by connecting those events of secular history which it records, and the dates of which are otherwise tolerably known to us—such as the famine under Claudius Cesar (ch. 11, 28), the expulsion of the Jews from Rome by the same emperor (ch. 18, 2), and the entrance of Porcius Festus upon his procuratorship (ch. 24, 27)—with the intervals specified between some occurrences in the apostle's life and others (such as ch. 20, 31; 24, 27; 28, 30; and Galatians, 1, and 2.), that we can thread our way through the difficulties that surround the chronology of the apostle's life, and approximate to certainty. Immense research has been brought to bear upon the subject, but, as might be expected, the learned are greatly divided. Every year has been fixed upon as the probable date of the apostle's conversion, from A.D. 31 (Bengel) to A.D. 43 (Eusebius). But the weight of authority is in favour of dates ranging between 35 and 40, a difference of not more than five years; and the largest number of authorities is in favour of the year 37 or 38. Taking the former of these, to which opinion largely inclines, the following Table will be useful to the student of apostolic History:—

THE EPISTLE OF PAUL THE APOSTLE TO THE ROMANS. INTRODUCTION.

THE GENUINENESS of the Epistle to the Romans has never been questioned. It has the unbroken testimony of all antiquity, up to Clement, the apostle's "fellow-labourer in the gospel, whose name was in the book of life" (Philippians, 4. 3), and who quotes from it in his undoubted Epistle to the Corinthians, written before the close of the first century. The most searching investigations of modern criticism have left it untouched.

WHEN and WHERE this epistle was written, we have the means of determining with great precision, from the epistle itself compared with the Acts of the Apostles. Up to the date of its the apostle had never been at Rome (ch. 1. 11, 12, 13). He was then on the eve of visiting Jerusalem with a pecuniary contribution for the Christian poor from the churches of Macedonia and Achaia, after which his purpose was to pay a visit to Rome on his way to Spain (ch. 13. 23-25). Now this contribution we know that he carried with him from Corinth, at the close of his third visit to that city, which lasted three months (Acts, 20. 2, 3; 24. 17). On this occasion there accompanied him from Corinth certain persons whose names are given by the historian of the Acts (Acts, 20. 4), and four of these are expressly mentioned in our epistle as being with the apostle when he wrote it—Timotheus, Sopater, Gaius, and Erastus (ch. 16. 21, 22). Of these four, the third, Gaius, was an inhabitant of Corinth (1 Corinthians, 1. 14), and the fourth, Erastus, was "chamberlain of the city" (ch. 24. 29), which can hardly be supposed to be other than Corinth. Finally, Phoebe, the bearer, as appears, of this epistle, was a deaconess of the Church at Cenchræ, the eastern port of Corinth (ch. 16. 1). Putting these facts together, it is impossible to resist the conviction, in which all critics agree, that Corinth was the place from which the epistle was written, and that it was despatched about the close of the visit above mentioned, probably in the early spring of the year 58.

The FOUNDER of this celebrated church is unknown. That it owed its origin to the apostle Peter and that he was its first bishop, though an ancient tradition and taught in the Church of Rome as a fact not to be doubted, is refuted by the clearest evidence, and is given up even by candid Romanists. On that supposition, how are we to account for so important a circumstance being passed by in silence by the historian of the Acts, not only in the narrative of Peter's labours, but in that of Paul's approach to the metropolis, of the deputations of Roman "brethren" that came as far as Appii Forum and the Three Taverns to meet him, and of his two years' labours there? And how, consistently with his declared principle—not to build on another man's foundation (ch. 13. 20)—could he express his anxious desire to come to them that he might have some fruit among them also, even as among other Gentiles (ch. 1. 13), if all the while he knew that they had the apostle of the circumcision for their spiritual father? And how, if so, is there no allusion to Peter, among the many in this epistle—or, if it may be thought that he was known to be elsewhere at that particular time—how does there occur in all the epistles which our apostle afterwards wrote from Rome not one allusion to such an origin of the Roman Church? The same considerations would seem to prove that this church owed its origin to no prominent Christian labourer; and this brings us to the much litigated question,

For WHAT CLASS of Christians was this epistle principally designed—Jewish or Gentile? That a large number of Jews and Jewish proselytes resided at this time at Rome is known to all who are familiar with the classical and Jewish writers of that and the immediately subsequent periods; and that those of them who were at Jerusalem on the day of Pentecost (Acts, 2. 10), and formed probably part of the three thousand converts of that day, would on their return to Rome carry the glad tidings with them, there can be no doubt. Nor are indications wanting that some of those embraced in the salutations of this epistle were Christians already of long standing, if not among the earliest converts to the Christian faith. Others of them who had made the apostle's acquaintance elsewhere, and who, if not indebted to him for their first knowledge of Christ, probably owed much to his ministrations, seem to have charged themselves with the duty of cherishing and consolidating the work of the Lord in the capital. And thus it is not improbable that up to the time of the apostle's arrival the Christian community at Rome had been dependent upon subordinate agency for the increase of its numbers, aided by occasional visits of stated preachers from the provinces; and perhaps it may be gathered from the salutations of the last chapter that it was up to that time in a less organised, though far from less flourishing state, than some other churches to whom the apostle had already addressed epistles. Certain it is that the apostle writes to them expressly as a Gentile church (ch. 1. 13-15; 15. 15, 16); and though it is plain that there were Jewish Christians among them, and the whole argument presupposes an intimate acquaintance on the part of his readers with the leading principles of the Old Testament, this will be sufficiently explained by supposing that the bulk of them, having before they knew the Lord been Gentile proselytes to the Jewish faith, had entered the pale of the Christian Church through the gate of the ancient economy.

It remains only to speak briefly of the PLAN and CHARACTER of this epistle. Of all the undoubted epistles of our apostle this is the most elaborate, and at the same time the most glowing. It has just as much in common with a theological treatise as is consistent with the freedom and warmth of a real letter. Referring to the headings which we have prefixed to its successive sections, as best exhibiting the progress of the argument and the connection of its points, we here merely note that its first great topic is what may be termed the legal relation of man to God as a violator of His holy law, whether as merely written on the heart, as in the case of the Heathen, or, as in the case of the Chosen People, as further known by external revelation; that it next treats of that legal relation as wholly reversed through believing connection with the Lord Jesus Christ; and that its third and last great topic is the new life which accompanies this change of relation, embracing at once a blessedness and a consecration to God which, rudimentally complete already, will open, in the future world, into the bliss of immediate and stainless fellowship with God. The bearing of these wonderful truths upon the condition and destiny of the Chosen People, to which the apostle next comes, though it seem but the practical application of them to his kinsmen according to the flesh, is in some respects the deepest and most difficult part of the whole epistle, carrying us directly to the eternal springs of Grace to the guilty in the sovereign love and inscrutable purposes of God; after which, however, we are brought back to the historical platform of the visible church, in the calling of the Gentiles.

preservation of a faithful Israelitish remnant amidst the general unbelief and fall of the nation, and the ultimate woe of all Israel to constitute, with the Gentiles in the latter day, one Catholic Church of God upon earth. The remainder of the epistle is devoted to sundry practical topics, winding up with salutations and outpourings of heart lightfully suggestive.

CHAPTER I.

Ver. 1-17. INTRODUCTION. 1. Paul (see on Acts, 13, a servant of Jesus Christ—The word here rendered erant means 'bond-servant,' or one subject to the Lord and wholly at the disposal of another. In this use it is applied to the disciples of Christ at large (1 Corinthians, 7, 21-23, as in the Old Testament, to all people of God (Isaiah, 66, 14). But as, in addition to this, the prophets and kings of Israel were officially servants of the Lord" (Joshua, 1, 1; Psalm 135, 6), the apostles call themselves, in the same official use, "the servants of Christ" (as here, and Philip- pians, 1, 1; James, 1, 1; 2 Peter, 1, 1; Jude, 1), expressing His absolute subjection and devotion to the Lord as they would never have yielded to a mere creature. (See on v. 7; and on John, 5, 22, 23.) called be an apostle—when first he "saw the Lord," the dispensable qualification for apostleship. See on Acts, 9, 5; 22, 14; 1 Corinthians, 9, 1. separated unto the teaching of the gospel—neither so late as when "the Holy Ghost said, Separate me Barnabas and Saul" (Acts, 13, 2), nor so early as when "separated from his mother's milk" (see on Galatians, 1, 16). He was called at one and the same time to the faith and the apostleship of Christ (Acts, 26, 16-18). of God—i.e., the gospel of which He is the glorious Author. So ch. 15, 16; 1 Thes- salonians, 2, 2, 8, 9; 1 Peter, 4, 17. 2. Which he had taught afore . . . in the holy Scriptures—Though the main Church was Gentile by nation (see on v. 13), as it consisted mostly of proselytes to the Jewish faith (see Introduction to this Epistle) they are here minded that in embracing Christ they had not cast off, but only the more profoundly yielded themselves to Moses and the prophets (Acts, 13, 32, 33). 3, 4. concerning his Son Jesus Christ our Lord—the grand object of this "gospel of God." made of the seed of David—as, according to "the holy Scriptures." He moved to be. (See on Matthew, 1, 1.) according to a flesh—i.e., in His human nature (cf. ch. 9, 5, and Heb., 1, 14; implying, of course, that He had another nature, of which the apostle immediately proceeds to speak. And declared—lit., 'marked off,' 'defined,' 'determined,' i.e., 'shown,' or 'proved,' to be the Son of God—Observe how studiously the language changes here. He "was made" (says the apostle) of the seed of David, according to the flesh; but He was not made, but was only "declared" (or proved) to be the Son of God. So John, 1, 1, 14. "In the beginning was the Word . . . and the Word was made flesh," and Isaiah, 6, "Unto us a Child is born, unto us a Son is given." Thus the Sonship of Christ is in no proper use a born relationship to the Father, as some, otherwise sound divines, conceive of it. By His birth in the flesh, that Sonship, which was essential and un- altered, merely effloresced into palpable manifestation. See on Luke, 1, 35; Acts, 13, 32, 33.) with power—This either be connected with "declared," and then the meaning will be "powerfully declared" [LUTHER, BEZA, SOLE, FRITZSCHE, ALFORD, &c.]; or (as in our ver- sion, and as we think rightly) with "the Son of God," in the sense is, 'declared to be the Son of God' possession of that "power" which belonged to Him the only-begotten of the Father, no longer shrouded in the days of his flesh, but "by His resurrection to the dead" gloriously displayed and henceforth to be ever exerted in this nature of ours.' [VUL- GATE, CALVIN, HODGE, PHILIPPI, MEIRING, &c.] ording to the spirit of holiness—If "according to the spirit" mean here, 'in His human nature,' this uncon-mon expression must mean 'in His other nature, which we have seen to be that "of the Son of God"—an eternal, uncreated nature. This is here styled the "Spirit," as an impalpable and immaterial nature (John, 4, 24), and "the Spirit of holiness," probably in absolute contrast with that "likeness of sinful flesh" which He assumed. One is apt to wonder that if this be the meaning, it was not expressed more simply. But if the apostle had said 'He was declared to be the Son of God according to the Holy Spirit,' the reader would have thought he meant 'the Holy Ghost,' and it seems to have been just to avoid this misapprehension that he used the rare expression, "the Spirit of holiness." 5. By whom (as the ordained channel) we have received grace (the whole "grace that bringeth salvation") and apostleship—for the publication of that "grace," and the organisation of as many as receive it into churches of visible discipleship. (We prefer thus taking them as two distinct things, and not with some good interpreters, as one—the grace of apostleship.) 6. By whom (as the ordained channel) we have received grace (the whole "grace that bringeth salvation") and apostleship—for the publication of that "grace," and the organisation of as many as receive it into churches of visible discipleship. (We prefer thus taking them as two distinct things, and not with some good interpreters, as one—the grace of apostleship.) 7. beloved of God—(cf. Deuteronomy, 33, 12; Colossians, 3, 12). Grace . . . (see on John, 1, 14, p. 70, 2d column) and peace—the peace which Christ made through the blood of His cross (Colossians, 1, 20), and which reflects into the believing bosom the peace of God which passeth all understanding (Philippians, 4, 7). from God our Father, and the Lord Jesus Christ—'Nothing speaks more decisively for the divinity of Christ than these juxtapositions of Christ with the eternal God, which run through the whole language of Scripture, and the derivation of purely divine influences from Him also. The name of no man can be placed by the side of the Almighty. He only, in whom the Word of the Father who is Himself God became flesh, may be named beside Him; for men are commanded to honour Him even as they honour the Father, John, 5, 23.' [OLSHAUSEN.] 8. your faith is spoken of throughout the whole world—This was quite practicable through the frequent visits paid to the capital from all the provinces; and the apostle, having an eye to the influence they would exercise upon others, as well as their own blessedness, gives thanks for such faith to "his God through Jesus Christ," as being the source, according to his theology of faith, as of all grace in men. 9. For God . . . whom I serve (the word denotes religious service; with my spirit (from my inmost soul) in the gospel of his Son (to which Paul's whole religious life and official activity were consecrated) is my witness, that without ceasing I make mention of you always in my prayers—So for the Ephesians (Ephesians, 1, 15, 16); so for the Philippians (Philippians, 1, 3, 4); so for the Colossians (Colossians, 1, 3, 4); so for the Thessalonians (1 Thessalonians, 1, 2, 3). What catholic love, what all-absorbing spirituality, what impassioned devotion to the glory of Christ among men! 10. Making request, if by any means now at length I may have a prosperous journey by the will of God, to come to you—Though long anxious to visit the capital, he met with a number of providential hindrances (v. 13; ch. 15, 22; and see on Acts, 19, 21; 23, 11; 28, 16); inasmuch that nearly a quarter of a century elapsed, after his conversion, ere his desire was accomplished, and that only as "a prisoner of Jesus Christ." Thus taught that his whole future was in the hands of God, he makes it his continual prayer that at length the obstacles to a happy and prosperous meeting might be removed. 11, 12. For I long to see you, that I may impart unto you some spiritual gift—not any supernatural gift, as the next clause shows, and cf. 1 Corinthians, 1, 7. to the end that ye may be established; That is, that I may be comforted together with you by the mutual faith both of you and me—Not wishing to "lord it over their faith," but rather to be a "helper of their joy," the apostle corrects his former expressions; my desire is to instruct you and do you good, that is, for us to instruct and do one another good; in giving I shall also receive. [JOWETT.] 'Nor is he insincere in so speaking, for there is none so poor in the Church of Christ who may not impart to us something of value: it is only our malice and pride that hinder us from gathering such fruit from every quarter.' [CALVIN.] How 'widely different is the apostolic style from that of the court of Papal Rome! [BENNETT.] 12. sometimes I purposed to come unto you, but was let (hindered) thither—chiefly by his desire to go first to places where Christ was not known (ch. 15, 20-24), that I might have some fruit (of my ministry) among you also, even as among other Gentiles—The GENTILE origin of the Roman Church is here so explicitly stated, that those who conclude, merely from the Jewish strain of the argument, that they must have been mostly Israelites, decide in opposition to the apostle himself. (But see Introduction to this Epistle. 14, 15. I am debtor both to the (cultivated) Greeks and to the (rude) Barbarians. . . . So, as much as in me is, I am ready to preach the gospel to you that are at Rome also—He feels himself under an all-subduing obligation to carry the gospel to all classes of mankind, as adapted to and ordained equally for all (1 Corinthians, 9, 16). 16. For I am not ashamed of the gospel. (The words, "of Christ," which follow here, are wanting in the oldest and best MSS.) This language implies that it required some courage to bring to "the mistress of the world" what "to the Jews was a stumbling-block and to the Greeks foolishness." But its inherent glory, as God's life-giving message to a dying world, so filled his soul, that, like his blessed Master, he "despised the shame," for IT IS THE POWER OF GOD UNTO SALVATION TO EVERY ONE THAT BELIEVETH—Here and in the next verse the apostle announces the great theme of his ensuing argument: SALVATION, the one overwhelming necessity of perishing men; this revealed in THE GOSPEL MESSAGE; and that message so owned and honoured of God as to carry, in the proclamation of it, God's OWN POWER TO SAVE EVERY SOUL THAT EMBRACES IT, Greek and Barbarian, wise and unwise alike. 17. For therein is the righteousness of God revealed—that is, (as the whole argument of the Epistle shows) GOD'S JUSTIFYING RIGHTEOUSNESS, from faith to faith—a difficult clause. Most interpreters (judging from the sense of such phrases elsewhere) take it to mean, 'from one degree of faith to another.' But this agrees ill with the apostle's design, which has nothing to do with the progressive stages of faith, but solely with faith itself as the appointed way of receiving God's "righteousness." We prefer, therefore, to understand it thus: 'The righteousness of God is in the gospel message, revealed (to be) from (or 'by') faith to (or 'for') faith,' that is, 'in order to be by faith received.' (So substantially, MELVILLE, MEYER, STUART, BLOOMFIELD, &c.) as it is written (Habakkuk, 2, 4). The just shall live by faith—This golden maxim of the Old Testament, is thrice quoted in the New Testament—here; Galatians, 3, 11;

Hebrews, 10, 22—showing that the gospel way of "LIFE BY FAITH," so far from disturbing, only continued and developed the ancient method—On the foregoing verses, note (1.) What manner of persons ought the ministers of Christ to be, according to the pattern here set up;—absolutely subject and officially dedicated to the Lord Jesus; separated unto the gospel of God, which contemplates the subjugation of all nations to the faith of Christ; debtors to all classes, the refined and the rude, to bring the gospel to them all alike, all shame in the presence of the one, as well pride before the other, sinking before the glory which they feel to be in their message; yearning over all faithful churches, not lording it over them, but rejoicing in their prosperity, and finding refreshment and strength in their fellowship! (2.) The peculiar features of the gospel here brought prominently forward should be the devout study of all who preach it, and guide the views and the taste of all who are privileged stately to hear it: that it is "the gospel of God," as a message from heaven, yet not absolutely new, but on the contrary, only the fulfilment of Old Testament promise; that not only is Christ the great theme of it, but Christ in the very nature of God as His own Son, and in the nature of men as partakers of their flesh—The Son of God now in resurrection-power and invested with authority to dispense all grace to men, and all gifts for the establishment and edification of the Church, Christ the righteousness provided of God for the justification of all that believe in His name; and that in this glorious Gospel, when preached as such, there resides the very power of God to save Jew and Gentile alike who embrace it. (3.) While Christ is to be regarded as the ordained Channel of all grace from God to men (v. 8), let none imagine that His proper divinity is in any respect compromised by this arrangement, since He is here expressly associated with "God the Father," in prayer for "grace and peace" including all spiritual blessings, to rest upon this Church (v. 7.). (4.) While this Epistle teaches, in conformity with the teaching of our Lord Himself, that all salvation is suspended upon faith, this is but half a truth, and will certainly minister to self-righteousness, if dissociated from another feature of the same truth, here explicitly taught, that this faith is God's own gift—for which accordingly, in the case of the Roman believers, he "thanks his God through Jesus Christ" (v. 8.). (5.) Christian fellowship, as indeed all real fellowship, is a mutual benefit; and as it is not possible for the most eminent saints and servants of Christ to impart any refreshment and profit to the meanest of their brethren without experiencing a rich return into their bosoms, so just in proportion to their humility and love will they feel their need of it and rejoice in it. 18. WHY THIS DIVINELY PROVIDED RIGHTEOUSNESS IS NEEDED BY ALL MEN. For the wrath of God (His holy displeasure and righteous vengeance against sin) is revealed from heaven—in the consciences of men, and attested by innumerable outward evidences of a Moral Government, against all ungodliness—i.e., their whole irreligiousness, or their living without any conscious reference to God, and proper feelings towards Him, and unrighteousness of men—i.e., their whole deviations from moral rectitude in heart, speech, and behaviour. (So these terms must be distinguished when used together, though, when standing alone, either of them includes the other.)

18-22. THE WRATH OF GOD, REVEALED AGAINST ALL INIQUITY, OVERMANS THE WHOLE HEATHEN WORLD. 18. who hold (rather, 'hold down,' 'hinder,' or 'keep back') the truth in unrighteousness—The apostle, though he began this verse with a comprehensive proposition regarding men in general, takes up in the end of it only one of the two great divisions of mankind, to whom he meant to apply it; thus gently his argument. But before enumerating iniquities, he goes back to the origin of it, stiffness the light which still remained to arkness overspreads the mind, so impotsession of the heart, when the "still of conscience is first disregarded, next d then systematically deadened. Thus which God left with and in men, instead e scope and developing itself, as it other-

Because that which may be ch is) knows of God is manifest in them; showed it unto them — The sense of this tement the apostle proceeds to unfold in e. 20. For the invisible things of him from e creation of the world are clearly seen (the y beholding what the eye cannot discern), ood by the things that are made—Thus, the ation is not the parent but the interpreter n God. 24. Wherefore God also (in righteous retribution) gave them up—This divine abandonment of men is here strikingly traced in three successive stages, at each of which the same word is used (v. 24; v. 26; and v. 28, where the word is rendered "gave over"). 'As they deserted God, God in turn deserted them; not giving them divine (i.e., supernatural) laws, and suffering them to corrupt those which were human; not sending them prophets, and allowing the philosophers to run into absurdities. He let them do what they pleased, even what was in the last degree vile, that those who had not honoured God, might dishonour themselves.' [GROTIUS.] 25. Who changed the truth of God into a lie (i.e., the truth concerning God into idol-falsehood), and worshipped and served the creature more than the Creator—Professing merely to worship the Creator by means of the creature, they soon came to lose sight of the Creator in the creature. How aggravated is the guilt of the Church of Rome, which, under the same flimsy pretext, does shamelessly what the heathen are here condemned for doing, and with light which the heathen never had! who is blessed for ever. Amen—By this doxology the apostle instinctively relieves the horror which the penning of such things excited within his breast; an example to such as are called to expose like dishonour done to the blessed God. 26, 27. For this cause God gave them up—See on v. 24. For even their women — that sex whose priceless jewel and fairest ornament is modesty, and which, when that is once lost, not only becomes more shameless than the other sex; but lives henceforth only to drag the other sex down to its own level. did change, &c.—The practices here referred to, though too abundantly attested by classic authors, cannot be further illustrated, without trenching on things which "ought not to be named among us as become the saints." But observe how vice is here seen consuming and exhausting itself. When the passions, scourged by violent and continued indulgence in natural vices, became impotent to yield the craved enjoyment, resort was had to artificial stimulants by the practice of unnatural and monstrous vices. How early these were in full career, in the history of the world, the case of Sodom affectingly shows; and because of such abominations, centuries after that, the land of Canaan "spued out" its old inhabitants. Long before this chapter was penned, the Lesbians and others throughout refined Greece had been luxuriating in such debasements; and as for the Romans, Tacitus, speaking of the emperor Liberius, tells us that new words had then to be coined to express the newly invented stimulants to jaded passion. No wonder that, thus sick and dying as was this poor Humanity of ours under the highest earthly culture, its many-voiced cry for the balm in Gilead, and the Physician there, "Come over and help us," pierced the hearts of the missionaries of the cross, and made them "not ashamed of the gospel of Christ!" and receiving in themselves that recompense of their error which was meet—alluding to the many physical and moral ways in which, under the righteous government of God, vice was made self-avenging. 28-31. gave them over (or, 'up'—see on v. 24) . . . to do those things which are not convenient—in the old sense of that word, i.e., 'not becoming,' 'indecorous,' 'shameful,' 'haters of God'—The word usually signifies 'God-hated,' which some here prefer, in the sense of 'abhorred of the Lord,' expressing the detestableness of their character in His sight (cf. Proverbs, 22. 14; Psalm 73. 20). But the active sense of the word, adopted in our version and by the majority of expositors, though rarer, agrees perhaps better with the context. 32. Who knowing from the voice of conscience, ch. 2. 14, 15) the judgment of God (the stern law of divine procedure), that they which commit such things are worthy of death—here used in its widest known sense, as the uttermost of divine vengeance against sin: see Acts, 28. 4. not only do the same—which they might do under the pressure of temptation and in the heat of passion, but have pleasure in them that do them—deliberately set their seal to such actions by encouraging and applauding the doing of them in others. This is the climax of our apostle's charges against the heathen; and certainly, if the things are in themselves as black as possible, this settled and unblushing satisfaction at the practice of them, apart from all the blinding effects of present passion, must be regarded as the darkest feature of human depravity. —On this section, note, (1.) "The wrath of God" against sin has all the dread reality of a "revelation from heaven" sounding in the consciences of men, in the self-inflicted miseries of the wicked, and in the vengeance which God's moral government, sooner or later, takes upon all who outrage it; so this "wrath of God" is not confined to high-handed crimes, or the grosser manifestations of human depravity, but is "revealed" against all violations of divine law of whatever nature — "against all ungodliness as well as" "unrighteousness of men," against all disregard of God in the conduct of life as well as against all deviations from moral rectitude; and therefore, since no child of Adam can plead guiltless either of "ungodliness" or of "unrighteousness," to a greater or less extent, it follows that every human being is involved in the awful sweep of "the wrath of God" (v. 18). The apostle places this terrible truth in the forefront of his argument on justification by faith, that upon the basis of universal condemnation he might rear the edifice of a free, world-wide salvation; nor can the gospel be scripturally preached or embraced, save as the good news of salvation to those that are all equally "lost." (2.) We must not magnify the supernatural revelation which God has been pleased to make of Himself, through Abraham's family to the human race, at the expense of that elder and, in itself, lustrous revelation which He has made to the whole family of man through the medium of their own nature and the creation around them. Without the latter, the former would have been impossible, and those who have not been favoured with the former will be without excuse, if they are deaf to the voice and blind to the glory of the latter (v. 19, 20). (3.) Wilful resistance of light has a retributive tendency to blunt the moral perceptions and weaken the capacity to apprehend and approve of truth and goodness; and thus is the soul prepared to surrender itself, to an indefinite extent, to error and sin (v. 21, &c.). (4.) Pride of wisdom, as it is a convincing evidence of the want of it, so it makes the attainment of it impossible (v. 22; and cf. Matthew, 11. 25; 1 Corinthians, 3. 18-20). (5.) As Idolatry, even in its most plausible forms, is the fruit of unworthy views of the Godhead, so its natural effect is to vitiate and debase still further the religious conceptions; nor is there any depth of degradation too low and too revolting for men's ideas of the Godhead to sink to, if only their natural temperament and the circumstances they are placed in be favourable to their unrestrained development (v. 23, 25). The apostle had Greece and Egypt in his eye when he penned this description. But the whole Paganisms of the East at this day attest its accuracy, from the more elaborate idolatry of India down to the childish rudiments of nature-worship prevalent among the savage tribes. Alas! Christendom itself furnishes a melancholy illustration of this truth; the constant use of material images in the Church of Rome and the materialistic and sensuous character of its entire service (to say nothing of the less offensive but stupider service of the Greek Church) debasing the religious ideas of millions of nominal Christians, and lowering the whole character and tone of Christianity as represented within their immense pale. (6.)

Moral corruption invariably follows religious debasement. The grossness of Pagan idolatry is only equalled by the revolting character and frightful extent of the immoralities which it fostered and consecrated (v. 24, 25, 27). And so strikingly is this to be seen in all its essential features in the East at this day, that (as HODGKIN says) the missionaries have frequently been accused by the natives of having forged the whole of the latter part of this chapter, as they could not believe that so accurate a description of themselves could have been written eighteen centuries ago. The kingdoms of Israel and Judah furnish a striking illustration of the inseparable connection between religion and morals. Israel corrupted and debased the worship of Jehovah, and the sins with which they were charged were mostly of the grosser kind—intemperance and sensuality: Judah, remaining faithful to the pure worship, were for a long time charged mostly with formality and hypocrisy; and only as they fell into the idolatries of the heathen around them, did they sink into their vices. And may not a like distinction be observed between the two great divisions of Christendom, the Popsish and the Protestant? To test this, we must not look to Popery, surrounded with, and more or less influenced by, the presence and power of Protestantism; nor to Protestantism under every sort of disadvantage, internal and external. But look at Romanism where it has unrestrained liberty to develop its true character, and see whether impurity does not there taint society to its core, pervading alike the highest and the lowest classes; and then look at Protestantism where it enjoys the same advantages, and see whether it be not marked by a comparatively high standard of social virtue. (7.) To take pleasure in what is sinful and vicious for its own sake, and knowing it to be such, is the last and lowest stage of human recklessness (v. 32). But (8.) this knowledge can never be wholly extinguished in the breast of man. So long as reason remains to them, there is a still small voice in the worst of men, protesting, in the name of the Power that implanted it, "that they which do such things are worthy of death" (v. 32).

CHAPTER II.

VER. 1-29. THE JEW UNDER LIKE CONDEMNATION WITH THE GENTILE. From those without, the apostle now turns to those within the pale of revealed religion the self-righteous Jews, who looked down upon the uncovenanted heathen as beyond the pale of God's mercies, within which they deemed themselves secure, however inconsistent their life may be. Alas! what multitudes wrap themselves up in like fatal confidence, who occupy the corresponding position in the Christian Church. 4. the goodness of God leadeth thee to repentance —i.e., is designed and adapted to do so. 5. treasure up unto thyself wrath against (rather 'in') the day of wrath—i.e. wrath to come on thee in the day of wrath. What an awful idea is here expressed—that the sinner himself is amassing, like hoarded treasure, an ever-accumulating stock of divine wrath, to burst upon him in "the day of the revelation of the righteous judgment of God!" And this is said not of the reckless, but of those who boasted of their purity of faith and life. 7-10. To them who, &c.—The substance of these verses is that the final judgment will turn upon character alone, by patient continuance in well-doing, &c.—cf. Luke, 8. 15: "That on the good ground are they, which in an honest and good heart, having heard the word, keep it, and bring forth fruit with patience;" denoting the enduring and progressive character of the new life. But unto them that are contentious, and do not obey the truth, &c.—referring to such keen and determined resistance to the gospel as himself had too painfully witnessed on the part of his own countrymen. See Acts, 13. 44-46; 17. 5, 13; 18. 6, 12; and cf. 1 Thessalonians, 2. 15, 16. indignation and wrath—in the bosom of a sin-avenging God. tribulation and anguish—the effect of these in the sinner himself. to the Jew first—first in perdition if unfaithful; but if obedient to the truth, first in salvation (v. 10). 11, 12. For as many as have sinned—not ‘as many as have sinned of all’ but, ‘as many as are found in sin’ at the judgment of the great day (as its whole context shows). without law—i.e., without the advantage of a positive Revelation. shall also perish without law—exempt from the charge of rejecting or disregarding it. and as many as have sinned in the law—within the pale of a positive, written Revelation. shall be judged by the law—tried and condemned by the higher standard of that written Revelation. 13-15. For not the hearers, &c.—q.d., ‘As touching the Jews, in whose ears the written law is continually resounding, the condemnation of as many of them as are found sinners at the last involves no difficulty; but even as respects the heathen, who are strangers to the law in its positive and written form—since they show how deeply it is engraven on their moral nature, which witnesses within them for righteousness and against iniquity, accusing or commending them according as they violate or obey its stern dictates—their condemnation also for all the sin in which they live and die will carry its dreadful echo in their own breasts, their thoughts the mean while accusing or else excusing—i.e., perhaps by turns doing both. 16. In the day, &c.—Here the unfinished statement of v. 12 is resumed and closed, shall judge the secrets of men—here specially referring to the unfathomable depths of hypocrisy in the self-righteous whom the apostle had to deal with. (See Ecclesiastes, 12, 14; 1 Corinthians, 4, 5.) according to my gospel—but my teaching as a preacher of the gospel. 17-24. Behold—‘But if’ is, beyond doubt, the true reading here. (It differs but in a single letter from the received reading, and the sense is the same.) approve the things that are more excellent—Margin, ‘triest the things that differ.’ Both senses are good, and indeed the former is but the result of the latter action. See on Philippians, 1, 10, that the form of knowledge and of the truth is the law—not being left, as the heathen are, to vague conjecture on divine things, but favoured with definite and precise information from heaven. thou that abhorrest idols (as the Jews did ever after their captivity, though bent on them before), dost thou commit sacrifices?—not, as some excellent interpreters, ‘dost thou rob idol-temples?’ but more generally, as we take it, ‘dost thou profane holy things?’ (as in Matthew, 21, 12, 13, and in other ways). as it is written—see Margin reference. 25-29. For circumcision—i.e., One’s being within the covenant of which circumcision was the outward sign and seal. verily profecth, if thou keep the law—if the inward reality correspond to the outward sign. but if, &c.—q.d., ‘Otherwise, thou art no better than the uncircumcised heathen.’ Therefore if the uncircumcised keep the . . . law, &c.—Two mistaken interpretations, we think, are given of these words: First, that the case here supposed is an impossible one, and put merely for illustration (HALDANE, CHALKERS, HODGE); second, that it is the case of the heathen who may and do please God when they act, as has been and is done, up to the light of nature (GROTIUS, OLSHAUSEN, &c.). The first interpretation is, in our judgment, unnatural; the second, opposed to the apostle’s own teaching. But the case here put is, we think, such as that of Cornelius (Acts, 10, 1), who, though outside the external pale of God’s covenant, yet having come to the knowledge of the truths contained in it, do manifest the grace of the covenant without the seal of it, and exemplify the character and walk of Abraham’s children, though not called by the name of Abraham. Thus, this is but another way of announcing that God was about to show the insufficiency of the mere badge of the Abrahamic covenant, by calling from among the Gentiles a seed of Abraham that had never received the seal of circumcision (see on Galatians, 5, 6); and this interpretation is confirmed by all that follows. he is not a Jew which is one outwardly, &c.—in other words, the name of ‘Jew’ and the rite of ‘circumcision’ were designed but as outward symbols of a separation from the irreligious and ungodly world unto holy devotedness in heart and life to the God of salvation: Where this is realised, the signs are full of significance; but where it is not, they are worse than useless.—Note, (1.) It is a sad mark of depravity when all that is designed and fitted to melt into one hardens the heart (v. 4, and cf. 2 Peter, 3, 9; Ecclesiastes, 8, 11). (2.) Amidst all the inequalities of religious opportunity measured out to men, and the mysterious bearing of this upon their character and destiny for eternity, the same great principles of judgment, in a form suited to their respective discipline, will be applied to all, and perfect equity will be seen to reign throughout every stage of the divine administration (v. 11-16). (3.) ‘The law written on the heart’ (v. 14, 15)—or the Ethics of Natural Theology—may be said to be the one deep foundation on which all revealed religion reposes; and see on ch. 1, 19, 20, where we have what we may call its other foundation—the Physics and Metaphysics of Natural Theology. The testimony of these two passages is to the Theologian invaluable, while in the breast of every teachable Christian it awakens such deep echoes as are inexpressibly solemn and precious. (4.) High religious professions are a fearful aggravation of the inconsistencies of such as make them (v. 17-24). See 2 Samuel, 12, 14. (5.) As no external privileges, or badges of discipleship, will shield the unholiness from the wrath of God, so neither will the want of them shut out from the kingdom of heaven such as have experienced without them that change of heart which the seals of God’s covenant were designed to mark. In the sight of the great Searcher of hearts, the Judge of quick and dead, the renovation of the character in heart and life is all in all. In view of this, have not all baptised, sacramented disciples of the Lord Jesus, who ‘profess that they know God, but in works deny Him,’ need to tremble—who, under the guise of friends, are ‘the enemies of the cross of Christ?’

CHAPTER III.

Ver. 1-8. JEWISH OBJECTIONS ANSWERED. 1, 2. What advantage then hath the Jew?—q.d., ‘If the final judgment will turn solely on the state of the heart, and this may be as good in the Gentile without as in the Jew within the sacred enclosure of God’s covenant, what better are we Jews for all our advantages?’ Answer: Much every way; chiefly, because (rather, first, that) unto them were committed the oracles of God. This remarkable expression, denoting ‘divine communications’ in general, is transferred to the Scriptures to express their oracular, divine, authoritative character. 3, 4. For what if some did not believe?—It is the unbelief of the great body of the nation which the apostle points at; but as it sufficed for his argument to put the supposition thus gently, he uses this word ‘some’ to soften prejudice. shall their unbelief make the faith (or, faithfulness) of God of none effect?—‘nullify,’ ‘invalidate’ it. God forbid—lit., ‘Let it not be,’ q.d., ‘Away with such a thought!’—a favourite expression of our apostle, when he would not only repudiate a supposed consequence of his doctrine, but express his abhorrence of it. ‘The Scriptures do not authorise such a use of God’s name as must have been common among the English translators of the Bible.’ (HODGE.) yea, let God be (held) true, and every man a liar—i.e., even though it should follow from this that every man is a liar. when thou art judged—so in Psalm 51, 4, according to the LXX.; but in the Hebrew and in our version, ‘when thou judgest.’ The general sentiment, however, is the same in both—that we are to κἀλλίστα the righteousness of God, at whatever expense to ourselves. 5. & 6. But if, &c.—Another objection: g. d., 'It would appear, then, that the more faithless we are, so much the more illustrious will the fidelity of God appear; and in that case, for Him to take vengeance on us for our unfaithfulness would be (to speak as men profanely do) unrighteousness in God.' Answer: God forbid: for then how shall God judge the world?—g. d., 'Far from us be such a thought; for that would strike down all future judgment.' 7. & 8. For if the truth of God, &c.—A further illustration of the same sentiment: g. d., 'Such reasoning amounts to this—which indeed we who preach salvation by free grace are slanderously accused of teaching—that the more evil we do, the more glory will redound to God: a damnable principle.' (Thus the apostle, instead of refuting this principle, thinks it enough to hold it up to execration, as one that shocks the moral sense.)—On this brief section, Note (1.) Mark the places here assigned to the Scriptures. In answer to the question, "What advantage hath the Jew? or What profit is there of circumcision?" those holding Romish views would undoubtedly have laid the stress upon the priesthood, as the glory of the Jewish economy. But in the apostle's esteem, "the craces of God" were the jewel of the ancient church (v. 1, 2). (3.) God's eternal purposes and man's free agency, as also the doctrine of salvation by grace and the unchanging obligations of God's law, have ever been subjected to the charge of inconsistency by those who will bow to no truth which their own reason cannot fathom. But amidst all the clouds and darkness which in this present state envelope the divine administration and many of the truths of the Bible, such broad and deep principles as are here laid down, and which shine in their own lustre, will be found the sheet-anchor of our faith. "Let God be true, and every man a liar," and as many advocates of Salvation by grace as say, "Let us do evil that good may come," "their damnation is just."

9-20. THAT THE JEW IS SHUT UP UNDER LIKE CONDEMNATION WITH THE GENTILE IS PROVED BY HIS OWN SCRIPTURE. 9. are we better than they? ('do we excel them?') No, in no wise—Better off the Jews certainly were, for having the oracles of God to teach them better; but as they were no better, that only aggravated their guilt. 10-12. As it is written, &c.—(Psalm 14. 1-3; 53. 1-3.) These statements of the Psalmist were indeed suggested by particular manifestations of human depravity occurring under his own eye; but as this only showed what man, when unrestrained, is in his present condition, they were quite pertinent to the apostle's purpose. 13-18. Their, &c.—From generals, the apostle here comes to particulars, culling from different parts of Scripture passages which speak of depravity as it affects the different members of the body; as if to show more affectingly how "from the sole of the foot even to the head there is no soundness" in us. Their THROAT is an open sepulchre—(Psalm 5. 9); g. d., 'What proceeds out of their heart, and finds vent in speech and action through the throat, is like the penitential breath of an open grave.' with their TONGUES they have used deceit—(Psalm 5. 9); g. d., 'That tongue which is man's glory (Psalm 16. 9; 57. 8) is prostituted to the purposes of deception.' the poison of asps is under their LIPS—(Psalm 140. 3); g. d., 'Those lips which should "drop as an honey-comb," and "feed many," and "give thanks unto His name." (Canticles, 4. 11; Proverbs, 10. 31; Hebrews, 13. 15) are employed to secrete and to dart deadly poison.' WHOSE MOUTHS, &c.—(Psalm 10. 7); g. d., 'That mouth which should be "most sweet" (Canticles, 4. 16), being "set on fire of hell" (James, 3. 6), is filled with burning wrath against those whom it should only bless.' Their FEET are swift to shed blood—(Proverbs, 1. 16; Isaiah, 56. 7); g. d., 'Those feet, which should "run the way of God's commandments" (Psalm 119. 23), are employed to conduct men to deeds of darkest crime.' Destruction and misery are in their ways; and the way of peace have they not known—This is a supplementary statement about men's tears, suggested by what had been said about the "feet," and expresses the mischief and misery which men smother in their path, instead of that peace which, as strangers to it themselves, they cannot diffuse. There is no fear of God before their eyes—(Psalm 26. 1); g. d., 'Did the eyes but "see Him who is invisible" (Hebrews, 11. 27), a reverential awe of Him with whom we have to do would chasten every joy and lift the soul out of its deepest depressions; but to all this the natural man is a stranger.' How graphic is this picture of human depravity, finding its way through each several organ of the body into the life: but how small a part of the "desperate wickedness" that is within (Jeremiah, 17. 9) "proceedeth out of the heart of man" (Mark, 7. 21-23; Psalm 19. 12.) How we know that what the law (i. e., the Scriptures, considered as a law of duty) saith, it saith to them that are under the law—of course, therefore, to the Jews, that every mouth (opened in self-justification) may be stopped, and all the world may tremble (i. e., be seen to be, and own itself) guilty (and so condemned) before God. 20. Therefore by the deeds of (obedience to) the law there shall no flesh be justified—i. e., be held and treated as righteous; as is plain from the whole scope and strain of the argument. In his sight—at His bar (Psalm 143. 2). for by the law is the knowledge of sin. See on ch. 4. 15; 7. 7; 1 John, 3. 4).—Note: How broad and deep does the apostle in this section lay the foundations of his great doctrine of Justification by free grace—in the disorder of man's whole nature, the consequent universality of human guilt, the condemnation, by reason of the breach of divine law, of the whole world, and the impossibility of justification before God by obedience to that violated law! Only when these humiliating conclusions are accepted and felt, are we in a condition to appreciate and embrace the grace of the Gospel, next to be opened up.

21-26. GOD'S JUSTIFYING RIGHTEOUSNESS, THROUGH FAITH IN JESUS CHRIST, ALIKE ADAPTED TO OUR NECESSITIES AND WORTHY OF HIMSELF. 21-23. But now the righteousness of God (see on ch. 1. 17) without the law—i. e., a righteousness to which our obedience to the law contributes nothing whatever (v. 28; Galatians, 2. 16). is manifested, being witnessed (attested), by the Law and the Prophets—the Old Testament Scriptures. Thus this justifying righteousness, though new, as only now fully disclosed, is an old righteousness, as predicted and foreshadowed in the Old Testament, by faith of (i. e., in) Jesus Christ unto all and upon all them that believe—i. e., perhaps, brought nigh "unto all" men (the Gospel, and actually "upon all" believing men, as theirs in possession [LUTHER, &c.]; but most interpreters understand both statements of believers, as only a more emphatic way of saying that all believers, without distinction or exception, are put in possession of this gratuitous justification, purely by faith in Christ Jesus, for there is no difference: for all have sinned—Though men differ greatly in the nature and extent of their sinfulness, there is absolutely no difference between the best and the worst of men, in the fact, that "all have sinned," and so underlie the wrath of God, and come short of the glory (or 'praise') of God—i. e., 'have failed to earn his approbation' (cf. John, 12. 43, Orrok). So the best interpreters. 24. justified freely (without anything done on our part to deserve it) by his grace (His free love) through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus—a most important clause: teaching us that though justification is quite gratuitous, it is not a mere fiat of the divine will, but based on a "Redemption," i. e., 'the payment of a Ransom,' in Christ's death. That this is the sense of the word 'redemption.' applied to Christ's death, will appear clear to spiritual student of the passages where it occurs. Whom God hath set forth [to be] a propitiatory sacrifice through faith in his blood—of the best interpreters, observing that "faith is the usual phrase in Greek, not "faith in," would place a comma after "faith," and understand the words as if written thus: "to be a propitiatory sacrifice, through faith." But "faith in Christ" in Galatians, 3. 26, and Ephesians, 1. 15; and "in His blood" is the natural and appropriate phrase here, to declare his righteousness for the remission—rather, 'pretermisison' or 'passing by,' of sins (sins) that are past—not the sins committed by sinner before he embraces Christ, but the sins sisted under the old economy, before Christ came at away sin by the sacrifice of Himself," through remission of God—God not remitting but only forgiving to punish them, or passing them by, until an atonement for them should be made. In not imputing them, God was righteous, but He not seems to be so; there was no "manifestation of righteousness" in doing so under the ancient my. But now that God can "set forth" Christ "propitiatory for sin through faith in His blood," righteousness of His procedure in passing by the sins of believers before, and in now remitting them, is defeated," declared, brought fully out to the view of a whole world. Our translators have unfortunately this glorious truth, taking "the sins that were," to mean the past sins of believers—committed before faith—and rendering, by the word "remission," what means only a "passing by," thus making clear that "remission of sins" is "through the grace of God," which it certainly is not. To us at this time (now for the first time, under the old) his righteousness: that he might be just, and the law of him that believeth in Jesus—Glorious paradox! in punishing, and 'merciful in pardoning,' men understand; but 'just in justifying the guilty,' sees them. But the propitiation through faith in His blood resolves the paradox and harmonises seemingly discordant elements. For in that "God made Him to be sin for us who knew no sin," we have full satisfaction; and in that "we are made righteous of God in Him," mercy has her father's delight!—Note (1.) One way of a sinner's justification is taught in the Old Testament and in the New; only more dimly during the twilight of Revelation; in unclouded light under its perfect day (e. 21); there is no difference in the need, so is there in the liberty to appropriate the provided salvation.

The best need to be saved by faith in Jesus Christ; and the worst only need that. On this common ground all saved sinners meet here, and will stand for ever, 22-24. (3.) It is on the atoning blood of Christ, not one propitiatory sacrifice which God hath set forth to the eye of the sinner, that the faith of the meek and trembling sinner fastens for deliverance from wrath. Though he knows that he is "justified by God's grace," it is only because it is "through redemption that is in Christ Jesus," that he is able to find peace and rest even in this (e. 25). (4.) The accurate view of believers under the Old Testament, is not that of a company of pardoned men, but in whose sins, put up with and passed by in the time, awaited a future expiation in the fulness of (e. 25, 26; see on Luke, 9. 31; and on Hebrews, 9. 15; 1. 20, 40).

3. INFERENCES FROM THE FOREGOING DOCTRINE, AND AN OBJECTION ANSWERED. Inference: Boasting is excluded by this, and no other way of justification. 27, 28. Where is boasting then? . . . led. By what law! (on what principle, or scheme?) etc.? Nay; but by the law of faith. Therefore we conclude, &c.—It is the unavoidable tendency of dependence upon our own works, less or more, for acceptance with God, to beget a spirit of "boasting." But that God should encourage such a spirit in sinners, by any procedure of His, is incredible. This therefore stamps falsehood upon every form of 'justification by works,' whereas the doctrine that—manifestly and entirely excludes "boasting," and this is the best evidence of its truth. Inference second: This and no other way of salvation is adapted alike to Jew and Gentile. Is he God of the Jews only? &c.—The way of salvation must be one equally suited to the whole family of fallen man: but the doctrine of justification by faith is the only one that lays the basis of a Universal Religion; this therefore is another mark of its truth. [It is] one God who shall justify (q. d., 'has unchangeably fixed that he shall justify') the circumcision by ('of') faith, and the uncircumcision through faith—probably this is but a varied statement of the same truth for greater emphasis (see on e. 22); though Bengel thinks that the justification of the Jews, as the born heirs of the promise, may be here purposely said to be "of faith," while that of the Gentiles, previously "strangers to the covenants of promise," may be said to be "through faith," as thus admitted into a new family. Objections: Do we then make void the law through faith?—q. d., 'Does this doctrine of justification by faith, then, dissolve the obligation of the law? If so, it cannot be of God. But away with such a thought, for it does just the reverse.' God forbid: yes, we establish the law. It will be observed here, that, important as was this objection, and opening up as it did so noble a field for the illustration of the peculiar glory of the Gospel, the apostle does no more here than indignantly repel it, intending at a subsequent stage of his argument (ch. 6.), to resume and discuss it at length.—Note (1.) It is a fundamental requisite of all true religion that it tend to humble the sinner and exalt God; and every system, which breeds self-righteousness, or cherishes boasting, bears falsehood on its face (e. 27, 28). (2.) The fitness of the Gospel to be a universal religion, beneath which the guilty of every name and degree are invited and warranted to take shelter and repose, is a glorious evidence of its truth (e. 29, 30). (3.) The glory of God's law, in its eternal and immutable obligations, is then only fully apprehended by the sinner, and then only is it enthroned in the depths of his soul, when, believing that "He was made sin for him who knew no sin," he sees himself "made the righteousness of God in Him." Thus do we not make void the law through faith: yes, we establish the law. (4.) This chapter, and particularly the latter part of it, "is the proper seat of the Pauline doctrine of justification, and the grand proof-passage of the Protestant doctrine of the Imputation of Christ's righteousness and of justification not on account of but through faith alone." [PHILIPPI.] To make good this doctrine, and reseat it in the faith and affection of the Church, was worth all the bloody struggles that it cost our fathers, and it will be the wisdom and safety, the life and vigour of the churches, to "stand fast in this liberty wherewith Christ hath made them free, and not be again entangled"—in the very least degree—"with the yoke of bondage."

"Our faith receives a righteousness

CHAPTER IV.

Ver. 1-25. THE FOREGOING DOCTRINE OF JUSTIFICATION BY FAITH ILLUSTRATED FROM THE OLD TESTAMENT. First: Abraham was justified by faith. 1-3. What shall we say then that Abraham our father as pertaining to the flesh, hath found?—i. e., (as the order in the original shows) 'hath found, as pertaining to 'according to,' or 'through' the flesh; meaning, 'by all his natural efforts or legal obedience.' For a. 26-28.

were justified by works, he hath whereof to glory; but not before God—q. d. "If works were the ground of Abraham's justification, he would have matter for boasting; but as it is perfectly certain that he hath none in the sight of God, it follows that Abraham could not have been justified by works." And to this agree the words of Scripture. For what saith the Scripture? Abraham believed God, and it (his faith) was counted to him for righteousness—(Genesis, 15, 6.) Romish expositors and Arminian Protestants make this to mean that God accepted Abraham's act of believing as a substitute for complete obedience. But this is at variance with the whole spirit and letter of the apostle's teaching. Throughout this whole argument, faith is set in direct opposition to works, in the matter of justification—and even in the next two verses. The meaning, therefore, cannot possibly be that the mere act of believing—which is as much a work as any other piece of commanded duty (John, 6, 29; 1 John, 3, 23)—was counted to Abraham for all obedience. The meaning plainly is, that Abraham believed in the promises which embraced Christ (Genesis, 12, 3; 15, 6, &c.), as we believe in Christ Himself; and in both cases, faith is merely the instrument that puts us in possession of the blessing gratuitously bestowed. 4. 5. Now to him that worketh (as a servant for wages) is the reward not reckoned of grace (as a matter of favour) but of debt—as a matter of right. But to him that worketh not—who, despairing of acceptance with God by "working" for it the work of obedience, does not attempt it; but believeth on him that justifieth the ungodly—casts himself upon the mercy of Him that justifieth those who deserve only condemnation. his faith, &c.—see on v. 3. Second: David sings of the same justification. 6-8. David also describeth ('speaketh,' 'pronounceth') the blessedness of the man unto whom the Lord imputeth righteousness without works—whom, though void of all good works, He, nevertheless, regards and treats as righteous. [Saying], Blessed, &c.—Psalm 32, 1, 2. David here sings in express terms only of "transgression forgiven, sin covered, iniquity not imputed;" but as the negative blessing necessarily includes the positive, the passage is strictly in point. 9-12. Cometh this blessedness then, &c.—q. d., "Say not, All this is spoken of the circumcised, and is therefore no evidence of God's general way of justifying men; for Abraham's justification took place long before he was circumcised, and so could have no dependence upon that rite: nay, "the sign of circumcision" was given to Abraham as "a seal" (or token) of the justifying righteousness which he had before he was circumcised; in order that he might stand forth to every age as the parent believer—the model-man of justification by faith—after whose type, as the first public example of it, all were to be moulded, whether Jew or Gentile, who should thereafter believe to life everlasting." 13-15. For the promise, &c. This is merely an enlargement of the foregoing reasoning, applying to the law what had just been said of circumcision. that he should be the heir of the world—or, that "all the families of the earth should be blessed in him." was not to Abraham and his seed through the law—in virtue of obedience to the law; but through the righteousness of faith—in virtue of his simple faith in the divine promises. For if they which are of the law be heirs—if the blessing is to be earned by obedience to the law, faith is made void—the whole divine method is subverted. Because the law worketh wrath—has nothing to give to those who break it but condemnation and vengeance. for where there is no law there is no transgression—it is just the law that makes transgression, in the case of those who break it; nor can the one exist without the other. 16, 17. Therefore, &c.—A general summary: q. d., "Thus justification is by faith, in order that its purely gracious character may be seen, and that all who follow in the steps of Abraham's faith—whether of his natural seed or no—may be assured of the like justification with the parent-believer." As it is written, &c.—(Genesis, 17, 6.) This is quoted to justify his calling Abraham the "father of us all," and is to be viewed as a parenthetical, before (i. e., "in the reckoning of") him whom he believed—q. d., "Thus Abraham, in the reckoning of Him whom he believed, is the father of us all, in order that all may be assured, that doing as he did, they shall be treated as he was. [even] God, that quickeneth the dead—The nature and greatness of that faith of Abraham which we are to copy is here strikingly described. What he was required to believe being above nature, his faith had to fasten upon God's power to surmount physical incapacity, and call into being what did not then exist. But God having made the promise, Abraham believed Him in spite of those obstacles. This is still further illustrated in what follows. 18-22. Who against hope—when no ground for hope appeared, believed in hope—i. e., cherished the believing expectation, that he might become the father of many nations, according to that which was spoken, &c. (i. e., Such "as the stars of heaven," Genesis, 15, 6) say they shall be. . . he considered not, &c.—paid no attention to those physical obstacles, both in himself and in Sarah, which might seem to render the fulfilment hopeless. He staggered (hesitated) not . . . but was strong in faith, giving glory to God—as able to make good His own word in spite of all obstacles. And being fully persuaded, &c.—i. e., the glory which Abraham's faith gave to God consisted in this, that, firm in the persuasion of God's ability to fulfil his promise, no difficulties shook him. And therefore it was imputed, &c.—q. d., "Let all then take notice that this was not because of any thing meritorious in Abraham, but merely because he so believed." 23-25. Now, &c.—Here is the application of this whole argument about Abraham: "These things were not recorded as mere historical facts, but as illustrations for all time of God's method of justification by faith," to whom it shall be imputed, if we believe in him that raised up Jesus our Lord from the dead—in Him that hath done this, even as Abraham believed that God would raise up a seed in whom all nations should be blessed. Who was delivered for 'on account of,' our offences—i. e., in order to expiate them by His blood, and raised again for 'on account of,' i. e., in order to; our justification—As His resurrection was the divine assurance that He had "put away sin by the sacrifice of Himself," and the crowning of His whole work, our justification is fitly connected with that glorious act.—Note, (1.) The doctrine of justification by works, as it generates self-exaltation, is contrary to the first principles of all true religion (v. 2; and see on ch. 3, 21-26, note 1.). (2.) The way of a sinner's justification has been the same in all time, and the testimony of the Old Testament on this subject is one with that of the New (v. 3, &c.; and see on ch. 3, 27-31, note 1.). (3.) Faith and works, in the matter of justification, are opposite and irreconcilable, even as grace and debt (v. 4, 5; and see on ch. 11, 6). If God "justifies the ungodly," works cannot be, in any sense or to any degree, the ground of justification. For the same reason, the first requisite, in order to justification, must be (under the conviction that we are "ungodly") to despair of it by works; and the next, to "believe in Him that justifieth the ungodly"—that hath a justifying righteousness to bestow, and is ready to bestow it upon those who deserve none, and to embrace it accordingly. (4.) The sacraments of the Church were never intended, and are not adapted, to confer grace, or the blessings of salvation, upon men. Their proper use is to set a divine seal upon a state already existing, and so, they presuppose, and do not create it (v. 8-12). As circumcision merely "sealed" Abraham's already existing acceptance with God, so with the sacraments of the New Testament. (5.) As "the heir of the world," all nations being in, through his Seed Christ Jesus, and by according to the pattern of his faith, so also of the true religion and all the salvation the world will ever experience shall yet lack with wonder, gratitude, and joy, to go down when "the God of glory appeared over Abraham, when he was in Mesopotamia he dwelt in Charran," Acts, 7. 2 (v. 13). gives more glory to God than simple faith, especially when all things seem to render it of it hopeless. (v. 18-21). (7.) All the examples of faith were recorded on purpose to encourage the like faith in every succeeding age; and cf. ch. 15. 4. (8.) Justification—argument, cannot be taken—as Romanists errorists insist—to mean a change upon eter; for besides that this is to confound its location, which has its appropriate place in the whole argument of the present chapter, all its more important clauses, expressions—would in that case be unsuitable, only to mislead. Beyond all doubt it means a change upon men's state or relation to God; in scientific language, it is an objective, not a subjective—a change from guilt and condemnation to acquittal and acceptance. And the best at this is the key to the whole argument is, as all the words of the many-chambered which the apostle has enriched us in this

CHAPTER V.

THE BLESSED EFFECTS OF JUSTIFICATION.—The proof of this doctrine being made, the apostle comes here to treat of its fruit, the full consideration of this topic to be of the argument (ch. 8. 1). Therefore being justified by faith, we have peace with God; we are to be guided by HIS authority, the gift here, beyond doubt, is, 'Let us have doing, however, which most reject, because it unnatural to exhort men to have what is God to give, and because the apostle is giving exhortations, but stating matters of fact as it seems hazardous to set aside the timony of MSS., as to what the apostle did pour of what we merely think he ought to do, let us pause and ask—If it be the privilege justified to "have peace with God," why the apostle begin his enumeration of the justification by calling on believers to 'realise' as belonging to them, or cherish the joyfulness of it as their own? And if this is what it would not be necessary to continue in style, and the other fruits of justification set down simply as matters of fact. This first a change on God's relation to us; and consequence of this, a change on our part in. God, on the one hand, has "reconciled self by Jesus Christ" (2 Corinthians, 5. 18); on the other hand, setting our seal to this, cited to God" (2 Corinthians, 5. 20). The seal is the meeting place: there the contract both sides terminates in an honourable "peace." 2. By whom also we have "have" by faith into this grace (favour with God) stand—q. d., "To that same faith which first gave us peace with God" we owe our introduction permanent standing in the favour of God, justified enjoying. As it is difficult to distinguish from the peace first mentioned, we regard it as an additional phase of the same. [MEYER, MUEHLING,] rather than something new. [BUCK, HODGKIN.] and rejoice—"glory" boast, 'rejoice,' is not strong enough. In hope of the glory of God—See on "hope," v. 4. 3. 4. we glory in tribulation also: knowing that tribulation worketh patience—Patience is the quiet endurance of what we cannot but wish removed, whether it be the withholding of promised good (ch. 8. 25), or the continued experience of positive ill (as here). There is indeed a patience of unrenewed nature, which has something noble in it, though in many cases the offspring of pride, if not of something lower. Men have been known to endure every form of privation, torture, and death, without a murmur and without even visible emotion, merely because they deemed it unworthy of them to sink under unavoidable ill. But this proud, stoical hardness has nothing in common with the grace of patience—which is either the meek endurance of ill because it is of God (Job, 1. 21, 22; 2. 10), or the calm waiting for promised good till His time to dispense it come (Hebrews, 10. 36); in the full persuasion that such trials are divinely appointed, are the needed discipline of God's children, are but for a definite period, and are not sent without abundant promises of "songs in the night." If such be the "patience" which "tribulation worketh," no wonder that patience worketh experience—rather 'proof,' as the same word is rendered in 2 Corinthians, 2. 9; 13. 3; Phillipians, 2. 22; i. e., experimental evidence that we have "believed through grace," and experience ('proof') hope—"of the glory of God," as prepared for us. Thus have we hope in two distinct ways, and at two successive stages of the Christian life: first, immediately on believing, along with the sense of peace and abiding access to God (v. 1); next, after the reality of this faith has been "proved," particularly by the patient endurance of trials sent to test it. We first get it by looking away from ourselves to the Lamb of God; next, by looking into or upon ourselves as transformed by that "looking unto Jesus." In the one case, the mind acts (as they say objectively); in the other, subjectively. The one is (as divines say) the assurance of faith; the other, the assurance of sense. 5. And hope maketh not ashamed (putteth not to shame, as empty hopes do); because the love of God—i. e., not 'our love to God,' as the Romish and some Protestant expositors (following some of the fathers) represent it; but clearly 'God's love to us'—as most expositors agree. is shed abroad—id., 'poured forth,' i. e., copiously diffused (cf. John, 7. 38; Titus, 3. 6.) by the Holy Ghost, which is (rather 'was') given unto us—i. e., at the great Pentecostal effusion which is viewed as the formal donation of the Spirit to the Church of God, for all time and for each believer. (The Holy Ghost is here first introduced in this Epistle.) It is as if the apostle had said, 'And how can this hope of glory, which as believers we cherish, put us to shame, when we feel God Himself, by His Spirit given to us, drenching our hearts in sweet, all subduing sensations of His wondrous love to us in Christ Jesus? This leads the apostle to expatiate on the amazing character of that love. 6-8. For when we were yet without strength—i. e., powerless to deliver ourselves, and so ready to perish, in due time (at the appointed season) Christ died for the ungodly—Three signal properties of God's love are here given: First, "Christ died for the ungodly," whose character, so far from meriting any interposition in their behalf, was altogether repulsive to the eye of God; second, He did this "when they were without strength"—with nothing between them and perdition, but that self-originating divine compassion; third, He did this "at the due time," when it was most fitting that it should take place (cf. Galatians, 4. 4). The two former of these properties the apostle now proceeds to illustrate. For scarcely for a righteous man (a man of simply unexceptionable character) will one ('any one') die: yet peradventure for a good man—(a man who, besides being unexceptionable, is distinguished for goodness, a benefactor to society) some ('some one') would (rather 'do') even dare to die—q. d., "Scarce an instance occurs of self-sacrifice for one merely upright; though for one who makes himself a blessing to society there may be found an example of such noble surrender of life." [So BENGEL, OLSHADSEN, THOLOUX, ALFORD, PHILIPPI.] (To make the "righteous" and the "good" man here to mean the same person, and the whole sense to be that 'though rare, the case may occur, of one making a sacrifice of life for a worthy character,' [as CALVIN, REHA, FREITZCHE, JOWETT,] is extremely flat.) But God commendeth ('settleth off,' 'displayeth')—in glorious contrast with all that men will do for each other! his love toward us, in that, while we were yet sinners—i. e., in a state not of positive "goodness," nor even of negative "righteousness," but on the contrary, "sinners," a state which His soul hateth, Christ died for us—Now comes the overpowering inference, emphatically reduced. 9, 10. Much more than, being ('having been') now justified by his blood, we shall be saved from wrath through him. For if, when we were enemies, we were reconciled to God by the death of His Son, much more, being now ('having now been') reconciled, we shall be saved by His life—q. d., 'If that part of the Saviour's work which cost Him His blood, and which had to be wrought for persons incapable of the least sympathy either with His love or His labours in their behalf—even our "justification," our "reconciliation"—is already completed; how much more will He do all that remains to be done, since He has it to do, not by death-agonies any more, but in untroubled "life," and no longer for enemies, but for friends—from whom, at every stage of it, He receives the grateful response of redeemed and adoring souls! To be "saved from wrath through Him," denotes here the whole work of Christ towards believers, from the moment of justification, when the wrath of God is turned away from them, till the Judge on the great white throne shall discharge that wrath upon them that "obey not the Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ," and that work may all be summed up in "keeping them from falling, and presenting them faultless before the presence of his glory with exceeding joy" [Jude, 24: thus are they "saved from wrath through him." 11. And not only so, but we also joy (rather, "glory") in God through our Lord Jesus Christ, by ('through') whom we have now received the atonement—rather, "the reconciliation" [Marvin, as the same word is rendered in v. 10, and in 2 Corinthians, 5, 18, 19. (In fact, the earlier meaning of the English word 'atonement' was 'the reconciliation of two estranged parties.')] [TRENCH.] The foregoing effects of justification were all benefits to ourselves, calling for gratitude: this last may be termed a purely disinterested one. Our first feeling towards God, after we have found peace with Him, is that of clinging gratitude for so costly a salvation; but no sooner have we learned to cry, Abba, Father, under the sweet sense of reconciliation, than "gloriation" in Him takes the place of dread of Him, and now He appears to us "altogether lovely!"—On this section, Note (1). How gloriously does the Gospel evince its divine origin by basing all acceptable obedience on "peace with God," laying the foundations of this peace in a righteous "justification" of the sinner "through our Lord Jesus Christ," and making this the entrance to a permanent standing in the divine favour, and a triumphant expectation of future glory! (v. 1, 2. Other peace, worthy of the name, there is none; and as those who are strangers to it rise not to the enjoyment of such high fellowship with God, so they have neither any taste for it nor desire after it. (2.) As only believers possess the true secret of patience under trials, so, although "not joyous but grievous" in themselves (Hebrews, 12, 17), when trials divinely sent afford them the opportunity of evidencing their faith by the grace of patience under them, they should "count it all joy" (v. 3, 4; and see James, 1, 2, 3). (3.) "Hope," in the New Testament sense of the term, is not a lower degree of faith or assurance (as many now say, I hope for heaven, but am not sure of it); but invariably means "the confident expectation of future good." It presupposes faith; and what faith assures us will be ours, hope accordingly expects. In the nourishment of this hope, the soul's look outward to Christ for the ground of it, and inward upon ourselves for evidence of its reality, must act and react upon each other (v. 3 and 4 compared). (4.) It is the proper office of the Holy Ghost to beget in the soul the full conviction and joyful consciousness of the love of God in Christ Jesus to sinners of mankind, and to ourselves in particular; and where this exists, it carries with it such an assurance of final salvation as cannot deceive (v. 5). (5.) The justification of sinful men is not in virtue of their amendment, but of "the blood of God's Son;" and while this is expressly affirmed in v. 9, our reconciliation to God by the "death of His Son," affirmed in v. 10, is but a variety of the same statement. In both, the blessing meant is the restoration of the sinner to a righteous standing in the sight of God; and in both, the meritorious ground of this, which is intended to be conveyed, is the expiatory sacrifice of God's Son. (6.) Gratitude to God for redeeming love, if it could exist without delight in God Himself, would be a selfish and worthless feeling; but when the one rises into the other—the transporting sense of eternal "reconciliation" passing into "gloriation in God" Himself—then the lower is sanctified and sustained by the higher, and each feeling is perfective of the other (v. 11).

12-21. COMPARISON AND CONTRAST BETWEEN ADAM AND CHRIST IN THEIR RELATION TO THE HUMAN FAMILY. (This profound and most weighty section has occasioned an immense deal of critical and theological discussion, in which every point, and almost every clause, has been contested. We can here but set down what appears to us to be the only tenable view of it as a whole, and of its successive clauses, with some slight indication of the grounds of our judgment. 12. Wherefore—i. e., Things being so; referring back to the whole preceding argument, as by one man (Adam) sin—considered herein its guilt, criminality, penal desert, entered into the world, and death by (as the penalty of) sin; and so death passed upon all men, for that all have sinned—rather, 'all sinned,' i. e., in that one man's first sin. Thus death reaches every individual of the human family, as the penalty due to himself. [So, in substance, BENGEL, HODGE, PHILIPPI.] Here we should have expected the apostle to finish his sentence, in some such way as this: 'Even so, by one man righteousness has entered into the world, and life by righteousness.' But, instead of this, we have a digression extending to five verses, to illustrate the important statement of v. 12; and it is only at v. 18 that the comparison is resumed and finished. 13, 14. For until the law sin was in the world—i. e., during all the period from Adam "until the law" of Moses was given, God continued to treat men as sinners, but sin is not imputed where there is no law—q. d., 'There must therefore have been a law during that period, because sin was then imputed; as is now to be shown. Nevertheless death reigned from Adam to Moses, even over them that had not sinned after the similitude of Adam's transgression—But who are they?—a much contested question. In/sans (say some), who being guiltless of actual sin, may be said not to have sinned in the way that Adam did. [ACQUETIN, BEZA, HODGE.] But why should infants be specially connected with the period "from Adam to Moses," since they die alike in every period? And if the apostle meant to express here the death of infants, why has he done it so enigmatically? Besides, the death of infants is comprehended in the universal mortality on account of the first sin, so emphatically expressed in v. 12; what need then to specify it here?

and why, if not necessary, should we presume it to be meant here, unless the language unmistakably point to it—which it certainly does not? The meaning then must be, that 'death reigned from Adam to Moses, even over those that had not, like Adam, transgressed against a positive commandment, threatening death to the disobedient.' (So most interpreters.) In this case, the particle "even" instead of specifying one particular class of those who lived "from Adam to Moses" (as the other interpretation supposes), merely explains what it was that made the case of those who died from Adam to Moses worthy of special notice, namely, that "though unlike Adam and all since Moses, those who lived between the two had no positive threatening of death for transgression, nevertheless, death reigned over them," who is the figure (or, 'a type') of him [that was] to come—(Christ), 'This clause is inserted on the first mention of the name "Adam," the one man of whom he is speaking, to recall the purpose for which he is treating of him, as the figure of Christ.' [ALFORD.] The point of analogy intended here is plainly the public character which both sustained, neither of the two being regarded in the divine procedure towards men as mere individual men, but both alike as representative men. (Some take the proper supplement here to be "Him [that is] to come," understanding the apostle to speak from his own time, and to refer to Christ's second coming. [FRITZSCHE, DE WETTE, ALFORD.] but this is unnatural, since the analogy of the second Adam to the first has been in full development ever since "God exalted Him to be a Prince and a Saviour;" and it will only remain to be consummated at His second coming. The simple meaning is, as nearly all interpreters agree, that Adam is a type of Him who was to come after him in the same public character, and so to be "the second Adam.") But 'Yet, "Howbeit" not as the offence ("trespass") so also is the free gift (or "the gracious gift," the gift of grace)—q. d., The two cases present points of contrast as well as resemblance. For if, &c.—rather, 'For if through the offence of the one the many died (i. e., in that one man's first sin), much more did the grace of God, and the free gift by grace, even that of the one man, Jesus Christ, abound unto the many.' By "the many" is meant the mass of mankind represented respectively by Adam and Christ, as opposed, not to few, but to "the one" who represented them. By "the free gift" is meant (as in v. 17) the glorious gift of justifying righteousness: this is expressly distinguished from "the grace of God," as the effect from the cause; and both are said to "abound" towards us in Christ—in what sense will appear in the next two verses. And the "much more," of the one case than the other, does not mean that we get much more of good by Christ than of evil by Adam (for it is not a case of quantity at all); but that we have much more reason to expect, or it is much more agreeable to our ideas of God, that the many should be benefited by the merit of one, than that they should suffer for the sin of one; and if the latter has happened, much more may we assure ourselves of the former. [PHILIPPI, HODGE.] 16. And not as [it was] by one that sinned, so [is] the gift—q. d., 'Another point of contrast may be mentioned, for the judgment ("sentence") was by one (rather, 'was of one,' meaning not "one man," but, as appears from the next clause, "one offence") to condemnation, but the free gift ('gift of grace') is of many offences unto justification—a glorious point of contrast: q. d., 'The condemnation by Adam was for one sin; but the justification by Christ is an absolution not only from the guilt of that first offence, mysteriously attaching to every individual of the race, but from the countless offences into which, as a germ lodged in the bosom of every child of Adam, it unfolds itself in his life.' This is the meaning of "grace abounding towards us in the abundance of the gift of righteousness." It is a grace not only rich in its character, but rich in detail; it is a "righteousness" not only rich in a complete justification of the guilty, condemned sinner; but rich in the amplitude of the ground which it covers, leaving no one sin of any of the justified uncancelled, but making him, though loaded with the guilt of myriads of offences, "the righteousness of God in Christ" 17. For if by ('the') one man's offence death reigned by one ('through the one'); much more shall they which receive ('the') abundance of grace and of the gift of [justifying] righteousness . . . reign in life by one ('through the one'), Jesus Christ—We have here the two ideas of v. 15 and 16 sublimely combined into one, as if the subject had grown upon the apostle as he advanced in his comparison of the two cases. Here, for the first time in this section, he speaks of that LIFE which springs out of justification, in contrast with the death which springs from sin and follows condemnation. The proper idea of it therefore is, 'Right to live'—Righteous life—life possessed and enjoyed with the good will, and in conformity with the eternal law, of "Him that sitteth on the Throne;" life therefore in its widest sense—life in the whole man and throughout the whole duration of human existence, the life of blissful and loving relationship to God in soul and body, for ever and ever. It is worthy of note too, that while he says death "reigned over" us through Adam, he does not say Life "reigns over us" through Christ; lest he should seem to invest this new life with the very attribute of death—that of fell and malignant tyranny, of which we were the hapless victims. Nor does he say Life reigns in us, which would have been a scriptural enough idea; but, which is much more pregnant, "We shall reign in life." While freedom and might are implied in the figure of "reigning," "life" is represented as the glorious territory or atmosphere of that reign. And by recurring to the idea of v. 16, as to the "many offences," whose complete pardon shows "the abundance of grace and of the gift of righteousness," the whole statement is to this effect: "If one man's one offence let loose against us the tyrant power of Death, to hold us as its victims in helpless bondage" much more, when we stand forth enriched with God's "abounding grace" and in the beauty of a complete absolution from countless offences, shall we expatiate in a life divinely owned and legally secured, "reigning" in exultant freedom and unchallenged might, through that other matchless "One," Jesus Christ! (On the import of the future tense in this last clause, see on v. 19; and on ch. 6. 5.) 18. Therefore—now at length resuming the unfinished comparison of v. 12, in order to give formally the concluding member of it, which had been done once and again substantially, in the intermediate verses, as by the offence of one [judgment came] (or, more simply, 'it came') upon all men to condemnation; even so by the righteousness of one [the free gift came] (rather, 'it came') upon all men to justification of life—[So CALVIN, BENGEL, OLSHAUSEN, THOLUCK, HODGE, PHILIPPI.] But better, as we judge: 'As through one offence [it came] upon all men to condemnation; even so through one righteousness [it came] upon all men to justification of life.' [So BEZA, GROTIUS, FERME, MEYER, DE WETTE, ALFORD, REVISED VERSION.] In this case, the apostle, resuming the statement of v. 12, expresses it in a more concentrated and vivid form—suggested no doubt by the expression in v. 16, "through one offence," representing Christ's whole work, considered as the ground of our justification, as "ONE RIGHTEOUSNESS." (Some would render the peculiar word here employed, 'one righteous act' [ALFORD, REVISED VERSION, &c.] understanding by it Christ's death as the one redeeming act which reversed the one undoing act of Adam. But this is to limit the apostle's idea too much; for as the same word is properly rendered "righteousness" in ch. 8. 4, where it means "the righteousness of the law as fulfilled by us who walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit," so here it denotes Christ's whole "obedience unto death," considered as the one meritorious ground of the reversal of the condemnation which came by Adam. But on this, and on the expression, "all men," see on v. 19. The expression, "justification of life," is a vivid combination of two ideas already expatiated upon, meaning "justification entitling to and insuring in the rightful possession and enjoyment of life." 19. For, &c.—better, "For as by the one man's disobedience the many were made sinners, even so by the obedience of the One shall the many be made righteous." On this great verse observe, first, that by the "obedience" of Christ here is plainly not meant more than what divines call His active obedience, as distinguished from His sufferings and death: it is the entire work of Christ in its obediential character. Our Lord Himself represents even His death as His great act of obedience to the Father: "This commandment (i.e., to lay down and resume His life) have I received of my Father" (John, 10. 18). Second, the significant word twice rendered "made," does not signify to work a change upon a person or thing, but to constitute or ordain, as will be seen from all the places where it is used. Here, accordingly, it is intended to express that judicial act which holds men, in virtue of their connection with Adam, as sinners; and, in connection with Christ, as righteous. Third, the change of sense from the past to the future—"as through Adam we were made sinners, so through Christ we shall be made righteous"—delightfully expresses the enduring character of the act, and of the economy to which such acts belong, in contrast with the for-ever-past ruin of believers in Adam. (See on ch. 6. 5.) Fourth, the "all men" of v. 18, and the "many" of v. 19, are the same party, though under a slightly different aspect. In the latter case, the contrast is between the one representative (Adam—Christ) and the many whom he represented; in the former case, it is between the one head (Adam—Christ) and the human race, affected for death and life respectively by the actings of that one. Only in this latter case, it is the redeemed family of man that is alone in view; it is Humanity as actually lost, but also as actually saved, as ruined and recovered. Such as refuse to fall in with the high purpose of God to constitute His Son a "second Adam," the head of a new race, and as impudent and unbelieving finally perish, have no place in this section of the Epistle, whose sole object is to show how God repairs in the second Adam the evil done by the first. (Thus the doctrine of universal restoration has no place here. Thus too the forced interpretation by which the "justification of all" is made to mean a justification merely in possibility and offer to all, and the "justification of the many" to mean the actual justification of as many as believe [ALFORD, &c.], is completely avoided. And thus the harshness of comparing a whole fallen family with a recovered part is got rid of. However true it be in fact that part of mankind are not saved, this is not the aspect in which the subject is here presented. It is total that are compared and contrasted; and it is the same total in two successive conditions—namely, the human race as ruined in Adam and recovered in Christ.) 20, 21. Moreover the law—"The law however," The Jew might say, if the whole purposes of God towards men centre in Adam and Christ, where does "the law" come in, and what was the use of it? Answer: It entered—But the word expresses an important idea besides 'entering.' It signifies, 'entered incidentally,' or 'parententially.' (In Galatians, 2. 4, the same word is rendered 'came in privately.') The meaning is, that the promulgation of the law at Sinai was no primary or essential feature of the divine plan, but it was "added" (Galatians, 3. 19) for a subordinate purpose—the more fully to reveal the evil occasioned by Adam, and the need and glory of the remedy by Christ, that the offence might abound (or, 'be multiplied'). But what offence? Throughout all this section 'the offence' (four times repeated besides here) has one definite meaning, namely, 'the one first offence of Adam'; and this, in our judgment, is its meaning here also: q.d., "All our multitudinous breaches of the law are nothing but that one first offence, lodged mysteriously in the bosom of every child of Adam as an offending principle, and multiplying itself into myriads of particular offences in the life of each.' What was one act of disobedience in the head has been converted into a vital and virulent principle of disobedience in all the members of the human family, whose every act of wilful rebellion proclaims itself the child of the original transgression. But where sin abounded (or, 'was multiplied') grace did much more abound—rather, 'did exceedingly abound,' or 'superabound.' The comparison here is between the multiplication of one offence into countless transgressions, and such an overflow of grace as more than meets that appalling case. That as sin—Observe, the word "offence" is no more used, as that had been sufficiently illustrated; but—what better befitted this comprehensive summation of the whole matter—the great general term Sin, hath reigned unto death—rather, 'in death, triumphing and (as it were) revelling in that complete destruction of its victims, even so might grace reign—in v. 14, 17, we had the reign of death over the guilty and condemned in Adam: here it is the reign of the mighty causes of these—of SIN which clothes Death a Sovereign with venomous power (1 Corinthians, 15. 56) and with awful authority (ch. 6. 33), and of GRACE, the grace which originated the scheme of salvation, the grace which "sent the Son to be the Saviour of the world," the grace which "made Him to be sin for us who knew no sin," the grace which "makes us to be the righteousness of God in Him;" so that "we who receive the abundance of grace and of the gift of righteousness do reign in life by One, Jesus Christ!" through righteousness—not ours certainly ('the obedience of Christians,' to use the wretched language of Grotius); nor yet exactly 'justification' (STUART, HODGES); but rather, 'the justifying righteousness of Christ' (BEZA, ALFORD, and in substance, OLSHAUSEN, MEYER); the same which in v. 19 is called His "obedience," meaning His whole mediatorial work in the flesh. This is here represented as the righteous medium through which grace reaches its objects and attains all its ends, the stable throne from which Grace as a Sovereign dispenses its saving benefits to as many as are brought under its benign sway, unto eternal life—which is salvation in his highest form and fullest development for ever, by Jesus Christ our Lord—Thus, on that "Name which is above every name" the echoes of this hymn to the glory of "Grace" die away, and "Jesus is left alone."—On reviewing this golden section of our Epistle, the following additional remarks occur: (1.) If this section do not teach that the whole race of Adam, standing in him as their federal head, 'sinned in him and fell with him in his first transgression,' we may despair of any intelligible exposition of it. The apostle, after saying that Adam's sin introduced death into the world, does not say "and so death passed upon all men for that Adam sinned," but "for that all sinned." Thus, according to the teaching of the apostle, 'the death of all is for the sin of all,' and as this cannot mean the personal sins of each individual, but some sin of which unconscious infants are guilty equally with adults, it can mean nothing but the one first transgression of their common head, regarded as the sin of each of his race, and punished, as such, with death. It is vain to start back from this imputation to all of the guilt of Adam's first sin, as wearing the appearance of injustice. For not only are all other is liable to the same objection, in some other—besides being inconsistent with the text—but stipul facts of human nature, which none dispute, which cannot be explained away, involve essentially the same difficulties as the great principle on which the apostle here explains them. If we admit principle, on the authority of our apostle, a flood of light is at once thrown upon certain features of the procedure, and certain portions of the divine law, which otherwise are involved in much darkness; and if the principle itself seem hard to digest, it is easier than the existence of evil, which, as a fact, is of no dispute, but, as a feature in the divine institution, admits of no explanation in the present text.

(2.) What is called original sin—or that deadly tendency to evil with which every child of Adam comes into the world—is not formally treated in this section (and even in ch. 7, it is rather its nature and operations than its connection with the first which is handled). But indirectly, this section is a testimony to it; representing the one original sin, unlike every other, as having an enduring effect in the bosom of every child of Adam, as a pledge of disobedience, whose virulence has gotten its familiar name of "original sin." (3.) In what sense is the word "death" used throughout this section? certainly as mere temporal death, as Arminian commentators affirm. For as Christ came to undo what Adam did, which is all comprehended in the word "death," it would hence follow that Christ has dissolved the sentence by which soul and body parted in death; in other words, merely procured resurrection of the body. But the New Testament nowhere teaches that the salvation of Christ is from anything more comprehensive "death" than that. But her is death here used merely in the sense of penal, &c., "any evil inflicted in punishment of sin and the support of law." [HODGK.] This is too indefinite, making death a mere figure of speech to denote evil in general—an idea foreign to the simplicity of scripture—or at least making death, strictly so called, only one part of the thing meant by it, which he not to be resorted to if a more simple and plain explanation can be found. By "death" then, in this section, we understand the sinner's destruction, in the only sense in which he is capable of it. Even spiritual death is called "destruction" (Deuteronomy, 28; 1 Samuel, 5. 11, &c.), as extinguishing all that is regard as life. But a destruction extending to soul as well as the body, and into the future world, is clearly expressed in Matthew, 7. 15; 2 Thessalonians, 1; 2 Peter, 3. 16, &c. This is the penal "death" of scripture, and in this view of it we retain its proper sense. Life—as a state of enjoyment of the favour of God, of pure fellowship with Him, and voluntary subjection to Him—is a blighted thing from the moment it is found in the creature's skirts: in that sense, threatening, "In the day that thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die," was carried into immediate effect in the case of Adam when he fell; who was thenceforward "dead while he lived." Such are all his posterity from their birth. The separation of soul and body in temporal death carries the sinner's "destruction" a stage further; dissolving his connection with the world out of which he extracted a pleasureable, though unblest, existence, and ushering him into the sense of his Judge—first as a disembodied spirit, ultimately in the body too, in an enduring condition to be punished (and this is the final state) with lasting destruction from the presence of the Lord, "from the glory of His power." This final extinction of soul and body of all that constitutes life, but yet not consciousness of a blighted existence—this, in the simplest and most awful sense, is "DEATH." Not Adam understood all that. It is enough that He understood "the day" of his disobedience to be the terminating period of his blissful "life." In that simple idea was wrapt up all the rest. But that he should comprehend its details was not necessary. Nor is it necessary to suppose all that to be intended in every passage of Scripture where the word occurs. Enough that all we have described is in the bosom of the thing, and will be realised in as many as are not the happy subjects of the Reign of Grace. Beyond doubt, the whole of this is intended in such sublime and comprehensive passages as this: "God . . . save His . . . Son, that whosoever believeth in Him might not perish, but have everlasting life" (John, 3. 16). And should not the untold horrors of that "DEATH"—already "reigning over" all that are not in Christ, and hastening to its consummation—quicken our flight into "the second Adam," that having "received the abundance of grace and of the gift of righteousness, we may reign in LIFE by the One, Jesus Christ?"

CHAPTER VI.

VER. 1-11. THE BEARING OF JUSTIFICATION BY GRACE UPON A HOLY LIFE. 1. What, &c.—The subject of this third division of our Epistle announces itself at once in the opening question, "Shall we (or, as the true reading is, 'May we,' 'Are we to') continue in sin, that grace may abound?" Had the apostle's doctrine been that salvation depends in any degree upon our good works, no such objection to it could have been made. Against the doctrine of a purely gratuitous justification, the objection is plausible; nor has there ever been an age in which it has not been urged. That it was brought against the apostles, we know from ch. 3. 8; and we gather from Galatians, 5. 13; 1 Peter, 2. 16; Jude, 4, that some did give occasion to the charge; but that it was a total perversion of the doctrine of Grace the apostle here proceeds to show. 2. God forbid—That be far from us; the instincts of the new creature revolting at the thought. How shall we, that are dead, &c.—id., and more forcibly, 'We who died to sin (as presently to be explained), how shall we live any longer therein?' 3. Know ye not, that so many of us as were baptized into Jesus Christ (cf. 1 Corinthians, 10. 2) were baptized into His death—sealed with the seal of heaven, and as it were formally entered and articulated, to all the benefits and all the obligations of Christian discipleship in general, and of His death in particular. And since He was "made sin" and "a curse for us" (2 Corinthians, 5. 21; Galatians, 5. 13), "bearing our sins in His own body on the tree," and "rising again for our justification" (ch. 4. 25; 1 Peter, 2. 24), our whole sinful case and condition, thus taken up into His Person, has been brought to an end in His death. Whoso, then, has been baptised into Christ's death has formally surrendered the whole state and life of sin, as in Christ a dead thing. He has sealed himself to be not only "the righteousness of God in Him," but "a new creature;" and as he cannot be in Christ to the one effect and not to the other, for they are one thing, he has bidden farewell, by baptism into Christ's death, to his entire connection with sin. "How," then, "can he live any longer therein?" The two things are as contradictory in the fact as they are in the terms. 4. Therefore we are (rather, 'were,'—it being a past act, completed at once) buried with him, by baptism into death—(The comma we have placed after "him" will show what the sense is. It is not, 'By baptism we are buried with Him into death,' which makes no sense at all; but 'By baptism with Him into death we are buried with Him;' in other words, 'By the same baptism which publicly enters us into His death, we are made partakers of His burial also.' To leave a dead body unburied is represented, alike in heathen authors as in Scripture, as the greatest indignity (Revelation, 11. 8, 9). It was fitting, therefore, that Christ, after "dying for our sins according to the Scriptures," should "descend into the lower parts of the earth" (Ephesians, 4. 9). As this was the last and lowest step of His humiliation, so it was the honourable dissolution of His last link of connection with that life which He laid down for us; and we, in being "buried with Him by our baptism into his death," have by this public act severed our last link of connection with that whole sinful condition and life which Christ brought to an end in His death. That like as Christ was raised from the dead by the glory of the Father—i.e., by such a forth-putting of the Father's power as was the effulgence of His whole glory, even so we also are risen to a new life with Him—should walk in newness of life. But what is that "newness"? Surely if our old life, now dead and buried with Christ, was wholly sinful, the new, to which we rise with the risen Saviour, must be altogether a holy life; so that every time we go back to "those things whereof we are now ashamed" (r. 21), we belie our resurrection with Christ to newness of life, and "forget that we have been purged from our old sins" (2 Peter, 1. 9). Whether the mode of baptism by immersion be alluded to in this verse, as a kind of symbolical burial and resurrection, does not seem to us of much consequence. Many interpreters think it is, and it may be so. But as it is not clear that baptism in apostolic times was exclusively by immersion (see on Acts, 2. 41), so sprinkling and washing are indifferently used in the New Testament to express the cleansing efficacy of the blood of Jesus. And just as the woman with the issue of blood got virtue out of Christ by simply touching Him, so the essence of baptism seems to lie in the simple contact of the element with the body, symbolizing living contact with Christ crucified; the mode and extent of suffusion being indifferent and variable with climate and circumstances.) 5. For if we have been planted together—lit., 'have become formed together.' (The word is used here only.) in the likeness of his death, we shall be also in the likeness of his resurrection—q.d., 'Since Christ's death and resurrection are inseparable in their efficacy, union with Him in the one carries with it participation in the other, for privilege and for duty alike.' The future tense is used of participation in His resurrection, because this is but partially realised in the present state. (See on ch. 5. 19., 6. 7. Knowing this, &c.—The apostle now grows more definite and vivid in expressing the sin-destroying efficacy of our union with the crucified Saviour, that our old man—q.d., 'our old selves'; i.e., 'all that we were in our old unregenerate condition, before union with Christ' cf. Colossians, 3. 9, 10; Ephesians, 4. 22-24; Galatians, 2. 20; 6. 24; 6. 14). is (rather, 'was') crucified with him, (in order) that the body of sin—not a figure for 'the mass of sin'; nor the 'material body,' considered as the seat of sin, which it is not; but as we judge: for 'sin as it dwells in us in our present embodied state, under the law of the fall,' might be destroyed (in Christ's death), to the end; that henceforth we should not serve or 'be in bondage to,' sin. For he that is dead (rather, 'hath died') is freed ('hath been set free') from sin—lit., 'justified,' 'acquitted,' 'got his discharge, from sin.' As death dissolves all claims, so the whole claim of sin, not only to "reign unto death," but to keep its victims in sinful bondage, have been discharged once for all, by the believer's penal death in the death of Christ: so that he is no longer a "debtor to the flesh to live after the flesh" (ch. 8. 12). 6. Now if we be dead ('if we died') with Christ, &c.—See on r. 5. 9-11. Christ being raised from the dead dieth no more: death hath no more dominion over him—Though Christ's death was in the most absolute sense a voluntary act (James, 10. 17, 18; Acts, 2. 24), that voluntary surrender gave death such rightful "dominion over Him" as dissolved its dominion over us. But this once past, "death hath," even in that sense, "dominion over Him no more." For in that he died, he died unto (i.e., in obedience to the claims of) death and (for all); but in that he liveth, he liveth unto (in obedience to the claims of) God—There never, indeed, was a time when Christ did not "live unto God." But in the days of His flesh he did so, under the continual burden of sin "laid on Him" (Isaiah, 53. 6; 2 Corinthians, 5. 21); whereas, now that He has "put away sin by the sacrifice of Himself," He "liveth unto God," the acquitted and accepted Saviour, unchallenged and undebted by the claims of sin. Likewise (even as your Lord Himself) reckon ye yourselves to be dead indeed ('dead on the one hand') unto sin, but alive unto God through Jesus Christ—(The words, "our Lord," at the close of this verse, are wanting in the best MSS.)—Note (1.) 'Antinomianism is not only an error; it is a falsehood and a slander.' (HODGK.) That "we should continue in sin that grace may abound," not only is never the deliberate sentiment of any real believer in the doctrine of Grace, but is abhorrent to every Christian mind, as a monstrous abuse of the most glorious of all truths (v. 1). (2.) As the death of Christ is not only the expiation of guilt, but the death of sin itself in all who are vitally united to Him; so the resurrection of Christ is the resurrection of believers, not only to acceptance with God, but to newness of life (v. 3-11). (3.) In the light of these two truths, let all who name the name of Christ "examine themselves whether they be in the faith."

Ver. 12-23. WHAT PRACTICAL USE BELIEVERS SHOULD MAKE OF THEIR DEATH TO SIN AND LIFE TO GOD THROUGH UNION TO THE CRUCIFIED SAVIOUR. Not content with showing that his doctrine has no tendency to relax the obligations to a holy life, the apostle here proceeds to enforce those obligations. 12. Let not sin therefore as a Master; reign—(The reader will observe that wherever in this section the words "Sin," "Obedience," "Righteousness," "Uncleaness," "Iniquity," are figuratively used, to represent a Master, they are here printed in capitals, to make this manifest to the eye, and so save explanation.) In your mortal body, that ye should obey it (sin in the lusts thereof—'the lusts of the body,' as the Greek makes evident. (The other reading, perhaps the true one, 'that ye should obey the lusts thereof,' comes to the same thing.) The "body" is here viewed as the instrument by which all the sins of the heart become facts of the outward life, and as itself the seat of the lower appetites; and it is called "our mortal body," probably to remind us how unsuitable is this reign of sin in those who are "alive from the dead." But the reign here meant is the unchecked dominion of sin within us. Its outward acts are next referred to. 13. Neither yield ye your members instruments of unrighteousness unto sin: but yield yourselves (this is the great surrender unto God as those that are alive from the dead, and (as the fruit of this) your members (till now prostituted to sin) instruments of righteousness unto God—But what if indwelling sin should prove too strong for us? The reply is: But it will not. 14. For sin shall not have dominion over you as the slaves of a tyrant lord: for ye are not under the law, but under grace—The force of this glorious assurance can only be felt by observing the grounds on which it rests. To be "under the law" is, first, to be under its claim to entire obedience; and so, next, under its curse for the breach of these. And as all power to obey can reach the sinner only through Grace, of which the law knows nothing, it follows that to be "under the law" is, finally, to be shut up under an inability to keep it, and consequently to be the helpless slave of sin. On the other hand, to be "under grace," is to be under the glorious canopy and saving effects of that "grace which reigns through righteousness unto eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord" (see on ch. 5. 20, 21). The curse of the law has been completely lifted from off them; they are made "the righteousness of God in Him," and they are "alive unto God through Jesus Christ." So that, as when they were "under the law," Sin could not but have dominion over them, so now that they are "under grace," Sin cannot but be subdued under them. If before, Sin resistlessly triumphed, Grace will now be more than conqueror. 15, 16. What then . . . Know ye not it is a dictate of common sense, that to whom ye yield yourselves servants to obey (with the view of obeying him), his servants ye are to whom ye obey (to whom ye yield that obedience); whether of Sin unto death—i.e., 'issuing in death,' in the awful sense of ch. 8, 6, as the sinner's final condition, or of Obedience unto righteousness—i.e., obedience resulting in a righteous character, as the enduring condition of the servant of new Obedience (1 John, 2, 17; John, 8, 34; 2 Peter, 2, 19; Matthew, 6, 24). 17. But God be thanked, that ye were the servants of Sin—i.e., that this is a state of things now past and gone, but ye have obeyed from the heart that form of doctrine which was delivered you—rather (Margyn), 'whereunto ye were delivered,' or cast, as in a mould. The idea is, that the teaching to which they had heartily yielded themselves had stamped its own impress upon them. 18. Being then—'And being': it is the continuation and conclusion of the preceding sentence; not a new one. made free from Sin, ye became the servants of ('servants to') Righteousness. The case is one of emancipation from entire servitude to one Master to entire servitude to another, whose property we are (see on ch. 1, 1). There is no middle state of personal independence; for which we were never made, and to which we have no claim. When we would not that God should reign over us, we were in righteous judgment "sold under Sin"; now being through grace "made free from Sin," it is only to become "servants to Righteousness," which is our true freedom. 19. I speak after the manner of men (descending, for illustration, to the level of common affairs) because of the infirmity of your flesh (the weakness of your spiritual apprehension): for as ye have yielded—"as ye yielded, the thing being viewed as now past, your members servants to Uncleaness and to Iniquity unto (the practice of) iniquity; even so now yield your members servants to Righteousness unto holiness—rather, 'unto (the attainment of) sanctification,' as the same word is rendered in 2 Thessalonians, 2, 13; 1 Corinthians, 1, 30; 1 Peter, 1, 2:—q.d., 'Looking back upon the heartiness with which ye served Sin, and the lengths ye went to be stimulated now to like zeal and like exuberance in the service of a better Master.' 20. For when ye were the servants ('were servants') of Sin, ye were free from (rather, 'in respect of') Righteousness—Difficulties have been made about this clause where some exist. The import of it appears clearly to be this:—"Since no servant can serve 'two masters,' much less where their interests come into deadly collision, and each demands the whole man, so, while ye were in the service of Sin, ye were in no proper sense the servants of Righteousness, and never did it one act of real service; whatever might be your conviction of the claims of Righteousness, your real services were all and always given to Sin: Thus had ye full proof of the nature and advantages of Sin's service.' The searching question with which this is followed up, shows that this is the meaning. 21. What fruit had ye then [in those things] whereof ye are now ashamed? In the end of those things is death—What permanent advantage, and what abiding satisfaction, have those things yielded? The apostle answers his own question:—"Abiding satisfaction, did I ask? They have left only a sense of "shame." Permanent advantage? "The end of them is death." By saying they were "now ashamed," he makes it plain that he is not referring to that disgust at themselves, and remorse of conscience by which those who are the most helplessly "sold under sin" are often stung to the quick; but that ingenuous feeling of self-reproach, which pierces and weighs down the children of God, as they think of the dishonour which their past life did to His name, the ingratitude it displayed, the violence it did to their own conscience, its deadening and degrading effects, and the death—"the second death"—to which it was dragging them down, when mere Grace arrested them. (On the sense of "death" here, see on ch. 5, 12-21, note 3, and on v. 16; see also Revelation, 21, 5.—The change proposed in the pointing of this verse: 'What fruit had ye then? things whereof ye are now ashamed' [LUTHER, THOLUCK, DE WETTE, PHILIPPI, ALFORD, &c.], seems unnatural and uncalled for. The ordinary pointing has at least powerful support. [CHRYSTOM, CALVIN, BEZA, GROTIUS, BENGEL, STUART, FRIESCHE.] 22. But now—as if to get away from such a subject were unspeakable relief—being made free from Sin, and become servants to God (in the absolute sense intended throughout all this passage), ye have (not 'ought to have,' but 'do have,' in point of fact) your fruit unto holiness—'sanctification,' as in v. 19; meaning that permanently holy state and character which is built up out of the whole "fruits of righteousness," which believers successively bring forth. They "have their fruit" unto this, i.e., all going towards this blessed result, and the end everlasting life—as the final state of the justified believer; the beatific experience not only of complete exemption from the fall with all its effects, but of the perfect life of acceptance with God, and conformity to His likeness, of unveiled access to Him, and ineffable fellowship with Him through all duration. 23. For the wages of sin is death; but the gift of God is eternal life through ('in') Jesus Christ our Lord—This concluding verse—as pointed as it is brief—contains the marrow, the most fine gold, of the Gospel. As the labourer is worthy of his hire, and feels it to be his due—his own of right—so is death the due of sin, the wages the sinner has well wrought for, his own. But "eternal life" is in no sense or degree the wages of our righteousness; we do nothing whatever to earn or become entitled to it, and never can: it is therefore, in the most absolute sense, "THE GIFT OF GOD." Grace reigns in the bestowal of it in every case, and that "in Jesus Christ our Lord," as the righteous Channel of it. In view of this, who that hath tasted that the Lord is gracious can refrain from saying, "Unto Him that loved us, and washed us from our sins in His own blood, and hath made us kings and priests unto God and His Father, to Him be glory and dominion for ever and ever. Amen" (Revelation, 1, 5, 6.)—Note (1.) As the most effectual refutation of the oft-repeated calumny, that the doctrine of Salvation by grace encourages to continue in sin, is the holy life of those who profess it, let such ever feel that the highest service they can render to that Grace which is all their hope, is to "yield themselves unto God, as those that are alive from the dead, and their members instruments of righteousness unto God" (v. 12, 13). By so doing they will "put to silence the ignorance of foolish men," secure their own peace, carry out the end of their calling, and give substantial glory to Him that loved them. (2.) The fundamental principle of Gospel-obedience is as original as it is divinely rational: that 'we are set free from the law in order to keep it, and are brought graciously under servitude to the law in order to be free' (v. 14, 15, 18). So long as we know no principle of obedience but the terrors of the law, which condemns all the breakers of it, and knows nothing whatever of grace, either to pardon the guilty, or to purify the stained, we are shut up under a moral impossibility of genuine and acceptable obedience: whereas when Grace lifts us out of this state, and through union a righteous Surety, brings us into a state of conscious reconciliation and loving surrender of heart to a God of salvation, we immediately feel the glorious liberty to be holy, and the assurance that "sin shall not have dominion over us" in as sweet to our renewed tastes and aspirations as the ground of it is felt to be firm. "because we are not under the Law, but under Grace."

(2.) As this most momentous of all transitions in the history of a man is wholly of God's free grace, the change should never be thought, spoken, or written of, but with lively thanksgiving to Him who so loved us (v. 17). (4.) Christians, in the service of God, should emulate their former selves in the zeal and steadiness with which they served sin, and the length to which they went in it (v. 19). (5.) To stimulate this holy rivalry, let us often "look back to the rock whence we were hewn, the hole of the pit whence we were digged," in search of the enduring advantages and permanent satisfactions which the service of Him yielded; and when we find to our "shame" only gall and wormwood, let us follow a godless life to its proper "end," until, finding ourselves in the territories of "death," we are fain to hasten back to survey the service of Righteousness, that new Master of all believers, and find Him leading us sweetly into abiding "holiness," and landing us at length in "everlasting life" (v. 20-22). (6.) Death and life are before all men who hear the Gospel: the one, the natural issue and proper reward of sin; the other, the absolutely free "GIFT OF GOD" to sinners, "in Jesus Christ our Lord." And as the one is the conscious sense of the hopeless loss of all blissful existence, so the other is the conscious possession and enjoyment of all that constitutes a rational creature's highest "life" for evermore (v. 23). Ye that read or hear these words, "I call heaven and earth to record this day against you, that I have set before you life and death, blessing and cursing, therefore choose life, that both thou and thy seed may live;" (Deuteronomy, 30. 19.)

CHAPTER VII.

Ver. 1-25. SAME SUBJECT CONTINUED. 1-6. Relation of believers to the Law and to Christ. Recurring to the statement of ch. 6. 14, that believers are "not under the law but under grace," the apostle here shows how this change is brought about, and what holy consequences follow from it. 1. I speak to them that know the law (of Moses)—to whom, though not themselves Jews (see on ch. 1. 13), the Old Testament was familiar. 2, 3. if her husband be dead ('die'.—So v. 3. she be married.—'joined.' So v. 4. 4. Wherefore . . . ye also are become dead (rather, 'were slain') to the law by the body of Christ—through His slain body. The apostle here departs from his usual word "died," using the more expressive phrase 'were slain,' to make it clear that he meant their being "crucified with Christ" (as expressed in ch. 6. 3-6, and Galatians, 2. 20), that ye should be married to another, even to him that is ('was') raised from the dead, (to the intent) that we should bring forth fruit unto God—It has been thought that the apostle should here have said that 'the law died to us,' not 'we to the law,' but that he purposely inverted the figure, to avoid the harshness to Jewish ears of the death of the law. (CHRYSOSTOM, CALVIN, HODGE, PHILIPPI, &c.) But this is to mistake the apostle's design in employing this figure, which was merely to illustrate the general principle that 'death dissolves legal obligation.' It was essential to his argument that we, not the law, should be the dying party, since it is we that are "crucified with Christ," and not the law. This death dissolves our marriage obligation to the law, leaving us at liberty to contract a new relation—to be joined to the Risen One, in order to spiritual fruitfulness, to the glory of God. (BEZA, OLSHAUSEN, MEYER, ALFORD, &c.) The confusion, then, is in the expositors, not the text; and it has arisen from not observing that, like Jesus Himself, believers are here viewed as having a double life—the old sin-condemned life, which they lay down with Christ, and the new life of acceptance and holiness to which they rise with their Surety and Head; and all the issues of this new life, in Christian obedience, are regarded as the "fruit" of this blessed union to the Risen One. How such holy fruitfulness was impossible before our union to Christ is next declared. 8. Far from us were in the flesh—in our unregenerate state, as we came into the world. See on John, 3. 6; and ch. 8. 5-8. the notions—'passions' (παρῳσῖς), 'affections' (as in Galatians, 5. 24), or 'stirrings' (κινήσεις ψυχῶν) of sin—i.e., 'prompting to the commission of sin,' which were by the law—by occasion of the law, which fretted, irritated our inward corruption by its prohibitions. See on v. 7-9. did work in our members—the members of the body, as the instruments by which these inward stirrings find vent in action, and become facts of the life. See on ch. 6. 6, to bring forth fruit unto death—death in the sense of ch. 6. 21. Thus holiness is all holy fruit before union to Christ. 8. But new—See on the same expression in ch. 6. 22, and cf. James, 1. 16. we are delivered from the law—The word is the same which, in ch. 6. 6, and elsewhere, is rendered "destroyed," and is but another way of saying (as in v. 4) that "we were slain to the law by the body of Christ," language which, though harsh to the ear, is designed and fitted to impress upon the reader the violence of that death of the Cross, by which, as by a deadly wrench, we are "delivered from the law," that being dead wherein we were held—it is now universally agreed that the true reading here is, 'being dead to that wherein we were held.' The received reading has no authority whatever, and is inconsistent with the strain of the argument; for the death spoken of, as we have seen, is not the law's, but our's, through union with the crucified Saviour, that we should ('so as to, or 'so that we') serve in newness of spirit ('in the newness of the spirit'), and not in the oldness of the letter—not in our old way of literal, mechanical obedience to the divine law, as a set of external rules of conduct, and without any reference to the state of our hearts; but in that new way of spiritual obedience which, through union to the risen Saviour, we have learned to render (cf. ch. 2. 29; 2 Corinthians, 3. 6). 7-25. False Inferences regarding the Law repelled. And first, v. 7-13. In the case of the UNREGENERATE. 7, 8. What . . . then? Is the law sin? God forbid!—q.d., 'I have said that when we were in the flesh the law stirred our inward corruption, and was thus the occasion of deadly fruit: Is then the law to blame for this? Far from us be such a thought.' Nay—On the contrary' (as in ch. 8. 37; 1 Corinthians, 12. 22; Greek. I had not known sin but by the law—it is important to fix what is meant by "sin" here. It certainly is not 'the general nature of sin' (ALFORD, &c.), though it is true that this is learned from the law; for such a sense will not suit what is said of it in the following verses, where the meaning is the same as here. The only meaning which suits all that is said of it in this place is 'the principle of sin in the heart of fallen man.' The sense, then, is this: 'It was by means of the law that I came to know what a virulence and strength of sinful propensity I had within me.' The existence of this it did not need the law to reveal to him; for even the heathens recognised and wrote of it. But the dreadful nature and desperate power of it the law alone discovered—in the way now to be described, for I had not known lust, except, &c.—Here the same Greek word is unfortunately rendered by three different English ones—"lust," "covet," "concupiscence"—which obscures the meaning. By using the word "lust" only, in the wide sense of all 'irregular desire,' or every out-going of the heart towards anything forbidden, the sense will best be t; thus, 'For I had not known lust, except d said, Thou shalt not lust: But sin, taking (ken)' occasion by the commandment (that forbids it) wrought in me all manner of This gives a deeper view of the tenth command than the mere words suggest. The apostle prohibition not only of desire after ceres there specified, but of 'desire after every forbidden;' in other words, all 'lustful' or desire.' It was this which "he had not by the law." The law forbidding all such stirred his corruption that it wrought in him of 'lustful'—desire of every sort after forbidden. For without the law—i.e., Before demands and prohibitions come to on our corrupt nature, sin was (rather, 'is') the sinful principle of our nature lies so to torpid, that its virulence and power are and to our feeling it is as good as "dead," as alive without the law once—q.d., "In the ignorance, when, in this sense, a stranger, I deemed myself a righteous man, and as led to life at the hand of God." but when judgment came—forbidding all irregular desire; as sees in this the spirit of the whole law.—"came to life"; in its malignity and strength tedly revealed itself, as if sprung from the "I died"—saw myself, in the eye of a law and not to be kept, a dead man.' 10, 11. the commandment, which was... (designed) to through the keeping of it) I found to be unto breaking it). For sin (my sinful nature), asion by the commandment, deceived me (or me)—drew me aside into the very thing commandment forbade. and by it slew me—me to myself to be a condemned and gone s, 9, "I died". 13, 14. Wherefore ('So that') 'is indeed' good, and the commandment (that been referred to, which forbids all lustful just, and good. Was then that which is good sh then that which is good become) death God forbid—q.d., 'Does the blame of my with the good law! Away with such a But sin (because death unto me, to the end) ight appear sin that it might be seen in its s, working death in (rather, 'to') me by that god, that sin by the commandment might be- being sinful—'that its enormous turpitude nd out to view, through its turning God's and good law into a provocative to the very ch it forbids.' So much for the law in rela- s unregenerate, of whom the apostle takes s the example: first, in his ignorant, self- ondition; next, under humbling discoveries bility to keep the law, through inward con- it; finally, as self-condemned, and already, dead man. Some inquire to what period of led history these circumstances relate. But reason to think they were wrought into such and explicit discovery at any period of his fore he "met the Lord in the way," and amidst the multitude of his thoughts within ing his memorable three days' blindness uly after that, such views of the law and of ould doubtless be tossed up and down till shape much as they are here described (see s 9); we regard this whole description of his oubles and progress rather as the finished ll his past recollections and subsequent re- his unregenerate state, which he throws ical form only for greater vividness. But ostle proceeds to repel false inferences he law, secondly, v. 14-25. In the case of the ATK; taking himself here also as the example, know that the law is spiritual—in its demands, but I am carnal—fleshy; see on v. 5, and as such, incapable of yielding spiritual obedience, sold under sin—enslaved to it. The "I" here though of course not the regenerate, is neither the unregenerate, but the sinful principle of the renewed man, as is expressly stated in v. 18, 15, 16. For, &c.—better, 'For that which I do I know not; q.d., 'In obeying the impulses of my carnal nature I act the slave of another will than my own as a renewed man.' for, &c.—rather, 'for not what I would ('wish,' 'desire') that do I, but what I hate that I do. But if what I would not that I do, I consent unto the law that it is good—the judgment of my inner man going along with the law.' 17. Now then it is no more I (my renewed self) that do it ('that work it') but sin which dwelleth in me—that principle of sin that still has its abode in me. To explain this and the following statements, as many do (even BEXON and TROTLOCK), of the sins of unrenewed men against their better convictions, is to do painful violence to the apostle's language, and to affirm of the unregenerate what is untrue. That co-existence and mutual hostility of "flesh" and "spirit" in the same renewed man, which is so clearly taught in ch. 8, 4, &c., and Galatians, 5, 16, &c., is the true and only key to the language of this and the following verses. (It is hardly necessary to say that the apostle means not to disown the blame of yielding to his corruptions, by saying "it is not he that does it, but sin that dwelleth in him." Early heretics thus abused his language; but the whole strain of the passage shows that his sole object in thus expressing himself was to bring more vividly before his readers the conflict of two opposite principles, and how entirely, as a new man—honouring from his inmost soul the law of God—he condemned and renounced his corrupt nature, with its affections and lusts, its stirrings and its outgoings, root and branch.) 18. For, &c.—better, 'For I know that there dwelleth not in me, that is in my flesh, any good, for to will ('desire') is present with me; but to perform that which is good (the supplement "how," in our version, weakens the statement) I find not—Here, again, we have the double self of the renewed man; q.d., 'In me dwelleth no good; but this corrupt self is not my true self; it is but sin dwelling in my real self, as a renewed man.' 19-21. For, &c.—The conflict here graphically described between a self that 'desires' to do good and a self that in spite of this does evil, cannot be the struggles between conscience and passion in the unregenerate, because the description given of this "desire to do good" in the verse immediately following, is such as cannot be ascribed, with the least show of truth, to any but the renewed. 22. For I delight in the law of God after the inward man—q.d., 'from the bottom of my heart.' The word here rendered "delight" is indeed stronger than "consent" in v. 18; but both express a state of the mind and heart to which the unregenerate man is a stranger. 23. But I see another (it should be 'a different') law in my members (see on v. 8, warring against the law of my mind, and bringing me into captivity to the law of sin which is in my members)—In this important verse, observe, first, that the word "law" means an inward principle of action, good or evil, operating with the fixedness and regularity of a law. The apostle found two such laws within him; the one "the law of sin in his members," called (in Galatians, 5, 17, 24) "the flesh which lusteth against the spirit," "the flesh with the affections and lusts," i.e., the sinful principle in the regenerate; the other, "the law of the mind," or the holy principle of the renewed nature. Second, when the apostle says he "sees" the one of these principles "warring against" the other, and "bringing him into captivity" to itself, he is not referring to any actual rebellion going on within him while he was writing, or to any captivity to his own lusts then existing. He is simply describing the two conflicting principles, and pointing out what it was the inherent property of each to aim at bringing about. Third, When the apostle describes himself as "brought into captivity" by the triumph of the sinful principle of his nature, he clearly speaks in the person of a renewed man. Men do not feel themselves to be in captivity in the territories of their own sovereign, and associated with their own friends, breathing a congenial atmosphere, and acting quite spontaneously. But here the apostle describes himself, when drawn under the power of his sinful nature, as forcibly seized and reluctantly dragged to his enemy's camp, from which he would gladly make his escape. This ought to settle the question, whether he is here speaking as a regenerate man or the reverse. 24. O wretched man that I am! who shall deliver me from the body of this death?—The apostle speaks of the "body" here with reference to "the law of sin" which he had said was "in his members," but merely as the instrument by which the sin of the heart finds vent in action, and as itself the seat of the lower appetites (see on ch. 6, 4, and on v. 5); and he calls it "the body of this death," as feeling, at the moment when he wrote, the horrors of that death (ch. 6, 21, and v. 6) into which it dragged him down. But the language is not that of a sinner newly awakened to the sight of his lost state: it is the cry of a living but agonised believer, weighed down under a burden which is not himself, but which he longs to shake off from his renewed self. Nor does the question imply ignorance of the way of relief at the time referred to. It was designed only to prepare the way for that outburst of thankfulness for the divinely provided remedy, which immediately follows. 25. I thank God (the Source); through Jesus Christ; (the Channel of deliverance). So then (to sum up the whole matter), with the mind ("the mind indeed") I myself serve the law of God, but with the flesh the law of sin—q. d., "Such then is the unchanging character of these two principles within me. God's holy law is dear to my renewed mind, and has the willing service of my new man; although that corrupt nature which still remains in me listens to the dictates of sin."—Note (1.) This whole chapter was of essential service to the Reformers in their contentings with the Church of Rome. When the divines of that corrupt Church, in a Pelagian spirit, denied that the sinful principle in our fallen nature, which they called "Concupiscence," and which is commonly called "Original Sin," had the nature of sin at all, they were triumphantly answered from this chapter, where—both in the first section of it which speaks of it in the unregenerate, and in the second which treats of its presence and actions in believers—it is explicitly, emphatically, and repeatedly called "sin." As such, they held it to be damnable. (See the Confessions both of the Lutheran and Reformed Churches.) In the following century, the orthodox in Holland had the same controversy to wage with 'the Remonstrants' (the followers of Arminius), and they waged it on the field of this chapter. (2.) Here we see that Inability is consistent with Accountability. See v. 18; Galatians, 6, 17. 'As the Scriptures constantly recognise the truth of these two things, so are they constantly united in Christian experience. Every one feels that he cannot do the things that he would, yet is sensible that he is guilty for not doing them. Let any man test his power by the requisition to love God perfectly at all times. Alas! how entire our inability! Yet how deep our self-loathing and self-condemnation! [HODGE.] (3.) If the first sight of the Cross by the eye of faith kindles feelings never to be forgotten, and in one sense never to be repeated—like the first view of an enchanting landscape—the experimental discovery, in the later stages of the Christian life, of its power to beat down and mortify inveterate corruption, to cleanse and heal from long-continued backslidings and frightful inconsistencies, and so to triumph over all that threatens to destroy those for whom Christ died, as to bring them safe over the tempestuous sea of this life into the haven of eternal rest—is attended with yet more heart-affecting wonder, draws forth deeper thankfulness, and issues in more exalted adoration of Him whose work Salvation is from first to last (v. 24, 25). (4.) It is sad when such topics as these are handled as mere questions of biblical interpretation, or systematic theology. Our great apostle could not treat of them apart from personal experience, of which the facts of his own life and the feelings of his own soul furnished him with illustrations as lively as they were apposite. When one is unable to go far into the investigation of indwelling sin, without breaking out into an "O wretched man that I am!" and cannot enter on the way of relief without exclaiming, "I thank God through Jesus Christ our Lord," he will find his meditations rich in fruit to his own soul, and may expect, through Him who presides in all such matters, to kindle in his readers or hearers the like blessed emotions (v. 24, 25). So be it even now, O Lord!

CHAPTER VIII.

VER. 1-36. CONCLUSION OF THE WHOLE ARGUMENT.—THE GLORIOUS COMPLEMENTS OF THEM THAT ARE IN CHRIST JESUS. In this surprising chapter the several streams of the preceding argument meet and flow in one "river of the water of life, clear as crystal, proceeding out of the throne of God and of the Lamb," until it seems to lose itself in the ocean of a blissful eternity.

FIRST: The Sanctification of Believers (v. 1-13). 1. There is therefore now, &c.—referring to the immediately preceding context. [OLSHAUSEN, PHILIPPI, MEYER, ALFORD, &c.] The subject with which ch. 7. concludes is still under consideration. The scope of the four opening verses is to show how "the law of sin and death" is deprived of its power to bring believers again into bondage, and how the holy law of God receives in them the homage of a living obedience. [CALVIN, FRANKS, PHILIPPI, MEYER, ALFORD, &c.] no condemnation to them which are in Christ Jesus—As Christ, who "knew no sin," was, to all legal effects, "made sin for us," so are we, who believe in Him to all legal effects, "made the righteousness of God in Him" (2 Corinthians, 5, 21); and thus, one with Him in the divine reckoning, there is to such "NO CONDEMNATION." (Cf. John, 3, 18; 5, 24; ch. 5, 18, 19.) But this is no mere legal arrangement: It is a union in life; believers, through the indwelling of Christ's Spirit in them, having one life with Him, as truly as the head and the members of the same body have one life. [who walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit]—(The evidence of MSS. seems to show that this clause formed no part of the original text of this verse, but that the first part of it was early introduced, and the second later, from v. 4, probably as an explanatory comment, and to make the transition to v. 3 more easy. 2. For the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus hath made me free (rather, "freed me"—referring to the time of his conversion, when first he believed) from the law of sin and death—it is the Holy Ghost who is here called "The Spirit of life," as opening up in the souls of believers a fountain of spiritual life (see on John, 7, 38, 39; p. 757, 3d col.); just as He is called "the Spirit of truth," as "guiding them into all truth" (John, 16, 13), and "the Spirit of counsel and might, the Spirit of knowledge and of the fear of the Lord" (Isaiah, 11, 2), as the Inspirer of these qualities. And He is called "the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus," because this is as members of Christ that He takes up His abode in believers, who in consequence of this have one life with their Head. And as the word "law" here has the same meaning as in ch. 7, 23, namely, "an inward principle of action, operating with the fixed-regularity of a law, it thus appears that "the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus" here means, principle of action which the Spirit of Christ set up within us—the law of our new being, "us free," as soon as it takes possession of man, "from the law of sin and death," i. e., enslaving power of that corrupt principle dies death in its bosom. The "strong man overpowered by the 'Stronger than he'; the principle is dethroned and expelled by the Spirit; the principle of spiritual life prevails and brings into captivity the principle of spirit—"leading captivity captive." If this be the meaning, the whole verse is to this effect: triumph of believers over their inward strength through the power of Christ's Spirit in them, and to be in Christ Jesus, and as such absolved emanation. But this is now explained more fully. For what the law could not do, &c.—a difficult controverted verse. But it is clearly, the law's inability to free us from the dominion of sin: the apostle has in view; as has partly already (see on v. 3), and will more fully presently. The law could irritate our sinful or more virulent action, as we have seen in it; it could not secure its own fulfillment. Its accomplishment comes now to be shown, was weak through the flesh—i. e., having to do with us through a corrupt nature, too weak to be influenced by mere commands and threats, &c.—The sentence is somewhat imperfectly stated, which occasions a certain obscurity, but is, that whereas the law was powerless to secure its own fulfillment for the reason given, God's method now to be described for attaining the end ('having sent') His own Son—This expression plainly imply that Christ was 'His Son' before He was sent—that is, in His Person, and independently of His mission to the flesh (see on ch. 8. 32; Galatians, 4. 6). He not only has the very nature of God, son of His father, but is essentially or co-eternal with the Father, and is the source of our life, and in a sense too mysterious for any of ours properly to define (see on ch. 1-4). This peculiar relationship is put forward here to show our greatness and define the nature of the relief we are coming from beyond the precincts of sinful flesh, yea, immediately from the God; in the likeness of sinful flesh—lit., 'of the flesh'; a very remarkable and pregnant expression made in the reality of our flesh, but in the likeness of its sinful condition. He took on Him as it is in us, compassed with infirmities, and distinguished Him as man from sinful that He was without sin. Nor does this mean He took our nature with all its properties for sin is no property of Humanity at all, but the disordered state of our souls, as the fallen Adam, a disorder affecting, indeed, and over our entire nature, but still purely our own.—lit., 'and about sin' q. d., 'on the business' His expression is purposely a general one, but design was not to speak of Christ's mission for sin, but in virtue of that atonement to dominion and extirpate it altogether from us.

We think it wrong, therefore, to render (as in Margin) 'by a sacrifice for sin' (such language of the LXX., and approved by C.); for this sense is too definite, and makes of expiation more prominent than it is, sin—'condemned it to lose its power over us,' BENGE, FRASER, MEYER, THOLUCK, ALFORD. In this glorious sense our Lord is approaching death (John. 12. 31), "Now is the prince of this world: now shall the prince of this

"When He (the Spirit) shall come, He shall convince the world of . . . judgment, because the prince of this world is judged," i. e., condemned to let go his hold of men, who, through the cross, shall be emancipated into the liberty and power to be holy, in the flesh—i. e., in human nature, henceforth set free from the grasp of sin. That the righteousness of the law—the righteous demand [REVISED VERSION], 'the requirement' [ALFORD], or 'the precept' of the law; for it is not precisely the word so often used in this Epistle to denote 'the righteousness which justifies' (ch. 1. 17; 3. 21; 4. 5, 6; 5. 17, 18, 21), but another form of the same word, intended to express the enactment of the law, meaning here, we believe, the practical obedience which the law calls for, might be fulfilled in us—or, as we say, 'realized in us,' who walk—the most ancient expression of the best of one's life, whether in the direction of good or of evil (Genesis, 48. 15; Psalm 1. 1; Isaiah, 2. 5; Micah, 4. 5; Ephesians, 4. 17; 1 John, 1. 6, 7), not after (i. e., according to the dictates of the flesh, but after the spirit—From v. 9, it would seem that what is more immediately intended by "the spirit" here is our own mind, as renewed and actuated by the Holy Ghost. 6. For they that are after the flesh (i. e., under the influence of the fleshly principle) do mind (give their attention to, Philippians, 3. 19) the things of the flesh, &c.—Men must be under the predominating influence of one or other of these two principles, and, according as the one or the other has the mastery, will be the complexion of their life, the character of their actions. 6. For—a mere particle of transition here [THOLUCK], like 'but' or 'now,' to be carnally minded—lit., 'the mind' or 'minding of the flesh' (Margin), i. e., the pursuit of fleshly ends, is death—not only 'ends in' [ALFORD, &c.], but even now 'is,' carrying death into its bosom, so that such are 'dead while they live' (1 Timothy, 5. 6; Ephesians, 2. 1, 5). [PHILIPPI.] but to be spiritually minded—'the mind' or 'minding of the spirit'; i. e., the pursuit of spiritual objects, is life and peace—not "life" only, in contrast with the "death" that is in the other pursuit, but "peace" it is the very element of the soul's deepest repose and true bliss. 7. Because the carnal mind is enmity against God. The desire and pursuit of carnal ends is a state of enmity to God, wholly incompatible with true life, and peace in the soul, for it is not subject ("doth not submit itself") to the law of God, neither indeed can be ("can it")—i. e., In such a state of mind there neither is nor can be the least subjection to the law of God. Many things may be done which the law requires, but nothing either is or can be done because God's law requires it, or purely to please God. 8. So then—nearly equivalent to "And so," they that are in (and therefore, under the government of) the flesh cannot please God—having no obediential principle, no desire to please Him. 9. But ye are not in the flesh, but in the spirit, if so be that the Spirit of God dwell in you.—This does not mean, 'if the disposition or mind of God dwell in you; but if the Holy Ghost dwell in you' (see 1 Corinthians, 6. 11, 19; 3. 16, &c.). (It thus appears that to be "in the spirit" means here to be under the dominion of our own renewed mind; because the indwelling of God's Spirit is given as the evidence that we are "in the spirit.") Now ("But") if any man have not the Spirit of Christ—Again, this does not mean 'the disposition or mind of Christ,' but the Holy Ghost; here called "the Spirit of Christ" just as He is called "the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus" (see on v. 2). It is as "the Spirit of Christ" that the Holy Ghost takes possession of believers, introducing into them all the gracious dove-like disposition which dwelt in Him (Matthew, 3. 16; John, 3. 34). Now if any man's heart be void, not of such dispositions, but of the blessed Author of them, "the Spirit of Christ"—he is none of his—even though intellectually convinced of the truth of Christianity, and in a general sense influenced by its spirit. Sharp, solemn statement this! 10, 11. And if Christ be in you—by His indwelling Spirit in virtue of which we have one life with him, the body—the body indeed—is dead because of ('by reason of') sin; but the spirit is life because (or, 'by reason of') righteousness. The word 'indeed,' which the original requires, is of the nature of a concession—q.d., 'I grant you that the body is dead, &c., and so far redemption is incomplete, but, &c.; q.d., 'If Christ be in you by His indwelling Spirit, though your "bodies" have to pass through the stage of "death," in consequence of the first Adam's "sin," your spirit is instinct with new and undying "life," brought in by the "righteousness" of the second Adam.' [THOLUCK, MEYER, and ALFORD in part, but only HODGE entirely.] But ('And') if the Spirit of him that raised up Jesus from the dead dwell in you—i.e., 'if He dwell in you as the Spirit of the Christ-raising One,' or, 'in all the resurrection-power which He put forth in raising Jesus,' he that raised up Christ from the dead—Observe the change of name from JESUS, as the historical Individual whom God raised from the dead, to CHRIST, the same Individual, considered as the Lord and Head of all His members, or of redeemed Humanity. [ALFORD.] shall also quicken (rather, 'shall quicken even') your mortal bodies (by the true reading appears to be 'by reason of') his Spirit that dwelleth in you—q.d., 'Your bodies indeed are not exempt from the death which sin brought in; but your spirits even now have in them an undying life, and if the Spirit of Him that raised up Jesus from the dead dwell in you, even these bodies of yours, though they yield to the last enemy and the dust of them return to the dust as it was, shall yet experience the same resurrection as that of their living Head, in virtue of the indwelling of the same Spirit in you that quickened Him.' 12, 13. Therefore, brethren, we are debtors, not to the flesh, to live after the flesh—q.d., 'Once we were sold under sin ch. 7, 14; but now that we have been set free from that hard master, and become servants to Righteousness (ch. 6, 22), we owe nothing to the flesh, we disown its unrighteous claims and are deaf to its imperious demands.' Glorious sentiment! For if ye live after the flesh, ye shall die (in the sense of ch. 6, 21); but if ye through the Spirit do mortify the deeds of the body (see on ch. 7, 23), ye shall live (in the sense of ch. 6, 22). The apostle is not satisfied with assuring them that they are under no obligations to the flesh, to hearken to its suggestions, without reminding them where it will end if they do; and he uses the word "mortify" (put to death) as a kind of play upon the word "die" just before—q.d., 'If ye do not kill sin, it will kill you.' But he tempers this by the bright alternative, that if they do, through the Spirit, mortify the deeds of the body, such a course will infallibly terminate in "life" everlasting. And this leads the apostle into a new line of thought, opening into his final subject, the "glory" awaiting the justified believer.—Note (1). 'There can be no safety, no holiness, no happiness, to those who are out of Christ: No safety, because all such are under the condemnation of the law (v. 1); no holiness, because such only as are united to Christ have the Spirit of Christ (v. 9); no happiness, because to be "carnally minded is death" (v. 6).' [HODGE.] (2). The sanctification of believers, as it has its whole foundation in the atoning death, so it has its living spring in the indwelling of the Spirit of Christ (v. 3-4). (3). 'The bent of the thoughts, affections, and pursuits, is the only decisive test of character (v. 5).' [HODGE.] (4). No human refinement of the carnal mind will make it spiritual, or compensate for the absence of spirituality. "Flesh" and "spirit" are essentially and unchangeably opposed; nor can the carnal mind, as such, be brought into real subjection to the law of God (v. 5-7). Hence (5), the estrangement of God and the sinner is mutual. For as the sinner's state of mind is "enmity against God" (v. 7), so in this state he "cannot please God" (v. 8). (6). Since the Holy Ghost is, in the same breath, called indiscriminately "the Spirit of God," "the Spirit of Christ," and "Christ" Himself (as an indwelling life in believers), the Essential Unity and yet Personal distinctness of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, in the one adorable Godhead must be believed, as the only consistent explanation of such language (v. 9-11). (7). The consciousness of spiritual life in our renewed souls is a glorious assurance of resurrection life in the body also, in virtue of the same quickening Spirit whose habitation we already enjoy (v. 11). (8). Whatever professions of spiritual life men may make, it remains eternally true that "if we live after the flesh we shall die," and only "if we through the Spirit do mortify the deeds of the body we shall live" (v. 13 and cf. Galatians, 6, 7, 8; Ephesians, 5, 6; Philippians, 3, 18, 19; 1 John, 3, 7, 8).

SECOND: The Sonship of Believers—Their future Inheritance—The Intercession of the Spirit for them (v. 14-27). 14. For as many as are led by the Spirit of God, they &c. ('these are sons of God'). Hitherto the apostle has spoken of the Spirit simply as a power through which believers mortify sin: now he speaks of Him as a gracious, loving Guide, whose "leading"—enjoyed by all in whom is the Spirit of God's dear Son—shows that they also are "sons of God." 15. For, &c.—For ye received not (at the time of your conversion) the spirit of bondage, i.e., 'the spirit ye received was not a spirit of bondage,' again [gendering] to fear—as under the law which "worketh wrath"—q.d., 'Such was your condition before ye believed, living in legal bondage, haunted with incessant forebodings under a sense of unpardoned sin. But it was not to perpetuate that wretched state that ye received the Spirit,' but ye have received 'ye received' the Spirit of adoption, whereby (rather, 'wherein') we cry, Abba, Father. The word "cry" is emphatic, expressing the spontaneity, the strength, and the exuberance of the filial emotions. In Galatians, 4, 6, this cry is said to proceed from the Spirit in us, drawing forth the filial exclamation in our hearts: Here, it is said to proceed from our own hearts under the vitalizing energy of the Spirit, as the very element of the new life in believers (cf. Matthew, 10, 19, 20; and see on v. 4). "Abba" is the Syro-Chaldaic word for "Father," and the Greek word for that is added, not surely to tell the reader that both mean the same thing, but for the same reason which drew both words from the lips of Christ Himself during his agony in the garden (Mark, 14, 36). He, doubtless, loved to utter his Father's name in both the accustomed forms; beginning with His cherished mother-tongue, and adding that of the learned. In this view the use of both words here has a charming simplicity and warmth. 16. The Spirit itself—it should be 'Himself' (see on v. 26). beareth witness with our spirit, that we are the children ('are children') of God: The testimony of our own spirit is borne in that cry of conscious sonship, "Abba, Father;" but we are not therein alone; for the Holy Ghost within us, yes, even in that very cry which it is His to draw forth, sets His own distinct seal to ours; and thus, "In the mouth of two witnesses" the thing is established. The apostle had before called us "sons of God," referring to our adoption: here the word changes to "children," referring to our new birth. The one expresses the divinity to which we are admitted: the other the new life which we receive. The latter is more suitable here; because a son by adoption might not be heir of the property, whereas a son by birth certainly is, and this is what the apostle is now coming to. 17. And if children, then heirs ('heirs also'); heirs of God—of our Father's kingdom. and joint-heirs with Christ—as the “First-born among many brethren” (v. 29), and as “Heir of all things.” If so be that we suffer (‘provided we be suffering with Him’) that we may be also glorified together with Him. This necessity of conformity to Christ in suffering in order to participation in His glory, is taught alike by Christ Himself and by His apostles (John, 12. 24-26; Matthew, 16. 24, 25; 2 Timothy, 2. 12). 18. For I reckon that the sufferings of this present time are not worthy to be compared with the glory which shall be revealed in us—q.d., “True, we must suffer with Christ if we would partake of His glory; but what of that! For if such sufferings are set over against the coming glory, they sink into insignificance.” 19-22. For, &c.—“The apostle, fired with the thought of the future glory of the saints, pours forth this splendid passage, in which he represents the whole creation groaning under its present degradation, and looking and longing for the revelation of this glory as the end and consummation of its existence.” [HODGE.] the earnest expectation (cf. Philippians, 1. 20) of the creature (rather, “the creation”) waiteth for the manifestation (“is waiting for the revelation”) of the sons of God—i.e., “for the redemption of their bodies” from the grave (v. 23), which will reveal their sonship, now hidden (cf. Luke, 20. 36; Revelation, 21. 7). For the creature (“the creation”) was made subject to vanity, not willingly—i.e., through no natural principle of decay. The apostle, personifying creation, represents it as only submitting to the vanity with which it was smitten, on man’s account, in obedience to that superior power which had mysteriously linked its destinies with man’s. And so he adds—but by reason of him who hath subjected the same (“who subjected it”) in hope; because (or, “in hope that”) the creature itself also (“even the creation itself”) shall be delivered from the bondage of corruption (its bondage to the principle of decay) into the glorious liberty (rather, “the liberty of the glory”) of the children of God—i.e., the creation itself shall, in a glorious sense, be delivered into that freedom from debility and decay in which the children of God, when raised up in glory, shall expatiate: into this freedom from corruptibility the creation itself shall, in a glorious sense, be delivered. [DE CALVIN, BEZA, BENGE, TROLUCK, OSWALDEN, DE WETTE, MEYER, PHILIPPI, HODGE, ALFORD, &c.] If for man’s sake alone the earth was cursed, it cannot surprise us that it should share in his recovery. And if so, to represent it as sympathizing with man’s miseries, and as looking forward to his complete redemption as the period of its own emancipation from its present sin-blighted condition, is a beautiful thought, and in harmony with the general teaching of Scripture on the subject. (See on 2 Peter, 2. 12.) 23. And not only [they], but ourselves also (or, “not only [so], but even we ourselves”—i.e., besides the inanimate creation), which have the first-fruits of the Spirit—or, “the Spirit as the first-fruits of our full redemption” (cf. 2 Corinthians, 1. 22) moulding the heart to a heavenly frame and attempting it to its future element, even we ourselves—though we have so much of heaven already within us, groan within ourselves—under this “body of sin and death,” and under the manifold “vanity and vexation of spirit” that are written upon every object and every pursuit and every enjoyment under the sun, waiting for the (manifestation of our) adoption, [to wit] the redemption of our body—from the grave: (not (be it observed) the deliverance of ourselves from the body, but the redemption of the body itself from the grave.” [BENGE.] 24. For we are saved by hope—rather, ‘For in hope we are saved’; i.e., it is more a salvation in hope than as yet in actual possession, but hope that is seen is not hope—for the very meaning of hope is, the expectation that something now future will become present, for what a man seeth, why doth he yet hope for?—the latter ending when the other comes. 25. But if we hope for that we see not, [then do] we with patience wait for it—i.e., then, patient waiting for it is our fitting attitude. 26, 27. Likewise also the Spirit, &c.—or, ‘But after the like manner doth the Spirit also help,’ &c. our infirmities—rather (according to the true reading), ‘our infirmity’; not merely the one infirmity here specified, but the general weakness of the spiritual life in its present state, of which one example is here given, for we know not what we should pray for as we ought—It is not the proper matter of prayer that believers are at so much loss about, for the fullest directions are given them on this head; but to ask for the right things “as they ought” is the difficulty. This arises partly from the dimness of our spiritual vision in the present veiled state, while we have to “walk by faith, not by sight” (see on 1 Corinthians, 13. 6; and on 2 Corinthians, 5. 7), and the large admixture of the ideas and feelings which spring from the fleeting objects of sense that there is in the very best views and affections of our renewed nature; partly also from the necessary imperfection of all human language as a vehicle for expressing the subtle spiritual feelings of the heart. In these circumstances, how can it be but that much uncertainty should surround all our spiritual exercises, and that in our nearest approaches and in the freest outpourings of our hearts to our Father in heaven, doubts should spring up within us whether our frame of mind in such exercises is altogether befitting and well-pleasing to God? Nor do these anxieties subside, but rather deepen, with the depth and ripeness of our spiritual experience. But the Spirit itself—rather, ‘Himself.’ (See end of v. 27), maketh intercession for us with groanings which cannot be uttered (i.e., which cannot be expressed in articulate language—Sublime and affecting ideas, for which we are indebted to this passage alone! q.d., “As we struggle to express in articulate language the desires of our hearts, and find that our deepest emotions are the most inexpressible, we “groan” under this felt inability. But not in vain are these groanings. For “the Spirit Himself” is in them, giving to the emotions which Himself has kindled the only language of which they are capable, so that though on our part they are the fruit of impotence to utter what we feel, they are at the same time the intercession of the Spirit Himself in our behalf.’ And (rather, ‘But,’ inarticulate though these groanings be; he that searcheth the hearts knoweth what is the mind of the Spirit, because he (the Spirit) maketh intercession for the saints according [to the will of] God—As the Searcher of hearts, He watches the surging emotions of them in prayer, and knows perfectly what the Spirit means by the groanings which He draws forth within us, because that blessed Intercessor pleads by them only for what God Himself designs to bestow.—Note (1.) Are believers “led by the Spirit of God” (v. 14)? How careful then should they be not to “grieve the Holy Spirit of God” (Ephesians, 4. 30! Cf. Psalm 32. 8, 9: “I will . . . guide thee with mine eye. Be not (then) as the horse, or as the mule,” &c. (2.) “The spirit of bondage” to which many Protestants are “all their lifetime subject,” and the “doubtful faith” which the Popish Church systematically inculcates, are both rebuked here, being in direct and painful contrast to that “spirit of adoption,” and that witness of the Spirit, along with our own spirit, to the fact of our sonship, which it is here said the children of God, as such, enjoy (v. 15, 16. (3.) As suffering with Christ is the ordained preparation for participating in this glory, so the insignificance of the one as compared with the other cannot fail to lighten the sense of it, however bitter and protracted (v. 17, 18). (4.) It cannot but swell the heart of every intelligent Christian to think that if external nature has been mysteriously affected for evil by the fall of man, it only awaits his completed recovery, at the resurrection, to experience a corresponding emancipation from its blighted condition into undecaying life and un fading beauty (v. 19-23). (6.) It is not when believers, through sinful "quenching of the Spirit," have the sweetest and faintest glimpses of heaven, that they sigh most fervently to be there; but, on the contrary, when through the unobstructed working of the Spirit in their hearts, "the first-fruits" of the glory to be revealed are most largely and frequently tasted, then, and just for that reason, is it that they "groan within themselves" for full redemption (v. 23). For thus they reason: If such be the drops, what will the ocean be? If thus "to see through a glass darkly" be so very sweet, what will it be to "see face to face"? If when "my Beloved stands behind our wall, looking forth at the windows, showing Himself through the lattice" (Canticles, 1. 9)—that thin veil which parts the seen from the unseen—if He is even thus to me "Father than the children of men," what shall He be when He stands confessed before my undazzled vision the Only-begotten of the Father in my own nature, and I shall be like Him, for I shall see Him as He is! (8.) "The patience of hope" (1 Thessalonians, 1. 3) is the fitting attitude for those who with the joyful consciousness that they are already "saved" (3 Timothy, 1. 9; Titus, 2. 8), have yet the painful consciousness that they are saved but in part; or, "that being justified by his grace, they are made (in the present state) heirs according to the hope (only) of eternal life," Titus, 3. 7 (v. 24, 25). (7.) As prayer is the breath of the spiritual life, and the believer's only effectual relief under the "infirmity" which attaches to his whole condition here below, how cheering is it to be assured that the blessed Spirit, coexistent of it all, comes in aid of it all; and in particular, that when believers, unable to articulate their case before God, can at times do nothing but lie "groaning" before the Lord, these inarticulate groanings are the Spirit's own vehicle for conveying into "the ears of the Lord of Sabaoth" their whole case; and come up before the Hearer of prayer as the Spirit's own intercession in their behalf, and that they are recognised by Him that sitteth on the Throne, as embodying only what His own "will" determined before to bestow upon them (v. 26, 27.) (8.) What a view do these two verses—v. 26, 27—give of the relations subsisting between the Divine Persons in the economy of redemption, and the harmony of their respective operations in the case of each of the redeemed!

THIRD: Triumphant Summary of the whole Argument v. 28-30. 28. And—or, 'Moreover,' or 'Now,' noting a transition to a new particular, we know, &c.—The order in the original is more striking: "We know that to them that love God (cf. 1 Corinthians, 2. 9; Ephesians, 6. 24; James, 1. 12; 2. 6) all things work together for good, [even] to them who are the called (together, 'who are called') according to his [eternal] purpose." Glorious assurance! And this, it seems, was a "household word," a "known" thing, among believers. This working of all things for good is done quite naturally to "them that love God," because such souls, persuaded that He who gave His own Son for them, cannot but mean them well in all His procedure, learn thus to take in good part whatever He sends them, however trying to flesh and blood: and to them who are the called, according to "His purpose," all things do in the same intelligible way, "work together for good," for, even when "He hath His way in the whirlwind," they see "His chariot paved with love" (Canticles, 3. 10). And knowing that it is in pursuance of an eternal "purpose" of love that they have been "called into the fellowship of His Son Jesus Christ" (1 Corinthians, 1. 9), they naturally say within themselves, 'It cannot be that He "of Whom, and through Whom, and to Whom are all things," should suffer that purpose to be thwarted by any thing really adverse to us, or that He should not make all things, dark as well as light, crooked as well as straight, to co-operate to the furtherance and final completion of His high design.' 29. For (as touching this "calling according to his purpose") when he did foreknow he also did predestinate (foreordain)—In what sense are we to take the word "foreknow" here? Those who He foreknew would never and believe, say Pelagians of every age and every time. But this is to thrust into the text what is contrary to the whole spirit, and even letter, of the apostle's teaching (see ch. 9. 11; 3 Timothy, 1. 9). In ch. 11. 2, and Psalm 1. 6, God's "knowledge" of His people cannot be restricted to a mere foresight of future events, or acquaintance with what is passing here below. Does "whom He did foreknow," then, mean "whom He foreordained"? Surely, because both "foreknowledge" and "foreordination" are here mentioned, and the one as the cause of the other. It is difficult indeed for our limited minds to distinguish them as states of the Divine Mind towards men; especially since in Acts, 1. 21, "the counsel" is put before "the foreknowledge of God," while in 1 Peter, 1. 2, "election" is said to be "according to the foreknowledge of God." But probably God's foreknowledge of His own people means His peculiar, gracious, complacency in them, while His "predestinating" or "foreordaining" then signifies His fixed purpose, flowing from this, to "save them and call them with an holy calling" (3 Timothy, 1. 9). to be conformed to the image of his Son—i.e., to be His sons after the pattern, model, or image of His Sonship in our nature. that he might be the first-born among many brethren—"The First-born," the Son by nature; His "many brethren," sons by adoption; He, in the Humanity of the Only-begotten of the Father, bearing our sins on the accursed tree; they in that of mere men ready to perish by reason of sin, but redeemed by His blood from condemnation and wrath, and transformed into His likeness: He "the First-born from the dead," they "that sleep in Jesus," to be in due time "brought with Him;" "The First-born," now "crowned with glory and honour;" His "many brethren," "when He shall appear, to be like Him, for they shall see Him as He is." 30. Moreover—And, or 'Now,' explanatory of the foregoing verse—q. d., 'In "predestinating us to be conformed to the image of His Son" in final glory, He settled all the successive steps of it. Thus—whom he did predestinate, then he also called—The word "called" (as Hodge and others truly observe) is never in the Epistles of the New Testament applied to those who have only the outward invitation of the Gospel (as in Matthew, 20. 16; 22. 14). It always means "internally, effectually, awfully called." It denotes the first great step in personal salvation, and answers to "conversion." Only the word conversion expresses the change of character which then takes place, whereas this "calling" expresses the divine authorship of the change, and the efficacy power by which we are summoned, Matthew-like, Zaccheus-like, out of our old, wretched, perishing condition, into a new, safe, blessed life, and whom he (thus) called, then he also justified (brought into the definite state of reconciliation already so fully described), and whom he justified, then he also glorified—(brought to final glory, v. 17, 18). Noble climax, and so rhythmically expressed! And all this is viewed as past; because, starting from the past decree of "predestination to be conformed to the image of God's Son" of which the other steps are but the successive unfoldings—all is beheld as one entire, eternally completed salvation. 31. What shall we then say to these things—q. d., 'We can no further go, think, wish.' [BENGEL.] This whole passage, to v. 34, and even to the end of the chapter, strikes all thoughtful interpreters and readers, as transcending almost every thing in language, while Olausen notices the 'profound sa] character of the thought. If God [be] a [can be] against us?—If God be resolved to bring us through, all our enemies must be "Who would set the briars and thorns in battle? He would go through them, burn them together" (Isaiah, 27. 4). What isolation is here! Nay, but the great Pledge already been given; for, 32. He—rather, 'He it is a pity to lose the emphatic particle of al.) that spared not—'withheld not,' kept This expressive phrase, as well as the whole suggested by Genesis, 22. 12, where Jehovah's commendation of Abraham's conduct regard- Isaac seems designed to furnish something upse into the spirit of His own act in sur- His own Son. "Take now (said the Lord to thy son, thine only, whom thou lovest, and im for a burnt-offering" (Genesis, 22. 2); and n Abraham had all but performed that s of self-sacrifice, the Lord interposed, say I know that thou fearest God, seeing thou 'WITHHELD THY SON, THINE ONLY SON, from the light of this incident, then, and of this our apostle can mean to convey nothing less than in "not sparing His own Son, but delin- im up," or surrendering Him, God exercised, sternal character, a mysterious act of Self- which, though involving none of the pain and is loss which are inseparable from the very if sacrifice on our part, was not less real, but, inary, as far transcended any such acts of His nature is above the creature's. But this etvable if Christ be not God's "own (or pro- partaker of His very nature, as really as of His father Abraham's. In that sense, the Jews charged our Lord with making 'equal with God' (see on John, 5. 18, which ly forthwith proceeded, not to disown, but to and confirm. Understand Christ's Sonship i the language of Scripture regarding it is e and harmonious; but take it to be an relationship, ascribed to Him in virtue either iraculous birth, or His resurrection from the grandeur of His works, or all of these -and the passages which speak of it neither f themselves nor harmonize with each other, im up—not to death merely (as many take it), s too narrow an idea here but 'surrendered the most comprehensive sense: cf. John, 3. so loved the world that He GAVE His only- Son," for as all—i.e., for all believers alike; every good interpreter admits must be the here. how shall he not—how can we conceive ould not. with him also—rather, 'also with the word "also" is often so placed in our s to obscure the sense: see on Hebrews, 12. 1.) s us all things?—all other gifts being not only ably less than this Gift of gifts, but virtually in it. 33, 34. Who shall lay any thing to the (or, bring any charge against) God's elect?— lace in this Epistle where believers are styled ." In what sense this is meant will appear apter. yea rather, that is risen again—to make purposes of His death. Here, as in some es, the apostle delightfully corrects himself ans, 4. 9; and on ch. 1. 12; not meaning that rection of Christ was of more saving value death, but that having "put away sin by the f Himself"—which though precious to us was "unmingled bitterness—it was incomparably ightful to think that He was again alive, and ee to the efficacy of His death in our behalf. m ("also) at the right hand of God—The right he king was anciently the seat of honour (cf. 20. 25; 1 Kings, 2. 19; Psalm 45. 9), and denoted participation in the royal power and glory (Matthew, 20. 21). The classical writings contain similar allusions. Accordingly Christ's sitting at the right hand of God—predicted in Psalm 110. 1, and historically referred to in Mark, 16. 19; Acts, 2. 33; 7. 56; Ephesians, 1. 20; Colossians, 3. 1; 1 Peter, 3. 22; Revelation, 3. 21—signifies the glory of the exalted Son of man, and the power in the government of the world in which He participates. Hence it is called "sitting on the right hand of Power" (Matthew, 26. 64), and "sitting on the right hand of the Majesty on high" (Hebrews, 1. 3). [PHILIPPI,] who also maketh intercession for us—using all His bound- less interest with God in our behalf. This is the top of the climax. 'His Session at God's right hand denotes His power to save us; His Intercession, His will to do it.' [BENJEL.] But how are we to conceive of this Intercession? Not certainly as of one pleading 'on bended knees and with outstretched arms, to use the expressive language of Calvin. But yet, neither is it merely a figurative intimation that the power of Christ's redemption is continually operative [TRO- LUCE], or merely to show the fervour and vehemence of His love for us. [CHRYSOSTOM.] It cannot be taken to mean less than this, that the glorified Redeemer, conscious of His claims, expressly signifies His will that the efficacy of His death should be made good to the uttermost, and signifies it in some such royal style as we find Him employing in that wonderful Inter- cessory Prayer which He spoke as from within the veil (see on John, 17. 11, 12): "Father, I WILL that they also whom thou hast given me be with me where I am" (see on John, 17. 24). But in what form this will is ex- pressed is as undiscoverable as it is unimportant. 35, 36. Who shall separate us from the love of Christ? This does not mean 'our love to Christ,' as if, Who shall hinder us from loving Christ? but 'Christ's love to us,' as is clear from the closing words of the chapter, which refer to the same subject. Nor would the other sense harmonize with the scope of the chapter, which is to exhibit the ample ground of the believer's con- fidence in Christ. 'It is no ground of confidence to assert, or even to feel, that we will never forsake Christ; but it is the strongest ground of assurance to be convinced that His love will never change.' [HODGE.] shall tribulation . . . ?—q.d., 'None of these, nor all together, how terrible soever to the flesh, are tokens of God's wrath, or the least ground for doubt of His love.' From whom could such a question come better than from one who had himself for Christ's sake endured so much? (See 2 Corinthians, 11. 11-33; 1 Corinthians, 4. 10-13.) The apostle says not (remarks Calvin nobly) 'What,' but 'Who,' just as if all creatures and all afflictions were so many gladiators taking arms against the Christians. [TROTLOCK.] As it is written, For thy sake, &c.—Psalm 44. 22—quoted as descriptive of what God's faithful people may expect from their enemies at any period when their hatred of righteousness is roused, and there is nothing to re- strain it (see Galatians, 4. 29). 37. May, in all these things we are more than conquerors, through him that loved us—not 'We are so far from being conquered by them, that they do us much good' [HODGE]; for though this be true, the word means simply, 'We are pre- eminently conquerors.' See on ch. 5. 20. And so far are they from "separating us from Christ's love," that it is just "through Him that loved us" that we are victorious over them. 38, 39. For I am persuaded, that neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers—whether good or bad. But as the bad are not called "angels," or "principalities," or "powers," save with some addition to show that such are meant (Matthew, 25. 41; Colossians, 2. 15; Ephesians, 6. 12; 2 Peter, 2. 4—except perhaps 1 Corinthians, 6. 8), probably the good are meant here, but merely as the same apostle supposes an angel from heaven to preach a false gospel. (So the best interpreters.) nor things present, nor things to come—no condition of the present life and none of the unknown possibilities of the life to come. nor any other creature (rather, 'created thing'—any other thing in the whole created universe of God) shall be able to separate us, &c.—All the terms here are to be taken in their most general sense, and need no closer definition. The indefinite expressions are meant to denote all that can be thought of, and are only a rhetorical paraphrase of the conception of allness. [OLAHAUSEN.] from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord—Thus does this wonderful chapter, with which the argument of the Epistle properly closes, leave us who are "justified by faith," in the arms of everlasting Love, whence no hostile power or conceivable event can ever tear us. "Behold what manner of love is this!" And "what manner of persons ought we to be," who are thus "blessed with all spiritual blessings in Christ!"—Note (1). There is a glorious consistency between the eternal purposes of God and the free agency of men, though the link of connection is beyond human, perhaps created, apprehension v. 26. (2.) How ennobling is the thought that the complicated movements of the divine government of the world are all arranged in express furtherance of the "good" of God's chosen (v. 28) (3.) To whatever conformity to the Son of God in dignity and glory, believers are or shall hereafter be raised, it will be the joy of every one of them, as it is most fitting, "that in all things He should have the pre-eminence" Colossians, 1. 18 v. 29. (4.) "As there is a beautiful harmony and necessary connection between the several doctrines of grace, so must there be a like harmony in the character of the Christian. He cannot experience the joy and confidence flowing from his election without the humility which the consideration of its being gratuitous must produce; nor can he have the peace of one who is justified without the holiness of one who is saved" v. 29, 30. [HODGE.] (5.) However difficult it may be for finite minds to comprehend the emotions of the Divine Mind, let us never for a moment doubt that in "not sparing His own Son but delivering Him up for us all," God made a real sacrifice of all that was dearest to his heart, and that in so doing He meant for ever to assure His people that all other things which they need—inasmuch as they are nothing to this stupendous gift, and indeed but the necessary sequel of it—will in due time be forthcoming v. 32. (6.) In return for such a sacrifice on God's part, what can be considered too great on ours? (7.) If there could be any doubt as to the meaning of the all-important word "JUSTIFICATION" in this Epistle—whether, as the Church of Rome teaches, and many others affirm, it means "infusing righteousness into the unholiness, so as to make them righteous;" or, according to Protestant teaching, "absolving, acquitting, or pronouncing righteous the guilty;" v. 33 ought to set such doubt entirely at rest. For the apostle's question in this verse is, "Who shall bring a charge against God's elect?"—in other words, "Who shall pronounce" or "hold them guilty" seeing that "God justifies" them: showing beyond all doubt, that to "justify" was intended to express precisely the opposite of "holding guilty;" and consequently as Calvin triumphantly argues that it means "to absolve from the charge of guilt." (8.) If there could be any reasonable doubt in what light the death of Christ is to be regarded in this Epistle, v. 24 ought to set that doubt entirely at rest. For there the apostle's question is, "Who shall 'condemn' God's elect, since "Christ died" for them; showing beyond all doubt as Philippi justly argues: that it was the expiatory character of that death which the apostle had in view. (9.) What an affecting view of the love of Christ does it give us to learn, that His greatest nearness to God and most powerful interest with Him—as "seated on His right hand"—is employed in behalf of His people here below (v. 34)!! (10.) "The whole universe, with all that it contains, so far as it is good, is the friend and ally of the Christian; and, so far as it is evil, is more than a conquered foe" (v. 36-39). [HODGE.] (11.) Are we who "have tasted that the Lord is gracious," both "kept by the power of God through faith unto salvation" (1 Peter, 1. 5, and embraced in the arms of Invincible Love! Then surely, while "building ourselves up on our most holy faith," and "praying in the Holy Ghost," only the more should we feel constrained to "keep ourselves in the love of God, looking for the mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ unto eternal life" (Jude, 20, 21).

CHAPTER IX.

VER. 1-33. THE BEARING OF THE FOREGOING TRUTHS UPON THE CONDITION AND DESTINY OF THE CHOSEN PEOPLE—ELECTION—THE CALLING OF THE GENTILES. Too well aware that he was regarded as a traitor to the dearest interests of his people (Acts, 21. 33; 22. 23; 25. 24), the apostle opens this division of his subject by giving vent to his real feelings, with extraordinary vehemence of protestation. 1. 2. I say the truth in Christ—as if steeped in the spirit of Him who wept over impotent and doomed Jerusalem (cf. ch. 1. 9; 2 Corinthians, 12. 19; Philippians, 1. 8). my conscience bearing me witness in the Holy Ghost—q. d., "my conscience as quickened, illuminated, and even now under the direct operation of the Holy Ghost." That I have, &c.—That I have great grief or "sorrow" and unceasing anguish in my heart—the bitter hostility of his nation to the glorious Gospel, and the awful consequences of their unbelief, weighing heavily and incessantly upon his spirit. 3. For I could wish that myself were accursed from Christ for ("in behalf of" my brethren, my kinsmen according to the flesh.—In proportion as he felt himself spiritually severed from his nation, he seems to have realized all the more vividly their natural relationship. To explain away the wish here expressed, as too strong for any Christian to utter or conceive, some have rendered the opening words, "I did wish," referring it to his former unenlightened state; a sense of the words too tame to be endured; others unwarrantably soften the sense of the word "accursed." But our version gives the true import of the original; and if it be understood as the language rather of "strong and indistinct emotions than of definite ideas" [HODGE], expressing passionately how he felt his whole being swallowed up in the salvation of his people, the difficulty will vanish, and we shall be reminded of the similar ideas so nobly expressed by Moses, Exodus, 32. 32. 4. Who are Israelites—See ch. 11. 1; 2 Corinthians, 11. 22; Philippians, 3. 5. to whom pertaineth ("whose is" the adoption)—It is true that, compared with the new economy, the old was a state of minority and pupillage; and so far that of a bond-servant (Galatians, 4. 3-5; yet, compared with the state of the surrounding heathen, the choice of Abraham and his seed was a real separation of them to be a Family of God—Exodus, 1. 22; Deuteronomy, 32. 6; Isaiah, 1. 2; Jeremiah, 31. 9; Hosea, 11. 1; Malachi, 1. 6. and the glory—that "glory of the Lord," or "visible token of the divine presence in the midst of them," which rested on the ark and filled the tabernacle during all their wanderings in the wilderness; which in Jerusalem continued to be seen in the tabernacle and temple, and only disappeared when, at the Captivity, the temple was demolished and the sun of the ancient economy began to go down. This was what the Jews called the "Shechinah," and the covenants—"the covenants of promise" to which the Gentiles before Christ were "strangers" (Ephesians, 2. 12; meaning the one covenant with Abraham in its successive renewals see Galatians, 3. 16, 17. and the giving of the law—from mount Sinai, and the possession of it thereafter, which the Jews justly deemed their peculiar Whose are the fathers—here, s three great fathers of the covenant—saac, and Jacob—by whom God con- name Himself (Exodus, 3, 6, 13; Luke, most exalted privilege of all, and as such, he last) of whom as concerning the flesh (see hrist [same] [or, 'is Christ', who is over all, 'God over all,' blessed for ever. Amen— f the bright testimony here borne to the inity of Christ, various expedients have 2. (1.) To place a period, either after the sring the flesh Christ came," rendering as as a doxology to the Father—"God who 'blessed for ever," or after the word "all" st came, who is over all: God be blessed," (US, LOCKE, FRITZSCHE, MEYER, JOWETT, is fatal to this view, as even Socius ad- other Scripture doxologies the word veses the name of God on whom the bless- ed thus: "Blessed be God," Psalm 68, 35; the Lord God, the God of Israel," Psalm sides, any such doxology here would be and frigid in the extreme; the sad subject was entering suggesting any thing but a n in connection with Christ's Incarnation. 2.) To transpose the words rendered 'who ase the rendering would be, 'whose (i.e., s Christ according to the flesh.' (CRELLIUS, AYLOR, WHITTY.) But this is a desperate i the face of all MS. authority; as is also re of Grotius and others, that the word ld be omitted from the text. It remains e have here no doxology at all, but a naked fact, that while Christ is "of the Israelit- as concerning the flesh," He is in another l over all, blessed for ever." (In 2 Co- 3, 3), the very Greek phrase which is here ho is," is used in the same sense; and cf. eek.) In this view of the passage, as a) the supreme divinity of Christ, besides dox fathers, some of the ablest modern ur. [BENGE, THOLUCK, STUART, OR- ILIPE, ALFORD, &c.] 6. Not as though ed had taken none effect—"hath fallen to the failed: cf. Luke, 16, 17, Greek, for they are l which are of Israel—better, 'for not all are of Israel are Israel.' Here the apostle he profound subject of ELECTION, the treat- ch extends to the end of ch. 11.—q.d., that I mourn over the total loss of Israel; uld involve the failure of God's word to ut not all that belong to the natural seed, r the name of "Israel," are the Israel of scable choice." The difficulties which his subject lie not in the apostle's teaching, in enough, but in the truths themselves, e for which, taken by themselves, is over- but whose perfect harmony is beyond prehension in the present state. The great rror here lies in hastily inferring (as nd others), from the apostle's taking up, of this chapter, the calling of the Gentiles n with the rejection of Israel, and con- s subject through the two next chapters, ction treated of in the body of this chapter not personal Election, and consequently is rely to religious advantages, not to eternal In that case, the argument of v. 6, with which the subject of Election opens, would be this: 'The choice of Abraham and his seed has not failed; because though Israel has been rejected, the Gentiles have taken their place; and God has a right to choose what nation He will to the privileges of His visible kingdom.' But so far from this, the Gentiles are not so much as mentioned at all till towards the close of the chapter; and the argument of this verse is, that 'all Israel is not rejected, but only a portion of it, the remainder being the "Israel" whom God has chosen in the exercise of His sovereign right.' And that this is a choice not to mere external privileges, but to eternal salvation, will abundantly appear from what follows. 7-9. Neither, because they are the seed of Abraham, are they all children—q.d. 'Not in the line of mere fleshly descent from Abraham does the election run; else Ishmael, Hagar's child, and even Keturah's children, would be included, which they were not.' but (the true election are such of Abraham's seed as God unconditionally chooses, as exemplified in that promise, In Isaac shall thy seed be called—Genesis, 21, 12, 10-13. And not only so; but when Rebecca, &c.—It might be thought that there was a natural reason for preferring the child of Sarah, as being Abraham's true and first wife, both to the child of Hagar, Sarah's maid, and to the children of Keturah, his second wife. But there could be no such reason in the case of Rebecca, Isaac's only wife; for the choice of her son Jacob was the choice of one of two sons by the same mother, and of the younger in preference to the elder, and before either of them was born, and consequently before either had done good or evil to be a ground of preference: and all to show that the sole ground of distinction lay in the unconditional choice of God—"not of works, but of Him that calleth." 14. What shall we say then? Is there unrighteousness with God? God forbid—This is the first of two objections to the foregoing doctrine, that God chooses one and rejects another, not on account of their works, but purely in the exercise of His own good pleasure: 'This doctrine is inconsistent with the justice of God.' The answer to this objection extends to v. 19, where we have the second objection. 15. For he saith to Moses (Exodus, 33, 19), I will have mercy on whom I will have ('on whom I have') mercy, and I will have compassion on whom I will have ('on whom I have') compassion—q.d. 'There can be no unrighteousness in God's choosing whom He will, for to Moses He expressly claims the right to do so.' Yet it is worthy of notice that this is expressed in the positive rather than the negative form: not, 'I will have mercy on none but whom I will'; but, 'I will have mercy on whomsoever I will.' 16. So then it is not of him that willeth (hath the inward desire), nor of him that runneth (maketh active effort)—(cf. 1 Corinthians, 9, 24, 26; Philippians, 2, 18; 3, 14). Both these are indispensable to salvation, yet salvation is owing to neither, but is purely "of God that showeth mercy." See on Philippians, 2, 12, 13, "Work out your own salvation with fear and trembling; for it is God which, out of His own good pleasure, worketh in you both to will and to do." 17. For the Scriptures saith to Pharaoh (observe here the light in which the Scripture is viewed by the apostle), Even for this same ('this very') purpose have I raised ('raised I') thee up, &c.—The apostle had shown that God claims the right to choose whom He will: here he shows by an example that God punishes whom He will. But 'God did not make Pharaoh wicked; He only forbore to make him good, by the exercise of special and altogether unmerited grace.' [HODGE.] that I might ('may') show my power in thee.—It was not that Pharaoh was worse than others that he was so dealt with, but 'in order that he might become a monument of the penal justice of God, and it was with a view to this that God provided that the evil which was in him should be manifested in this definite form. [OLSHAUSEN.] and that my name might ('may') be declared ('proclaimed') in all the earth.—'This is the principle on which all punishment is inflicted, that the true character of the Divine Lawgiver should be known. This is of all objects, where God is concerned, the highest and most important; in itself the most worthy, and in its results the most beneficial.' [HODGE.] 18. Therefore hath he—'So then he hath.' The result then is that He hath mercy on whom he will have mercy, and whom he will he hardeneth—by judicially abandoning them to the hardening influence of sin itself (Psalm 81. 11, 12; ch. 1. 24, 26, 28; Hebrews, 3. 8, 13), and of the surrounding incentives to it (Matthew, 24. 12; 1 Corinthians, 16. 38; 2 Thessalonians, 2. 17). 19. Objection second to the doctrine of Divine Sovereignty: Thou shalt say then unto me, Why ('Why then' is the true reading) doth he yet find fault? for who hath resisted ('Who resisteth') his will?—q. d., 'This doctrine is incompatible with human responsibility.' If God chooses and rejects, pardons and punishes, whom He pleases, why are those blamed who, if rejected by Him, cannot help sinning and perishing? This objection shows quite as conclusively as the former the real nature of the doctrine objected to—that it is Election and Non-election to eternal Salvation prior to any difference of personal character: this is the only doctrine that could suggest the objection here stated, and to this doctrine the objection is plausible. What now is the apostle's answer? It is twofold. First: 'It is irreverence and presumption in the creature to arraign the Creator.' 20, 21. Nay but, O man, who art thou that repliest against God? Shall the thing formed say to him that formed it, Why hast thou made ('didst thou make') me thus (Isaiah, 45. 9)? Hath not the potter power over the clay, of the same lump to make one vessel unto honour, and another to dishonour?—The objection is founded on ignorance or misapprehension of the relation between God and His sinful creatures; supposing that He is under obligation to extend His grace to all, whereas He is under obligation to none. All are sinners, and have forfeited every claim to His mercy: It is therefore perfectly competent to God to spare one and not another, to make one vessel to honour and another to dishonour. But it is to be borne in mind that Paul does not here speak of God's right over his creatures as creatures, but as sinful creatures; as he himself clearly intimates in the next verses. It is the cavil of a sinful creature against his Creator that he is answering, and he does so by showing that God is under no obligation to give his grace to any, but is as sovereign as in fashioning the clay.' [HODGE.] But Second: 'There is nothing unjust in such sovereignty.' 22, 23. What if God, willing to show ('designing to manifest') his wrath (His holy displeasure against sin), and to make his power (to punish it) known, endured with much long-suffering the vessels of wrath—i. e., 'destined to wrath'; just as "vessels of mercy," in the next verse, mean "vessels destined to mercy" compare Ephesians, 2. 3, "children of wrath," fitted for destruction—It is well remarked by Stewart that the "difficulties which such statements involve are not to be got rid of by softening the language of one text, while so many others meet us which are of the same tenor; and even if we give up the Bible itself, so long as we acknowledge an omnipotent and omniscient God we cannot abate in the least degree from any of the difficulties which such texts make." Be it observed, however, that if God, as the apostle teaches, expressly "designed to manifest His wrath, and to make His power (in the way of wrath) known," it could only be by punishing some, while He pardons others; and if the choice between the two classes was not to be founded, as our apostle also teaches, on their own doings but on God's good pleasure, the decision behaved ultimately to rest with God. Yet, even in the necessary punishment of the wicked, as Hodge oberves, so far from proceeding with undue severity, the apostle would have it remarked that God "endures with much long-suffering" those objects of His righteous displeasure. and that he might make known the riches of his glory on the vessels of mercy—that 'glorious exuberance of divine mercy' which was manifested in choosing and eternally arranging for the salvation of sinners. 24. even us, whom he hath called, &c.—rather, 'Whom he hath also called, even us.' &c., in not only "before preparing," but in due time effectually "calling us." not of the Jews, &c.—better, 'not from among Jews only, but also from among Gentiles.' Here for the first time in this chapter the calling of the Gentiles is introduced; all before having respect, not to the substitution of the called Gentiles for the rejected Jews, but to the choice of one portion and the rejection of another of the same Israel. Had Israel's rejection been total, God's promise to Abraham would not have been fulfilled by the substitution of the Gentiles in their room; but Israel's rejection being only partial, the preservation of "a remnant," in which the promise was made good, was but "according to the election of grace." And now, for the first time, the apostle tells us that along with this elect remnant of Israel it is God's purpose to "take out of the Gentiles a people for His name" (Acts, 20. 14), and that subject, thus introduced, is now continued to the end of ch. 11. 25. As he saith also in Osee ('Hoses'), I will call them my people, which were not my people; and her beloved, which was not beloved—quoted, though not quite to the letter, from Hosea, 2. 23, a passage relating immediately, not to the heathen, but to the kingdom of the ten tribes; but since they had sunk to the level of the heathen, who were "not God's people," and in that sense "not beloved," the apostle legitimately applies it to the heathen, as "aliens from the commonwealth of Israel and strangers to the covenants of promise" (So 1 Peter, 2. 10). 26. And (another quotation from Hosea, 1. 10) it shall come to pass, that in the place where it was said unto them, Ye are not my people; there shall they be called the children ('called sons') of the living God—The expression, "in the place where . . . there," seems designed only to give greater emphasis to the gracious change here announced, from divine exclusion to divine admission to the privileges of the people of God. 27-29. Esaias also crieth ('But Isaiah crieth')—an expression denoting a solemn testimony openly borne (John, 1. 15; 7. 28, 37; 12. 44; Acts, 23. 6; 24. 41). concerning Israel, Though the number of the children ('sons') of Israel be as the sand of the sea, a ('the') remnant (i. e., the elect remnant only) shall be saved: for he will finish the work, and cut ('is finishing the reckoning, and cutting') it short in righteousness; because a short work ('reckoning') will the Lord make upon the earth—Isaiah, 10. 22, 23, as in the LXX. The sense given to these words by the apostle may seem to differ from that intended by the prophet. But the sameness of sentiment in both places will at once appear, if we understand those words of the prophet, "the consumption decreed shall overflow with righteousness," to mean that while a remnant of Israel should be graciously spared to return from captivity, "the decreed consumption" of the impatient majority should be "replete with righteousness," or illustratively display God's righteous vengeance against sin. The "short reckoning" seems to mean the speedy completing of His word, both in cutting off the one portion and saving the other. And as Esaias said ('hath said') before—i. e., probably in an earlier part of his book, namely, Isaiah, 1. 9. Except the Lord of Sabaoth—i. e., 'the Lord of Hosts' the word is Hebrew, but occurs so in the Epistle of James (ch. 5. 4), and has thence become naturalised in our Christian phraseology. had left us a seed—meaning 'a remnant' small at first, but in due time to be a seed of plenty (cf. Psalm 22. 30, 31; Isaiah, 6. 12, 13). we had been

('become') as Sodom, &c.—But for this precious seed, the chosen people would have resembled the cities of the plain, both in degeneracy of character and in merited doom. 30, 31. What shall we say then?—'What now is the result of the whole?' The result is this—Very different from what one would have expected—That the Gentiles, which followed not after righteousness, have attained ('attained') to righteousness, even the righteousness of faith—As we have seen that "the righteousness of faith" is the righteousness which justifies (see on ch. 3, 22, &c.), this verse must mean that 'the Gentiles, who while strangers to Christ, were quite indifferent about acceptance with God, having embraced the gospel as soon as it was preached to them, experienced the blessedness of a justified state,' but Israel, which followed ('following') after the law of righteousness, hath not attained ('attained not') unto the law of righteousness—The word "law" is used here, we think, in the same sense as in ch. 7, 22, to denote 'a principle of action'—q. d., 'Israel, though sincerely and steadily aiming at acceptance with God, nevertheless missed it.' 32, 33. Wherefore? Because (they sought it) not by faith, but as it were (rather simply, "as") by the works of the law—as if it were thus attainable, which justification is not: Since, therefore, it is attainable only by faith, they missed it. for (it is doubtful if this particle was originally in the text) they stumbled at that stumbling-stone—better, 'against the stone of stumbling,' meaning Christ. But in this they only did, as it is written (Isaiah, 8, 14; 28, 16). Behold, &c.—Two Messianic predictions are here combined, as is not unusual in quotations from the Old Testament. Thus combined, the prediction brings together both the classes of whom the apostle is treating: those to whom Messiah should be only a stone of stumbling, and those who were to regard Him as the Corner-Stone of all their hopes.—Thus expounded, this chapter presents no serious difficulties, none which do not arise out of the subject itself, whose depths are unfathomable; whereas on every other view of it the difficulty of giving it any consistent and worthy interpretation is in our judgment insuperable. Note (1.) To speak and act "in Christ," with a conscience not only illuminated, but under the present operation of the Holy Ghost, is not peculiar to the supernaturally inspired, but is the privilege, and ought to be the aim, of every believer (s. 1, 2.) Grace does not destroy, but only intensify and elevate, the feelings of nature; and Christians should study to show this (s. 2, 3). (3.) To belong to the visible Church of God, and enjoy its high and holy distinctions, is of the sovereign mercy of God, and should be regarded with devout thankfulness (s. 4, 5). (4.) Yet the most sacred external distinctions and privileges will avail nothing to salvation without the heart's submission to the righteousness of God (s. 31-33). (5.) What manner of persons ought "God's elect" to be,—in humility, when they remember that He hath saved them and called them, not according to their works but according to His own purpose and grace, given them in Christ Jesus before the world began (2 Timothy, 1, 9); in thankfulness, for "Who maketh thee to differ, and what hast thou that thou didst not receive?" (1 Corinthians, 4, 7); in godly jealousy over themselves, remembering that "God is not mocked," but "whatsoever a man soweth that shall he also reap" (Galatians, 6, 7); in diligence "to make our calling and election sure" (2 Peter, 1, 10); and yet in calm confidence that "whom God predestinates, and calls, and justifies, them (in due time) He also glorifies" (ch. 8, 30). (6.) On all subjects which from their very nature lie beyond human comprehension, it will be our wisdom to set down what God says in His word, and has actually done in His procedure towards men, as indisputable, even though it contradict the results at which in the best exercise of our limited judgment, we may have arrived (s. 14-23). (7.) Sincerity in religion, or a general desire to be saved, with assiduous efforts to do right, will prove fatal as a ground of confidence before God, if unaccompanied by implicit submission to His revealed method of salvation (s. 31-33). (8.) In the rejection of the great mass of the chosen people, and the inbringing of multitudes of estranged Gentiles, God would have men to see a law of His procedure, which the judgment of the great day will more vividly reveal—that "the last shall be first and the first last" (Matthew, 20, 16).

CHAPTER X.

VER. 1-21. SAME SUBJECT CONTINUED—HOW ISRAEL CAME TO MISS SALVATION, AND THE GENTILES TO FIND IT. 1. Brethren, my heart's desire—The word here used expresses 'entire complacency,' that in which the heart would experience full satisfaction, and prayer ('supplication') to God for Israel—'for them' is the true reading; the subject being continued from the close of the preceding chapter. Is, that they may be saved—'for their salvation.' Having before poured forth the anguish of his soul at the general unbelief of his nation and its dreadful consequences (ch. 9, 1-3), he here expresses in the most emphatic terms his desire and prayer for their salvation. 2. For I bear them record—or, 'witness,' as he would call from his own sad experience. that they have a zeal of ('for') God, but not according to knowledge—(cf. Acts, 22, 3; 26, 9-11; Galatians, 1, 13, 14). He alludes to this well meaning of his people, notwithstanding their spiritual blindness, not certainly to excuse their rejection of Christ and rage against His saints, but as some ground of hope regarding them. (See 1 Timothy, 1, 13.) 3. For they being ignorant of God's righteousness—i. e., for the justification of the guilty (see on ch. 1, 17). and going about ('seeking') to establish their own righteousness, have not submitted themselves to the righteousness of God—The apostle views the general rejection of Christ by the nation as one act. 4. For Christ is the end (the object or aim) of the law for (justifying) righteousness to every one that believeth—i. e., contains within Himself all that the law demands for the justification of such as embrace Him, whether Jew or Gentile (Galatians, 3, 24). 5-10. For Moses describeth the righteousness which is of the law. That the man that doeth ('hath done') these things (which it commands) shall live in them—(Leviticus, 25, 5.) This is the one way of justification and life—by "the righteousness which is of (or, by our own obedience to) the law." But the (justifying) righteousness which is of faith speaketh on this wise ('speaketh thus')—its language or import is to this effect (quoting in substance Deuteronomy, 30, 13, 14), Say not in thine heart, Who shall ascend into heaven? that is, to bring Christ down, &c.—q. d., 'Ye have not to sigh over the impossibility of attaining to justification; as if one should say, Ah! if I could but get some one to mount up to heaven and fetch me down Christ, there might be some hope, but since that cannot be, mine is a desperate case.' or, Who shall descend, &c.—another case of impossibility, suggested by Proverbs, 30, 4, and perhaps also Amos, 9, 2—probably proverbial expressions of impossibility (cf. Psalm 139, 7-10; Proverbs, 24, 7, &c.) But what saith it? (It saith)—continuing the quotation from Deuteronomy, 30, 14. The word is high thee—easily accessible, in thy mouth—when thou confessest Him, and in thine heart—when thou believest on Him. Though it is of the law which Moses more immediately speaks in the passage quoted, yet it is of the law as Israel shall be brought to look upon it when the Lord their God shall circumcise their heart "to love the Lord their God with all their heart," &c. (s. 6) and thus, in applying it, the apostle (as Oshaneu truly observes) is not merely appropriating the language of Moses, but keeping in the line of his deeper thought, that is, the word of faith, which we preach—the remembrance of the simplicity, reasonableness, and absolute freeness of God's plan of salvation overwhelm those that perish from under the sound of it (v. 4-13). (5.) How piercingly and perpetually should that question—"How SHALL THEY HEAR WITHOUT A PREACHER?"—sound in the ears of all the churches, as but the apostolic echo of their Lord's parting injunction, "PREACH THE GOSPEL TO EVERY CREATURE" (Mark, 16, 15), and how far below the proper standard of love, zeal, and self-sacrifice, must the churches as yet be, when with so plentiful a harvest the labourers are yet so few (Matthew, 9, 37, 38), and that cry from the lips of pardoned, gifted, consecrated men—"Here am I, send me" (Isaiah, 6, 8), is not heard every where (v. 14, 15)! (6.) The blessing of a covenant-relation to God is the irrevocable privilege of no people and no church: it can be preserved only by fidelity, on our part to the covenant itself (v. 19). (7.) God is often found by those who apparently are the farthest from Him, while He remains undiscovered by those who think themselves the nearest (v. 20, 21). (8.) God's dealings even with reprobate sinners are full of tenderness and compassion; all the day long extending the arms of His mercy even to the disobedient and gainsaying. This will be felt and acknowledged at last by all who perish, to the glory of God's forbearance, and to their own confusion (v. 21).

CHAPTER XI.

VER. 1-36. SAME SUBJECT CONTINUED AND CONCLUDED.—THE ULTIMATE INBRINGING OF ALL ISRAEL, TO BE, WITH THE GENTILES, ONE KINGDOM OF GOD ON THE EARTH. 1. I say then, HATH ('DID') GOD cast away his people? God forbid—Our Lord did indeed announce that "the kingdom of God should be taken from Israel" (Matthew, 21, 41); and when asked by the eleven, after His resurrection, if he would at that time "restore the kingdom to Israel," His reply is a virtual admission that Israel was in some sense already out of covenant (Acts, 1, 9). Yet here the apostle teaches that, in two respects, Israel was not "cast away." First, Not totally; Second, Not finally. First, Israel is not wholly cast away, for I also am an Israelite (see Philippians, 3, 5)—and so a living witness to the contrary, of the seed of Abraham—of pure descent from the father of the faithful, of the tribe of Benjamin (Philippians, 3, 5)—that tribe which, on the revolt of the ten tribes, constituted, with Judah, the one faithful kingdom of God (1 Kings, 12, 21), and after the captivity was, along with Judah, the kernel of the Jewish nation (Ezra, 4, 1; 10, 9). 2-4. God hath ('did') not cast away his people (i.e., wholly) which he foreknew—On the word "foreknew," see on ch. 8, 29. Wot (i.e., 'know') ye not that the Scripture saith of (lit., 'in,' i.e., in the section which relates to) Elias? how he maketh intercession ('pleadeth') against Israel—(The word "saying" which follows, as also the particle "and" before "digged down," should be omitted, as without MSS. authority). and I am left alone—I only am left, seven thousand, that have not bowed the knee to Baal—not "the image of Baal," according to the supplement of our version. 5. Even so at this present time—"in this present season," this period of Israel's rejection. (See Acts, 1, 7, Greek.) There is—"there obtains," or "hath remained," a remnant according to the election of grace—q.d., "As in Elijah's time the apostasy of Israel was not so universal as it seemed to be, and as he in his despondency concluded it to be, so now, the rejection of Christ by Israel is not so appalling in extent as one would be apt to think: There is now, as there was then, a faithful remnant; not however of persons naturally better than the unbelieving mass, but of persons graciously chosen to salvation." (See 1 Corinthians, 4, 7; 2 Thessalonians, 2, 13.) This establishes our view of the argument on Election in ch. 9., as not being an Election of Gentiles in the room of Jews, and merely to religious advantages, but a sovereign choice of some of Israel itself, from amongst others, to believe and be saved. (See on ch. 9, 6.) 6. And, &c.—better, 'Now if it (the election) be by grace, it is no more of works; for (then) grace becomes no more grace: but if it be of works,' &c. (The authority of ancient MSS. against this latter clause, as superfluous and not originally in the text, though strong, is not sufficient, we think, to justify its exclusion. Such seeming redundancies are not unusual with our apostle.) The general position here laid down is of vital importance: That there are but two possible sources of salvation—men's works, and God's grace; and that these are so essentially distinct and opposite, that salvation cannot be of any combination or mixture of both, but must be wholly either of the one or of the other. (See on ch. 4., note 5.) 7-10. What then?—How stands the fact? Israel hath not obtained that which he seeketh for—better, 'What Israel is in search of (i.e., Justification, or acceptance with God—see on ch. 9, 31), this he found not; but the election (the elect remnant of Israel) found it, and the rest were hardened,' or judicially given over to the 'hardness of their own hearts,' as it is written (Isaiah, 29, 19, and Deuteronomy, 29, 4), God hath given ('gave') them the spirit of slumber ('stupor')... unto this ('this present') day. And David saith—Psalm 69, 23—which in such a Messianic psalm must be meant of the rejecters of Christ. Let their table, &c.—i.e., Let their very blessings prove a curse to them, and their enjoyments only sting and take vengeance on them, let their eyes be darkened... and bend down their back away—expressive either of the deceitfulness, or of the servile condition, to come on the nation through the just judgment of God. The apostle's object in making these quotations is to show that what he had been compelled to say of the then condition and prospects of his nation was more than borne out by their own Scriptures. But, SECONDLY, God hath not cast away his people finally. The illustration of this point extends from v. 11 to v. 31. 11. I say then, Have they stumbled ('Did they stumble') that they should fall? God forbid; but (the supplement "rather" is better omitted) through their fall—lit., 'trespass,' but here best rendered 'false step' [DE WETTE]; not "fall," as in our version, salvation is come to the Gentiles, to provoke them to jealousy—Here, as also in ch. 10, 19 (quoted from Deuteronomy, 32, 21), we see that Emulation is a legitimate stimulus to what is good. 12. Now if the fall of them ('But if their trespass,' or 'false step') be the riches of the (Gentile) world—as being the occasion of their accession to Christ, and the diminishing of them (i.e., the reduction of the true Israel to so small a remnant) the riches of the Gentiles; how much more their fulness!—i.e., their full recovery (see on v. 26); q.d., 'If an event so untoward as Israel's fall was the occasion of such unspeakable good to the Gentile world, of how much greater good may we expect an event so blessed as their full recovery to be productive?' 13. I speak ('am speaking') to you Gentiles—another proof that this Epistle was addressed to Gentile believers. (See on ch. 1, 13.) I magnify ('glorify') mine office—The clause beginning with "inasmuch" should be read as a parenthesis. If I may provoke, &c. (see on v. 11)... my flesh—cf. Isaiah, 58, 7, 15. For if the casting away of them—The apostle had denied that they were cast away (v. 1); here he affirms it. But both are true: they were cast away, though neither totally nor finally, and it is of this partial and temporary rejection that the apostle here speaks. . . be the reconciling of the (Gentile) world, what shall the receiving of them be, but life from the dead?—The reception of the whole family of Israel, scattered as they are among all nations under heaven, and the most inveterate enemies of the Lord Jesus, will be such a stupendous manifestation of the power of God upon the spirits of men, and of His glorious presence with the heralds of the Cross, as will not only kindle devout astonishment far and wide, but so change the dominant mode of thinking and feeling on all spiritual things as to seem like a resurrection from the dead. 16. For ('But') if the first-fruit be holy the lump is also (holy); and if the root, so the branches.—The Israelites were required to offer to God the first-fruits of the earth—both in their raw state, in a sheaf of newly reaped grain (Leviticus, 23, 10, 11), and in their prepared state, made into cakes of dough (Numbers, 15, 19-21)—by which the whole produce of that season was regarded as hallowed. It is probable the latter of these offerings that is here intended, as to it the word "lump" best applies; and the argument of the apostle is, that as the separation unto God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, from the rest of mankind, as the parent stem of their race, was as real an offering of first-fruit as that which hallowed the produce of the earth, so, in the divine estimation, it was as real a separation of the mass or "lump" of that nation in all time to God. The figure of the "root" and its "branches" is of like import—the consecration of the one of them extending to the other. 17, 18. And if—rather, 'But if' q.d., 'if notwithstanding this consecration of Abraham's race to God.' some of the branches—The mass of the unbelieving and rejected Israelites are here called "some," not, as before, to meet Jewish prejudice (see on ch. 3, 3, and on "not all" in ch. 10, 16), but with the opposite view of checking Gentile pride. and thou, being a wild olive, wert ('wast') grafted in among them.—Though it is more usual to graft the superior cutting upon the inferior stem, the opposite method, which is intended here, is not without example. and with them partakest ('wast made partaker'—along with the branches left, the believing remnant; of the root and fatness of the olive tree (the rich grace secured by covenant to the true seed of Abraham); boast not against the (rejected) branches. But if thou (do) boast, remember that) thou bearest not ('is not thou that bearest') the root, but the root thee—q.d., 'If the branches may not boast over the root that bears them, then may not the Gentile boast over the seed of Abraham; for what is thy standing, O Gentile, in relation to Israel, but that of a branch in relation to the root? from Israel hath come all that thou art and hast in the family of God: for "salvation is of the Jews" (John, 4, 22), 19-21. Thou wilt say then (as a plea for boasting). The branches were broken off, that I might be grafted in. Well—(q.d., 'Be it so, but remember that') because of unbelief they were broken off, and thou standest (not as a Gentile, but solely) by faith.—But as faith cannot live in those "whose soul is lifted up" (Habakkuk, 2, 4). Be not high-minded, but fear (Proverbs, 28, 14; Philippians, 2, 12): for if God spared not the natural branches (sprung from the parent stem), take heed lest he also spare not thee (a mere wild graft)—The former might, beforehand, have been thought very improbable; but, after that, no one can wonder at the latter. 22, 23. Behold therefore the goodness and severity of God: on them which fall, severity (in rejecting the chosen seed); but toward thee, goodness ('God's goodness' is the true reading)—i.e., His sovereign goodness in admitting thee to a covenant-standing who before wert a "stranger to the covenants of promise" (Ephesians, 2, 12-20). if thou continue in his goodness—in believing dependence on that pure goodness which made thee what thou art, otherwise, &c. . . . And they also ('Ye and they'), if they abide not still in unbelief, shall be grafted in: for God is able to graft them in again.—This appeal to the power of God to effect the recovery of His ancient people implies the vast difficulty of it—which all who have ever laboured for the conversion of the Jews are made depressingly to feel. That intelligent expositors should think that this was meant of individual Jews, re-introduced from time to time into the family of God on their believing on the Lord Jesus, is surprising; and yet those who deny the national recovery of Israel must and do so interpret the apostle. But this is to confound the two things which the apostle carefully distinguishes. Individual Jews have been at all times admissible, and have been admitted, to the Church through the gate of faith in the Lord Jesus. This is the "remnant, even of this present time, according to the election of grace," of which the apostle, in the first part of the chapter, had cited himself as one. But here he manifestly speaks of something not then existing, but to be looked forward to as a great future event in the economy of God, the re-grafting of the nation as such, when they "abide not in unbelief." And though this is here spoken of merely as a supposition (if their unbelief shall cease)—in order to set it over against the other supposition, of what will happen to the Gentiles if they shall not abide in the faith—the supposition is turned into an explicit prediction in the verses following. 24. For if thou wert out ('wert out of') from the olive tree, which is wild by nature, and wast grafted contrary to nature into a good olive tree; how much more shall these, &c.—This is just the converse of v. 21: 'As the excision of the merely engrafted Gentiles through unbelief is a thing much more to be expected than was the excision of the natural Israel, before it happened; so the restoration of Israel, when they shall be brought to believe in Jesus, is a thing far more in the line of what we should expect, than the admission of the Gentiles to a standing which they never before enjoyed.' 25. For I would not... that ye should be ignorant of this mystery.—The word "mystery," so often used by our apostle, does not mean (as with us) something incomprehensible, but "something before kept secret, either wholly or for the most part, and now only fully disclosed" (cf. ch. 16, 25; 1 Corinthians, 2, 7-10; Ephesians, 1, 9, 10; 3, 2-6, 9, 10, &c.). Let ye should be wise in your own conceits—as if ye alone were in all time coming to be the family of God, that blindness ("hardness") in part is happened to ('hath come upon') Israel—i.e., hath come partially, or upon a portion of Israel, until the fulness of the Gentiles be ('have') come in—i.e., not the general conversion of the world to Christ, as many take it; for this would seem to contradict the latter part of this chapter, and throw the national recovery of Israel too far into the future: besides, in v. 16, the apostle seems to speak of the receiving of Israel, not as following, but as contributing largely to bring about the general conversion of the world—but, "until the Gentiles have had their full time of the visible Church all to themselves, while the Jews are out which the Jews had till the Gentiles were brought in." See Luke, 21, 24, 26, 27. And so all Israel shall be saved.—To understand this great statement, as some still do, merely of such a gradual ingathering of individual Jews, that there shall at length remain none in unbelief, is to do manifest violence both to it and to the whole context. It can only mean the ultimate ingathering of Israel as a nation, in contrast with the present "remnant." [So THOLUCK, MEYER, DE WETTE, PHILIPPI, ALFORD, HODGE.] Three confirmations of this now follow: two from the prophets, and a third from the Abrahamic covenant itself. First, as it is written, There shall come out of Zion the Deliverer, and shall (or, according to what seems the true reading, without the "and"—"He shall") turn away ungodliness from Jacob.—The apostle, having drawn his illustrations of man's sinfulness chiefly from Psalm 14, and Isaiah, 60., now seems to combine the language of the same two places regarding Israel's salvation from it. [BENGEL.] In the one place the Psalmist longs to see "the salvation of Israel coming out of Zion" (Psalm 14, 7); in the other, the prophet announces that "the Redeemer (or, "Deliverer") shall come to us, (Isaiah, 60, 20). But as all the glorious manifestations of Israel's God were regarded as issuing out as the seat of His manifested glory (Psalm 20, Isaiah, 31, 9), the turn which the apostle gives adds merely to them that familiar ideas, reads the prophet announces, that He "shall or, 'for' them that turn from transgression," while the apostle makes him say that He is "to turn away ungodliness from Jacob," seen from the LXX. version, and seems to indicate a different reading of the original text. The answer, is substantially the same in both. It is—rather, 'and' (again); introducing a new covenant—this is my covenant with them (it, 'this is my covenant from me unto them') when I shall take away ungodliness from Jacob. This is the covenant which I shall make with the house of Israel, says the Lord. Jeremiah, 31, 31-34, than the express words of election. Those who believe that there are no changes regarding the literal Israel in the Old Testament, that stretch beyond the end of the Jewish dispensation, are obliged to view these quotations by the apostle as mere adaptations of Old Testament language, and his own predictions [ALEXANDER on Isaiah, 41, 16] how forced this is, we shall presently see. Concerning the gospel, they are enemies for your sake; they are regarded and treated as enemies in consequence of their exclusion through unbelief, from the family of Israel, for the benefit of you Gentiles; in the sense of the apostle, but as touching the election of Abraham and Isaac, they are beloved—even in their state of exclusion for the fathers' sake. For the gifts and calling (and the election) of God are without repentance ("not to be, or to be repented of")—By "the calling of God," in the apostle, is meant that sovereign act by which God, in His free choice, "called" Abraham, father of a peculiar people; while "the gifts" here denote the articles of the covenant which He made with Abraham, and which constituted the election between his and all other families of the world. Both these, says the apostle, are irrevocable, as the point for which he refers to this at all in the epistle to the Romans, is the clear destiny of the Israelitish nation, it is clear that it is the thing here affirmed. And lest any one should say that though Israel, as a nation, has no part in all under the gospel, but as a people dispersed in the midst when the middle wall of partition was broken down, yet the Abrahamic covenant was in the spiritual seed of Abraham, made with Jews and Gentiles in one undistinguished mass of men under the gospel—the apostle, as if to do that supposition, expressly states that the Jews who, as concerning the gospel, are regarded as enemies for the Gentiles' sake, are "beloved for the fathers' sake;" and it is in proof of this that he refers to the gifts and the calling of God are without repentance. But in what sense are the now unbelieving children of Israel "beloved for the fathers' sake?" Not merely from ancestral recollection looks with fond interest on the child of a friend and for that friend's sake [DR. ARNOLD]—a thought, and not foreign to Scripture, in this text (see 2 Chronicles, 20, 7; Isaiah, 41, 8)—but from ancestral connections and obligations, or from descent from and oneness in covenant with those with whom God originally established it. The words, the natural Israel—not "the remnant" according to the election of grace, but the people sprung from Abraham according to the flesh, an elect people, and as such, "beloved," same love, which chose the fathers, and rested there as a parent stem of the nation, still rests on descendants at large, and will yet recover them from their alienation, and reinstate them in the family of God, as ye in times past have not believed (or,

'obeyed') God—that is, yielded not to God "the obedience of faith," while strangers to Christ, yet now have obtained mercy through (by occasion of) their unbelief—(see on v. 11, 18, 29). even so have these (the Jews) now not believed (or, 'now been disobedient'), that through your mercy (the mercy shown to you) they also may obtain mercy—Here is an entirely new idea. The apostle has hitherto dwelt upon the unbelief of the Jews as making way for the faith of the Gentiles—the exclusion of the one occasioning the reception of the other; a truth yielding to generous, believing Gentiles but mingled satisfaction. Now, opening a more cheering prospect, he speaks of the mercy shown to the Gentiles as a means of Israel's recovery; which seems to mean that it will be by the instrumentality of believing Gentiles that Israel as a nation is at length to "look on Him whom they have pierced and mourn for Him," and so to "obtain mercy." (See 2 Corinthians, 3, 16, 18.) 32. For God hath concluded them all in unbelief ("hath shut them all up to unbelief") that he might have mercy upon all—i.e., those "all" of whom he had been discoursing; the Gentiles first, and after them the Jews. [FRITZSCHE, THOLUCK, OLSHAUSEN, DE WETTE, PHILIPPI, STUART, HODGE.] Certainly it is not 'all mankind individually' [MEYER, ALFORD]; for the apostle is not here dealing with individuals, but with those great divisions of mankind, Jew and Gentile. And what he here says is, that God's purpose was to shut up each of these divisions of men to the experience first of an unhumiliated, condemned state, without Christ, and then to the experience of His mercy in Christ. 33. O the depth, &c.—The apostle now yields himself up to the admiring contemplation of the grandeur of that divine plan which he had sketched out, of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God—Many able expositors render this, 'of the riches and wisdom and knowledge,' &c. [ERASMUS, GROTIUS, BENGEL, MEYER, DE WETTE, THOLUCK, OLSHAUSEN, FRITZSCHE, PHILIPPI, ALFORD. REVISED VERSION.] The words will certainly bear this sense, "the depth of God's riches." But "the riches of God" is a much rarer expression with our apostle than the riches of this or that perfection of God; and the words immediately following limit our attention to the unsearchableness of God's "judgments," which probably means His decrees or plans (Psalm 119, 75), and of "His ways," or the method by which He carries these into effect. [SO LUTHER, CALVIN, BEZA, HODGE, &c.] Besides, all that follows to the end of the chapter seems to show that while the Grace of God to guilty men in Christ Jesus is presupposed to be the whole theme of this chapter, that which called forth the special admiration of the apostle, after sketching at some length the divine purposes and methods in the bestowment of this Grace, was "the depth of the riches of God's wisdom and knowledge," in these purposes and methods. The "wisdom," then, points probably to the vast sweep of divine comprehension herein displayed; the "wisdom" to that fitness to accomplish the ends intended, which is stamped on all this procedure. 34, 35. For who hath known the mind of the Lord?—see Job, 15, 8; Jeremiah, 23, 18. or who hath been his counsellor—see Isaiah, 40, 13, 14. or, who hath first given to him, and it shall be recompensed to him ("and shall have recompense made to him") again—see Job, 35, 7, and 41, 11. These questions, it will thus be seen, are just quotations from the Old Testament, as if to show how familiar to God's ancient people was the great truth which the apostle himself had just uttered, that God's plans and methods in the dispensation of His Grace, have a reach of comprehension and wisdom stamped upon them which finite mortals cannot fathom, much less could ever have imagined, before they were disclosed. 36. For of him, and through him, and to him, are all things: to whom ("to Him") be glory for ever. Amen.—Thus worthily—with a brevity only equalled by its sublimity—does the apostle here sum up this whole matter. "Or Him are all things," as their eternal Source: "THROUGH Him are all things," inasmuch as He brings all to pass which in His eternal counsels He purposed: "To Him are all things," as being His own last End; the manifestation of the glory of His own perfections being the ultimate, because the highest possible, design of all His procedure from first to last.—On this rich chapter, Notes (L) it is an unspeakable consolation to know that in times of deepest religious declension and most extensive defection from the truth, the lamp of God has never been permitted to go out, and that a faithful remnant has ever existed—a remnant larger than their own drooping spirits could easily believe (v. 1-4). (1.) The preservation of this remnant, even as their separation at the first, is all of mere grace (v. 4, 5). (2.) When individuals and communities, after many fruitless warnings, are abandoned of God, they go from bad to worse (v. 7-10). (3.) God has so ordered his dealings with the great divisions of mankind, "that no flesh should glory in His presence." Gentile and Jew have each in turn been "shut up to unbelief," that each in turn may experience the "mercy which saves the chief of sinners" (v. 11-32). (4.) As we are "justified by faith," so are we "kept by the power of God through faith"—faith alone—unto salvation (v. 20-32). (5.) God's covenant with Abraham and his natural seed is a perpetual covenant, in equal force under the gospel as before it. Therefore it is, that the Jews as a nation still survive, in spite of all the laws which, in similar circumstances, have either extinguished or destroyed the identity of other nations. And therefore it is that the Jews as a nation will yet be restored to the family of God, through the subjection of their proud hearts to Him whom they have pierced. And as believing Gentiles will be honoured to be the instruments of this stupendous change, so shall the vast Gentile world reap such benefit from it, that it shall be like the communication of life to them from the dead. (7.) Thus has the Christian Church the highest motive to the establishment and vigorous prosecution of Missions to the Jews: God having not only promised that there shall be a remnant of them gathered in every age, but pledged Himself to the final ingathering of the whole nation, assigned the honour of that ingathering to the Gentile Church, and assured them that the event, when it does arrive, shall have a life-giving effect upon the whole world (v. 12-16, 28-31). (8.) Those who think that in all the evangelical prophecies of the Old Testament the terms "Jacob," "Israel," &c. are to be understood solely of the Christian Church, would appear to read the Old Testament differently from the apostle, who, from the use of those very terms in Old Testament prophecy, draws arguments to prove that God has mercy in store for the natural Israel (v. 26, 27). (9.) Mere intellectual investigations into divine truth in general, and the sense of the living oracles in particular, as they have a hardening effect, so they are a great contrast to the spirit of our apostle, whose lengthened sketch of God's majestic procedure towards men in Christ Jesus ends here in a burst of admiration, which loses itself in the still loftier frame of adoration (v. 33-36).

CHAPTER. XII.

VER. 1-31. DUTIES OF BELIEVERS, GENERAL AND PARTICULAR. The doctrinal teaching of this epistle is now followed up by a series of exhortations to practical duty. And first, the all-comprehensive duty. 1. I beseech you therefore—In view of all that has been advanced in the foregoing part of this epistle, by the nature of God—those mercies, whose free and unmerited nature, glorious Channel, and saving fruits have been opened up at such length, that ye present—See on ch. 6, 12, where we have the same exhortation and the same word, there rendered "yield" (as also in v. 16, 19, your bodies—i.e., "yourselves in the body," considered as the organ of the inner life. As it is through the body that all the evil that is in the unrenewed heart comes forth into palpable manifestation and action, so it is through the body that all the gracious principles and affections of believers reveal themselves in the outward life.—Sanctification extends to the whole man (1 Thessalonians, 4, 23, 24), a living sacrifice—in glorious contrast to the legal sacrifices, which, save as they were aisin, were no sacrifices at all. The death of the one "Lamb of God, taking away the sin of the world," has swept all dead victims from off the altar of God, to make room for the redeemed themselves as "living sacrifices" to Him who made "Him to be sin for us"; while every outpouring of their grateful hearts in praise, and every act prompted by the love of Christ, is itself a sacrifice to God of a sweet-smelling savour (Hebrews, 12, 15, 16). holy—As the Levitical victims, when offered without blemish to God, were regarded as holy, as believers, "yielding themselves to God as those that are alive from the dead, and their members as instruments of righteousness unto God, are, in His estimation, not ritually but really, "holy," and so, acceptable ("well-pleasing") unto God—not as the Levitical offerings, merely as appointed symbols of spiritual ideas, but objects, intrinsically, of divine complacency, in their renewed character, and endeared relationship to Him through His Son Jesus Christ, which is your reasonable rather, "rational," service—in contrast, not to the senselessness of idol-worship, but to the offering of irrational victims under the law. In this view the presentation of ourselves, as living monuments of redeeming mercy, is here called "our rational service," and surely it is the most rational and exalted occupation of God's reasonable creatures. So, 1 Peter, 2, 5, "to offer up spiritual sacrifices, acceptable to God through Jesus Christ," and be ye not conformed to this world (cf. Ephesians, 2, 2; Galatians, 1, 4, Greek; but be ye transformed—or, "transfigured," as in Matthew, 17, 2; and 2 Corinthians, 3, 18, Greek), by the renewing of your mind—not by a mere outward conformity to the ungodly world, many of whose actions in themselves may be virtuous and praiseworthy; but by such an inward spiritual transformation as makes the whole life new—new in its motives and ends, even where the actions differ in nothing from those of the world—new, considered as a whole, and in such a sense as to be wholly unattainable save through the constraining power of the love of Christ, that ye may prove—i.e., experimentally. See on the word "experience" in ch. 6, 4, and cf. 1 Thessalonians, 5, 10, where the sentiment is the same). what is that ('the') good and acceptable ('well-pleasing'), and perfect will of God—We prefer this rendering [with CALVIN, REVISED VERSION, &c.] to that which many able critics [HOLMCK, MEYER, DE WETTE, FRITZSCHE, PHILIPPI, ALFORD, HODGE] adopt—that ye may prove, or "discern the will of God, (even) what is good, and acceptable, and perfect." God's will is "good," as it demands only what is essentially and unchangeably good (ch. 7, 10); it is "well-pleasing," in contrast with all that is arbitrary, as demanding only what God has eternal complacency in—cf. Micah, 6, 8, with Jeremiah, 9, 24; and it is "perfect," as it requires nothing else than the perfection of God's reasonable creature, who, in proportion as he attains to it, reflects God's own perfection. Such then is the great general duty of the redeemed—SELF-DEDICATION, in our whole spirit and soul and body, to Him who hath called us into the fellowship of His Son Jesus Christ. Next follow specific duties, chiefly social; beginning with Humility, the chiefest of all the graces—but here with special reference to spiritual gifts. 3. For I say authoritatively, through the grace given unto me—as an apostle of Jesus Christ; thus ex-emphyring his own precept by modestly falling back on that office which both warranted and required such plainness towards all classes, to every man that is among you, not to think, &c.—It is impossible to convey in good English the emphatic play, so to speak, which each word here has upon another:—'not to be high-minded above what he ought to be minded, but so to be minded as to be sober-minded.' [CALVIN, ALFORD.] This is merely a strong way of characterising all undue self-elevation, according as God hath dealt to every man the measure of faith—Faith is here viewed as the inlet to all the other graces, and so, as the receptive faculty of the renewed soul—2d., 'As God hath given to each his particular capacity to take in the gifts and graces which He designs for the general good.' 4. 3. For as we have many members, &c.—The same diversity and yet unity obtains in the body of Christ, whoseof all believers are the several members, as in the natural body. 6-8. Having then gifts differing according to the graces given to us—Here, let it be observed, all the gifts of believers alike are viewed as communications of mere graces, whether (we have the gift of prophecy—i.e., of inspired teaching; as in Acts, 15. 32. Anyone speaking with divine authority—whether with reference to the past, the present, or the future—was termed a prophet (Exodus, 7. 1, &c.). [let us prophesy] according to the proportion of faith—rather, 'of our faith.' Many Romish expositors and some Protestant (as Calvin and Bengel, and, though hesitatingly, Besa and Fodge), render this 'the analogy of faith,' understanding by it 'the general tenor' or 'rule of faith,' divinely delivered to men for their guidance. But this is against the context, whose object is to show that, as all the gifts of believers are according to their respective capacity for them, they are not to be puffed up on account of them, but to use them purely for their proper ends, or ministry, [let us wait] on 'be occupied with' our ministering—The word here used imports any kind of service, from the dispensing of the word of life (Acts, 6. 4. to the administering of the temporal affairs of the Church (Acts, 6. 1-3). The latter seems intended here, being distinguished from "prophesying," "teaching," and "exhorting," or he that teacheth—Teachers are expressly distinguished from prophets, and put after them, as exercising a lower function (Acts, 13. 1; 1 Corinthians, 12. 28, 29). Probably it consisted mainly in opening up the evangelical bearings of Old Testament scripture; and it was in this department apparently that Apollus showed his power and eloquence (Acts, 18. 24), or he that exhorteth—Since all preaching—whether by apostles, prophets, or teachers—was followed up by exhortation (Acts, 11. 23; 14. 22; 15. 32, &c.), many think that no specific class is here in view. But if liberty was given to others to exercise themselves occasionally in exhorting either the brethren generally, or small parties of the less instructed, the reference may be to them. he that giveth—in the exercise of private benevolence probably, rather than in the discharge of disocial duty, with simplicity—So the word probably means. But, as simplicity seems enjoined in the next clause but one of this same verse, perhaps the meaning here is, 'with liberality,' as the same word is rendered in 2 Corinthians, 8. 2; 9. 11. he that reuleth—whether in the church or his own household. See 1 Timothy, 3. 4, 5, where the same word is applied to both, 'with diligence—with earnest purpose, he that showeth mercy, with cheerfulness—not only without grudging either trouble or pecuniary relief, but feeling it to be "more blessed to give than to receive," and to help, than be helped. 9. Let love be without dissimulation—"Let your love be unfeigned," as in 2 Corinthians, 6. 8; 1 Peter, 2. 22; and see 1 John, 3. 18. Abhor that which is evil; cleave to that which is good—What a lofty tone of moral principle and feeling is here inculcated! It is not, Abstain from the one, and do the other; nor, Turn away from the one, and draw to the other; but, Abhor the one, and cling, with deepest sympathy, to the other. 10. Be, &c.—better, 'In brotherly love be affectionate one to another; in [giving or showing] honour, outdoing each other.' The word rendered 'prefer' means rather 'to go before,' 'take the lead,' i.e., 'show an example.' How opposite is this to the reigning morality of the heathen world; and though Christianity has so changed the spirit of society, that a certain beautiful disinterestedness and self-sacrifice shines in the character of not a few who are but partially, if at all under the transforming power of the gospel, it is only those whom "the love of Christ constrains to live not unto themselves," who are capable of thoroughly acting in the spirit of this precept. 11. not slothful in business—The word rendered "business" means 'zeal,' 'diligence,' 'purpose,' denoting the energy of action, serving the Lord—i.e., the Lord Jesus (see Ephesians, 6. 6-8). Another reading—'serving the time,' or 'the occasion'—which differs in form but very slightly from the received reading, has been adopted by good critics [LUTHER, OLSHAUSEN, FRITZSCHE, MEYER]. But as MS. authority is decidedly against it, so is internal evidence; and comparatively few favour it. Nor is the sense which it yields a very Christian one. 12. rejoicing, &c.—Here it is more lively to retain the order and the verbs of the original: 'In hope, rejoicing; in tribulation, enduring; in prayer, persevering.' Each of these exercises helps the other. If our "hope" of glory is so assured that it is a rejoicing hope, we shall find the spirit of "endurance in tribulation" natural and easy; but since it is "prayer" which strengthens the faith that begets hope, and lifts it up into an assured and joyful expectancy, and since our patience in tribulation is fed by this, it will be seen that all depends on our "perseverance in prayer." 13. given to hospitality—i.e., the entertainment of strangers. In times of persecution, and before the general institution of houses of entertainment, the importance of this precept would be at once felt. In the East, where such houses are still rare, this duty is regarded as of the most sacred character. [HONOR.] 14. Bless (i.e., Call down by prayer a blessing on) them which persecute you, &c.—This is taken from the sermon on the mount, which, from the allusions made to it, seems to have been the store-house of Christian morality among the churches. 15. Rejoice with them that rejoice; weep (the "and" should probably be omitted) with them that weep—What a beautiful spirit of sympathy with the joys and sorrows of others is here inculcated! But it is only one charming phase of the unselfish character which belongs to all living Christianity. What a world will our's be when this shall become its reigning spirit! Of the two, however, it is more easy to sympathise with another's sorrows than his joys, because in the one case he needs us; in the other not. But just for this reason the latter is the more disinterested, and so the nobler. 16. Be ("Being") of the same mind one toward another—The feeling of the common bond which binds all Christians to each other, whatever diversity of station, cultivation, temperament, or gifts may obtain among them, is the thing here enjoined. This is next taken up in detail. Mind not ("Not minding") high things—i.e., Cherish not ambitious or aspiring purposes and desires. As this springs from selfish severance of our own interests and objects from those of our brethren, so it is quite incompatible with the spirit inculcated in the preceding clause, but condescend ("conceding") to men of low estate—or (as some render the words), 'inclining unto the things that be lowly.' But we prefer the former. Be not wise in your own conceits—This is just the application of the caution against high-mindedness to the estimate we form of our own mental character. 17. Recompense ("Recompensing"), &c.—see on v. 14. Provide ("Provide

ing') things honest ('honourable') in the sight of all men.—The idea (which is from Proverbs, 3. 4) is the care which Christians should take so to demean themselves as to command the respect of all men. 18. If it be possible (i.e., if others will let you), as much as lieth in you (or, dependeth on you) live peaceably or, 'be at peace' with all men.—The impossibility of this in some cases is hinted at, to keep up the hearts of those who, having done their best unsuccessfully to live in peace, might be tempted to think the failure was necessarily owing to themselves. But how emphatically expressed is the injunction to let nothing on our part prevent it! Would that Christians were guiltless in this respect! 19-21. avenged not, &c.—see on v. 14. but [rather] give place unto wrath—This is usually taken to mean, 'but give room or space for wrath to spend itself.' But as the context shows that the injunction is to leave vengeance to God, "wrath" here seems to mean, not the offence, which we are tempted to avenge, but the avenging wrath of God (see 2 Chronicles, 24. 13), which we are enjoined to await, or give room for. (So the best interpreters.) If thine enemy hunger, &c.—This is taken from Proverbs, 25. 21, 22, which without doubt supplied the basis of those lofty precepts on that subject which form the culminating point of the sermon on the mount. In so doing thou shalt heap coals of fire on his head—As the heaping of "coals of fire" is in the Old Testament the figurative expression of divine vengeance (Psalm 140. 10; 11. 6, &c.), the true sense of these words seem to be, "That will be the most effectual vengeance—a vengeance under which he will be slain to bend." (So ALFORD, HODGKIN, &c.) The next verse confirms this. Be not overcome of evil—for then you are the conquered party, but overcome evil with good—and then the victory is yours; you have subdued your enemy in the noblest sense.—Note (1.) The redeeming mercy of God in Christ is, in the souls of believers, the living spring of all holy obedience (v. 1). (2.) As redemption under the gospel is not by irrational victims, as under the law, but "by the precious blood of Christ" (1 Peter, 1. 18, 19, and, consequently, is not ritual but real, so the sacrifices which believers are now called to offer are all "living sacrifices"; and these—summed up in self-consecration to the service of God—are "holy and acceptable to God," making up together "our rational service" (v. 1). (3.) In this light, what are we to think of the so-called 'unbloody sacrifice of the mass, continually offered to God as a propitiation for the sins both of the living and the dead,' which the adherents of Rome's corrupt faith have been taught for ages to believe. Is the highest and holiest act of Christian worship—in direct opposition to the sublimely simple teaching which the Christians of Rome first received (v. 1)! (4.) Christians should not feel themselves at liberty to be conformed to the world, if only they avoid what is manifestly sinful; but rather, yielding themselves to the transforming power of the truth as it is in Jesus, they should strive to exhibit before the world an entire renovation of heart and life (v. 2). (5.) What God would have men to be, in all its beauty and grandeur, is for the first time really apprehended, when "written not with ink but with the Spirit of the living God, not on tables of stone but on the fleshy tables of the heart," 2 Corinthians, 3. 3 (v. 2). (6.) Self-sufficiency and lust of power are peculiarly unlovely in the vessels of mercy, whose respective graces and gifts are all a divine trust for behoof of the common body and of mankind at large (v. 3, 4). (7.) As forgetfulness of this has been the source of innumerable and unspeakable evils in the Church of Christ, so the faithful exercise by every Christian of his own peculiar office and gifts, and the loving recognition of those of his brethren, as all of equal importance in their own place, would put a new face upon the visible Church, to the vast benefit and comfort of Christians themselves and to the admiration of the world around them (v. 6-9). (8.) What would the world be, if it were filled with Christians having but one object in life, high above every other—to "serve the Lord"—and throwing into this service—"alacrity" in the discharge of all duties, and abiding "warmth of spirit" (v. 11)! (9.) O how far is even the living Church from exhibiting the whole character and spirit, so beautifully portrayed in the latter verses of this chapter (v. 12-21)! What need of a fresh baptism of the Spirit in order to this! And how "fair as the moon, clear as the sun, and terrible as an army with banners," will the Church become, when at length instinct with this Spirit! The Lord hasten it in its time!

CHAPTER XIII.

VER. 1-14. SAME SUBJECT CONTINUED.—POLITICAL AND SOCIAL RELATIONS.—MOTIVES. 1. 2. Let every soul—every man of you, be subject unto the higher powers or, 'submit himself to the authorities that are above him.' For there is no power ('no authority') but of God: the powers that are are ('have been') ordained of God. Whosoever therefore resisteth the power—'So that he that setteth himself against the authority,' resisteth the ordinance of God: and they that resist shall receive to themselves damnation—or, 'condemnation,' according to the old sense of that word; that is, not from the magistrature, but from God, whose authority in the magistrature is resisted. 3, 4. For rulers are not a terror to good works—to the good work, as the true reading appears to be, but to the evil... he beareth out the sword in vain—i.e., the symbol of the magistrature's authority to punish. 5. Wherefore ye must needs be subject, not only for wrath—for fear of the magistrature's vengeance, but also for conscience sake—from reverence for God's authority. It is of Magistracy in general, considered as a divine ordinance, that this is spoken; and the statement applies equally to all forms of government, from an unchecked despotism—such as flourished when this was written, under the Emperor Nero—to a pure democracy. The inalienable right of all subjects to endeavour to alter or improve the form of government under which they live is left untouched here. But since Christians were constantly charged with turning the world upside down, and since there certainly were elements enough in Christianity of moral and social revolution to give plausibility to the charge, and tempt noble spirits, crusaded under misgovernment, to take redress into their own hands, it was of special importance that the pacific, submissive, loyal spirit of those Christians who resided at the great seat of political power, should furnish a visible refutation of this charge. 6, 7. For, for this cause pay ye (rather, 'ye pay') tribute also—q.d., 'This is the reason why ye pay the contributions requisite for maintaining the civil government.' for they are God's ministers, attending continually upon ('to') this very thing. Render therefore to all their dues—From magistrates the apostle now comes to other officials, and from them to men related to us by whatever the tribute—land tax, custom—mercantile tax, super-revenue for superiors, honour—the respect due to persons of distinction. 8. One no man any thing, but to love one another—q.d., 'Acquit yourselves of all obligations except love, which is a debt that must remain ever due.' [HODGKIN.] for he that loveth another hath fulfilled the law—for the law itself is but love in manifold action, regarded as matter of duty. 9. For this, &c.—better thus: 'For [the commandments], Thou shalt not kill, Thou shalt not commit adultery, Thou shalt not steal, Thou shalt not covet, and whatever other commandment [there may be], it is summed up,' &c. (The clause, "Thou shalt not bear false witness," is wanting in all the most ancient MSS.) The apostle refers here only to the second table of the law, as love to our neighbour is what he is treating of. 10. Love worketh no ill to his (or, 'one's') neighbour; therefore, etc.—As love, from its very nature, studies and delights to please its object, its very existence is an effectual security against our wilfully injuring him. Next follow some general motives to the faithful discharge of all these duties. 11. And that—rather, 'And this' [do], knowing the time, that now it is high time—it., 'the hour has already come,' for us to awake out of sleep—of stupid, fatal indifference to eternal things, for now is our salvation—rather, 'the salvation,' or simply 'salvation,' nearer than when we (first) believed—This is in the line of all our Lord's teaching, which represents the decisive day of Christ's second appearing as at hand, to keep believers ever in the attitude of wakeful expectancy, but without reference to the chronological nearness or distance of that event. 12. The night [of evil] is far spent, the day [of consummated triumph over it] is at hand: let us therefore cast off [as a dress the works of darkness—all works holding of the kingdom and period of darkness, with which, as followers of the risen Saviour, our connection has been dissolved, and let us put on the armour of light—described at large in Ephesians, 6, 11-15. 13. Let us walk honestly [or 'becomingly,' 'seemingly'] as in the day—q.d., 'Men choose the night for their revels, but our night is past, for we are all the children of the light and of the day [1 Thessalonians, 5, 5]: let us therefore only do what is fit to be exposed to the light of such a day.' not in rioting and drunkenness—varied forms of intemperance; denoting revels in general, usually ending in intoxication, not in chambering and wantonness—varied forms of impurity; the one pointing to definite acts, the other more general, not in strife and envying—varied forms of that venomous feeling between man and man which reverses the law of love. 14. But—to sum up all in one word, put ye on the Lord Jesus Christ—in such wise that Christ only may be seen in you [see 2 Corinthians, 3, 3; Galatians, 3, 27; Ephesians, 4, 24], and make no provision [take no forethought] for the flesh, to [fulfil] the lusts [thereof]—q.d., 'direct none of your attention to the cravings of your corrupt nature, how you may provide for their gratification.'—Note (1.) How gloriously adapted is Christianity for human society in all conditions! As it makes war directly against no specific forms of government, so it directly recommends none. While its holy and benign principles secure the ultimate abolition of all iniquitous government, the reverence which it teaches for magistracy, under whatever form, as a divine institution, secures the loyalty and peaceableness of its disciples, amid all the turbulence and distractions of civil society, and makes it the highest interest of all States to welcome it within their pale, as in this as well as every other sense—"the salt of the earth, the light of the world" (v. 1-6). (2.) Christianity is the grand specific for the purification and elevation of all the social relations; inspiring a readiness to discharge all obligations, and most of all, implanting in its disciples that love which secures all men against injury from them, inasmuch as it is the fulfilling of the law (v. 6-10). (3.) The rapid march of the kingdom of God, the advanced stage of it at which we have arrived, and the ever-nearing approach of the perfect day—nearer to every believer the longer he lives—should quicken all the children of light to redeem the time, and, seeing that they look for such things, to be diligent, that they may be found of Him in peace, without spot and blameless (2 Peter, 3, 14). (4.) In virtue of 'the expulsive power of a new and more powerful affection,' the great secret of persevering holiness in all manner of conversation will be found to be "Christ IN us, the hope of glory" (Colossians, 1, 27), and Christ ON us, as the character in which alone we shall be able to shine before men (2 Corinthians, 3, 3) (v. 14).

CHAPTER XIV.

is the consideration due from stronger Christians to their weaker brethren; which is but the great law of love (treated of in ch. 13.) in one particular form. 1. Him that is weak is the faith—rather, 'in faith' i.e., not 'Him that is weak in the truth believed' [CALVIN, BEEA, ALFORD, &c.], but [as most interpreters agree], 'Him whose faith wants that firmness and breadth which would raise him above small scruples' (See on v. 22, 23.) receive ye—into cordial Christian fellowship, but not to doubtful disputations—rather perhaps, 'not to the deciding of doubts,' or 'scruples' i.e., not for the purpose of arguing him out of them: which indeed usually does the reverse; whereas to receive him to full brotherly confidence and cordial interchange of Christian affection is the most effectual way of drawing them off. Two examples of such scruples are here specified, touching Jewish meats and days. "The strong," it will be observed, are those who knew these to be abolished under the gospel; "the weak" are those who had scruples on this point. 2. One believeth that he may eat all things—See Acts, 10, 16. another, who is weak eateth herbs—restricting himself probably to a vegetable diet, for fear of eating what might have been offered to idols, and so would be unclean. (See 1 Corinthians, 8.) 3. Let not him that eateth despise [look down superciliously upon] him that eateth not; and let not him that eateth not judge [sit in judgment censoriously upon] him that eateth: for God hath received him—as one of His dear children, who in this matter acts not from laxity but religious principle. 4. Who art thou that judgest another man's [rather, 'another's'] servant?—i.e., CHRIST'S, as the whole context shows, especially v. 8, 9. Yes, &c.—'But he shall be made to stand, for God is able to make him stand' i.e., to make good his standing, not at the day of judgment, of which the apostle treats in v. 10, but in the true fellowship of the Church here, in spite of thy censures. 5. One man esteemeth one day above another: another esteemeth every day—The supplement "alike" should be omitted, as injuring the sense. Let every man be fully persuaded in his own mind—be guided in such matters by conscientious conviction. 6. He that regardeth the day, regardeth it to the Lord—the LORD CHRIST, as before; and he... not, to the Lord he doth not—each doing what he believes to be the Lord's will. He that eateth, eateth to the Lord, for he giveth God thanks; and he that eateth not, to the Lord he eateth not, and giveth God thanks—The one gave thanks to God for the flesh which the other scrupled to use; for conscience' sake, he restricted himself. From this passage about the observance of days, Alford unhappily infers that such language could not have been used if the sabbath-law had been in force under the gospel in any form. Certainly it could not, if the sabbath were merely one of the Jewish festival days; but it will not do to take this for granted merely because it was observed under the Mosaic economy. And certainly, if the Sabbath was more ancient than Judaism; if, even under Judaism, it was enshrined amongst the eternal sanctities of the Decalogue, uttered, as no other parts of Judaism were, amidst the terrors of Sinai; and if the Lawgiver Himself said of it when on earth, "The Son of man is LORD EVEN OF THE SABBATH DAY" (see Mark, 2, 28)—it will be hard to show that the apostle must have meant it to be ranked by his readers amongst those vanished Jewish festival days, which only "weakness" could imagine to be still in force, a weakness which those who had more light ought, out of love, merely to bear with. 7, 8. For none of us (Christians) liveth to himself—(see 2 Corinthians, 5, 14, 15), to dispose of himself or shape his conduct after his own ideas and inclinations, and no man ("and none"—of us Christians) dieth to himself. For whether we live, we live unto the Lord (the LORD CHRIST; see next verse); and whether we die, we die unto the Lord; whether we live therefore, or die, we are the Lord's—Nothing but the most vivid explanation of these remarkable words could make them endurable to any Christian ear, if Christ were a mere creature. For Christ is here—in the most emphatic terms, and yet in the most unimpassioned tone—held up as the supreme Object of the Christian's life, and of his death too; and that by the man whose horror of creature-worship was such, that when the poor Lycaonians would have worshipped himself, he rushed forth to arrest the deed, directing them to "the living God," as the only legitimate Object of worship (Acts, 14, 15). Nor does Paul teach this here, but rather appeals to it as a known and recognised fact, of which he had only to remind his readers. And since the apostle, when he wrote these words, had never been at Rome, he could only know that the Roman Christians would assent to this view of Christ, because it was the common teaching of all the accredited preachers of Christianity, and the common faith of all Christians. 9. For to this end Christ both, &c.—The true reading here is, 'To this end Christ died and lived [again] that he might be Lord both of the dead and [and of the] living—The grand object of His death was to acquire this absolute Lordship over His redeemed, both in their living and in their dying, as His of right. 10. But why, &c.—The original is more lively:—'But thou (the weaker believer), why judgest thou thy brother? And thou again (the stronger), why despisest thou thy brother?' for we shall all (the strong and the weak together) stand before the judgment seat of Christ—All the most ancient and best MSS. read here, 'the judgment seat of God.' The present reading doubtless crept in from 2 Corinthians, 5, 10, where "the judgment seat of Christ" occurs. But here "the judgment seat of God" equal sharpness in 1 Corinthians, 8, 1 tends to make any one violate his conscience the destruction of his soul; and he who willingly or no, to bring about the one aiding to accomplish the other. 16, 17. your good—i.e., this liberty of yours as to and days, well founded though it be, be for the evil it does to others. For the &—or, as we should say, Religion; i.e., the piety and blessedness for which Christians are united into a community of renewed men in dedication to God (cf. 1 Corinthians, 4, 20); to eat and drink ("eating and drinking"); but right peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost—a beautiful comprehensive division of living Christian's "righteousness"—has respect to God, to 'rectitude,' in its widest sense (as in Mt. 5, 20); the second—"peace"—has respect to concord among brethren (as in v. 19; cf. Ephesians, 4, 3; Colossians, 3, 14)—"joy in the Holy Ghost"—has respect to the Holy Ghost, that their joy may be as that of the blessed Agent who inspires them (cf. 1 Thessalonians, 1, 6). 18. For things—'in this,' meaning this threefold Christ—Here again observe how, though three things as a "kingdom of God," yet that we serve in so doing; the apostle from God to Christ as naturally as before to God—in a way to us inconceivable, been viewed as a mere creature (cf. 2 Cor. 13, 14) is acceptable to God, and approved of men—things which God delights in, and men a or a private opinion, of which the apostle : it is conviction as to what is the truth and God. If thou hast formed this conviction in of God, keep thyself in this frame before Of course this is not to be over-pressed, as if wrong to discuss such points at all with our brethren. All that is here condemned is such for small points as endangers Christian love. is he that condemneth not himself in that which reth—allows himself to do nothing, about the less of which he has scruples; does only what ther knows nor fears to be sinful. 23. And 'But' he that denoteth is damned—(see on the "damnation," ch. 13. 2). if he eat, because [is not of faith—see on the meaning of "faith" 22. for whatsoever is not of faith is sin—a maxim of importance in the Christian life.—Note me points in Christianity are unessential to a fellowship; so that though one may be in upon them, he is not on that account to be ex- sisting from the communion of the Church or is full confidence of those who have more light. distinction between essential and non-essential is denied by some who affect more than ordinary the honour and truth of God. But they must the question with our apostle. (2.) Acceptance of is the only proper criterion of right to Chris- tianity. Whom God receives, men cannot law- fully (v. 2, 4). (3.) As there is much self-pleasing in narrow standards of Christian fellowship, of the best preservatives against the temptation his will be found in the continual remembrance is the one Object for whom all Christians id to whom all Christians die: this will be such ; and exalted bond of union between the strong e weak as will overshadow all their lesser dif- fers and gradually absorb them (v. 7-9). (4.) The eration of the common judgment-seat at which ung and the weak shall stand together will be another preservative against the unlovely dis- to sit in judgment one on another (v. 10-12). w brightly does the supreme Divinity of Christ us in this chapter! The exposition itself super- rther illustration here. (5.) Though forbear- e a great Christian duty, indifference to the tion between truth and error is not thereby aged. The former is, by the lax, made an excuse ; latter. But our apostle, while teaching "the " to bear with "the weak," repeatedly intimates chapter where the truth really lay on the points tion, and takes care to call those who took the side "the weak" (v. 1, 2, 14). (7.) With what holy y ought the purity of the conscience to be id, since every deliberate violation of it is in- irdition (v. 15, 20)! Some, who seem to be ealous for the honour of certain doctrines than e souls of men, enervate this terrific truth by ; how it bears upon the 'Perseverance of the ' the advocates of that doctrine thinking it ary to explain away what is meant by "destroy- e work of God" (v. 20), and "destroying him for Christ died" (v. 15), for fear of the doctrinal uences of taking it nakedly; while the op- s of that doctrine are ready to ask, How could stle have used such language if he had believed uch a catastrophe was impossible? The true r to both lies in dismissing the question as im- ent. The apostle is enunciating a great and l principle in Christian Ethics—that the willful on of conscience contains within itself a self- ruction; or, to express it otherwise, that the lestruction of the work of God in the renewed nd, consequently, the loss of that soul for eter- seeds only the carrying out to its full effect of isolation of the conscience. Whether such effects do take place, in point of fact, the apostle gives not the most distant hint here; and therefore that point must be settled elsewhere. But, beyond all doubt, as the position we have laid down, is emphatically ex- pressed by the apostle, so the interests of all who call themselves Christians require to be proclaimed and pressed on every suitable occasion. (8.) Zeal for comparatively small points of truth is a poor substitute for the substantial and catholic and abiding realities of the Christian life (v. 17, 18). (9.) "Peace" amongst the followers of Christ is a blessing too precious to themselves, and, as a testimony to them that are with- out, too important, to be ruptured for trifles, even though some lesser truths be involved in these (v. 19, 20). Nor are those truths themselves disparaged or endangered thereby, but the reverse. (10.) Many things which are lawful are not expedient. In the use of any liberty, therefore, our question should be, not simply, Is this lawful? but even if so, Can it be used with safety to a brother's conscience?—How will it affect my brother's soul (v. 21)? It is permitted to no Christian to say with Cain, "Am I my brother's keeper?" (Genesis, 4. 9.) (11.) Whenever we are in doubt as to a point of duty—where abstinence is manifestly sin- less, but compliance not clearly lawful—the safe course is ever to be preferred, for to do otherwise is itself sin- ful. (12.) How excited and beautiful is the Ethics of Christianity—by a few great principles teaching us how to steer our course amidst practical difficulties, with equal regard to Christian liberty, love, and confidence!

CHAPTER. XV.

VER. 1-15. SAME SUBJECT CONTINUED AND CON- CLUDED. 1. We then that are strong—on such points as have been discussed, the abolition of the Jewish distinction of meats and days under the gospel. See on ch. 14. 14, 20. ought... not to please ourselves—ought to think less of what we may lawfully do than of how our conduct will affect others. 2, 3. Let every one of us (lay himself out to) please his neighbour, (not indeed for his mere gratification, but) for his good (with a view) to his edification. For even Christ pleased not (lived not to please) himself; but, as it is written (Psalm 69. 9), The reproaches, &c.—see Mark, 10. 42-45. 4. For whatsoever things were written aforetime were written for our learning ('instruction'); that we through, &c.—through the comfort and the patience of the Scriptures' might have hope—q. d., 'Think not that because such portions of Scripture relate immediately to Christ, they are inapplicable to you; for though Christ's sufferings, as a saviour, were exclusively His own, the motives that prompted them, the spirit in which they were endured, and the general principle involved in His whole work—self-sacrifice for the good of others—furnish our most perfect and beautiful model; and so all Scripture relating to these is for our instruction: And since the duty of forbearance, the strong with the weak, requires "patience," and this again needs "comfort," all those Scriptures which tell of patience and consolation, particularly of the patience of Christ, and of the consolation which sustained Him under it, are our appointed and appropriate nutriment, ministering to us "hope" of that blessed day when these shall no more be needed.' See on ch. 4. note 7. (For the same connection between "patience and hope," see on ch. 12. 12, and 1 Thessalonians, 1. 3.) 5, 6. Now the God of patience and consolation—Such beautiful names of God are taken from the graces which He inspires: as "the God of hope" (v. 13), "the God of peace" (v. 23), &c. grant you to be like minded ('of the same mind') according to Christ Jesus—It is not mere unanimity which the apostle seeks for them; for unanimity in evil is to be deprecated. But it is "according to Christ Jesus"—after the sublimest model of Him whose all-absorbing desire was to do, "not His own will, but the will of Him that sent Him" (John,

6. 39. that, &c.—rather, 'that with one accord ye may with one mouth glorify the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ'; the mind and the mouth of all giving harmonious glory to His name. What a prayer! And shall this never be realised on earth? 7. Wherefore—Returning to the point, receive ye one another to the glory of God?—If Christ received us, and bears with all our weaknesses, will may we receive and compassionate one with another, and by so doing God will be glorified. 8-12. Now—'For' is the true reading; the apostle is merely assigning an additional motive to Christian forbearance. I say that Jesus Christ was 'hath become' a minister of the circumcision—a remarkable expression, meaning 'the Father's Servant for the salvation of the circumcision or, of Israel,' for the truth of God—to make good the veracity of God towards His ancient people, to confirm the Messianic promises made unto the fathers—To cheer the Jewish believers, whom he might seem to have been disparaging, and to keep down Gentile pride, the apostle holds up Israel's salvation as the primary end of Christ's mission. But next after this, Christ was sent that the Gentiles might glorify God for his mercy.—A number of quotations from the Old Testament here follow, to show that God's plan of mercy embraced, from the first, the Gentiles along with the Jews. as it is written (Psalm 18. 49), I will confess to i.e., glorify thee among the Gentiles, &c. And again Deuteronomy, 32. 43, though there is some difficulty in the Hcb., Rejoice, ye Gentiles, along with his people Israel. And again Psalm 117. 1, Praise the Lord, all ye Gentiles; and laud him, all ye people 'peoples'—the various nations outside the pale of Judaism. And again, Isaiah 45. 19, There shall be a 'title' not of Jesse—meaning, not 'He from whom Jesse sprang,' but 'He that is sprung from Jesse'—i.e., Jesse's son, David—see Revelation, 22. 16, and he that shall rise, &c.—So the LXX. in substantial, though not verbal, agreement with the original. 13. Now, &c.—This seems a concluding prayer, suggested by the whole preceding subject-matter of the epistle, the God of hope—see on c. 5. fill you with all joy and peace in believing—the native fruit of that faith which is the great theme of this epistle of Galatians, 5. 22. that ye may abound in hope—"of the glory of God." See on ch. 5. 1. through the power of the Holy Ghost—to whom, in the economy of redemption, it belongs to inspire believers with all gracious affections,—on the foregoing portion, Note 1. No Christian is at liberty to regard himself as an isolated disciple of the Lord Jesus, having to decide questions of duty and liberty solely with reference to himself. Ver. 14-23. CONCLUSION: IN WHICH THE APOSTLE APOLOGIZES FOR HIS WRITING TO THE ROMAN CHRISTIANS, EXPLAINS WHY HE HAD NOT YET VISITED THEM, ANNOUNCES HIS FUTURE PLANS, AND ASKS THEIR PRAYERS FOR THE COMPLETION OF THEM. 14, 15. And, &c.—rather, 'Now I am persuaded, my brethren, even I myself, concerning you, that ye also yourselves are full of goodness—of inclination to all I have been enjoying on you, filled with all knowledge (of the truth expounded, and able (without my intervention) to admonish one another. Nevertheless, I have written the more boldly unto you in some sort

'measure', as putting you in mind, because of the grace that is given to me of God—as an apostle of Jesus Christ. 16. that I should be the rather, 'a' minister.—The word here used is commonly employed to express the office of the priesthood, from which accordingly the figurative language of the rest of the verse is taken, of Jesus Christ ('Christ Jesus, according to the true reading, to the Gentiles—a further proof that the epistle was addressed to a Gentile church. See on ch. 1. 13. ministering the gospel of God.—As the word here is a still more priestly one, it should be rendered (as in KRV and VERSION), 'ministering; as a priest in the gospel of God' that the offering up of the Gentiles as an oblation to God, in their converted character, might be acceptable, being sanctified by the Holy Ghost—the end to which the ancient offerings typically looked. 17. I have therefore whereof I may glory—or adding the article, as the reading seems to be, 'I have my glorying,' through 'in,' Christ Jesus in those things which pertain to God—the things of the ministry committed to me of God. 18-22. For I will not dare to speak of any 'to speak ought,' of those things which Christ hath not wrought by me—a modest though somewhat obscure form of expression, meaning, 'I will not dare to go beyond what Christ hath wrought by me'—in which form accordingly the rest of the passage is expressed. Observe here how Paul ascribes all the success of his labours to the activity of the living Redeemer, working in and by him, by word and deed—by preaching and working; which latter he explains in the next clause, through rigour i.e., 'in the power of,' signs and wonders—i.e., glorious miracles, by the power of the Spirit of God—the Holy Ghost, as the true reading seems to be. This seems intended to explain the efficacy of the word preached, as well as the working of the miracles which attested it, so that from Jerusalem, and round about unto 'as far as' Illyricum—to the extreme north-western boundary of Greece. It corresponds to the modern Croatia and Dalmatia 2 Timothy, 4. 10. See Acts, 20. 1, 2. I have fully preached the gospel of Christ. Yea, &c.—rather, 'Yet making it my study of 2 Corinthians, 5. 9; 1 Thessalonians, 4. 11, Greek, so to preach the gospel, not where Christ was (already) named, that I might not build upon another man's foundation; but might act) as it is written, To whom no tidings of Him came, they shall see,' &c. For which cause—'Being so long occupied with this missionary work, I have been much or, 'for the most part' hindered,' &c. See on ch. 1. 9-11. 23, 24. But now having no more place 'no longer having place',—i.e., unbroken ground, where Christ has not been preached, and having a great desire ('a longing') these many years to come unto you see, as before, on ch. 1. 9-11; whenever I take my journey into Spain—Whether this purpose was ever accomplished has been much disputed, as no record of it nor allusion to it any where occurs. Those who think our apostle was never at large after his first imprisonment at Rome will of course hold that it never was; while those who are persuaded, as we are, that he underwent a second imprisonment, prior to which he was at large for a considerable time after his first, incline naturally to the other opinion. I will come to you—if these words were not originally in the text, and there is weighty evidence against them, they must at least be inserted as a necessary supplement. in my journey, &c.—'as I pass through by you, to be set forward on my journey thither, if first I be somewhat filled with your company?—i.e., 'I should indeed like to stay longer with you than I can hope to do, but I must, to some extent at least, have my bill of your company.' 25-27. But now I go to Jerusalem to minister, 'ministering' to the saints—in the sense immediately to be explained. For, &c.—better, 'For Macedonia and Achaia have thought good to make a certain contribution for

of the saints which are at Jerusalem. (See 7.) They have thought it good; and their reply they are?—q.d., 'And well they may, for what the Gentile believers owe to their brethren.' For if the Gentiles have been made of their spiritual things, their duty is also ('they ought') to minister unto them in carnal things—stilians, 9. 11; Galatians, 6. 6; and see Luke, 10. 2. 28. 29. When therefore I have ... sealed (red over safely) to them this fruit (of the faith of the Gentile converts), I will come ('come return') by you into Spain—See on v. 24. And ('I know') that ... I shall come in the fulness of Christ—Such, beyond all doubts, is the or., the words "of the gospel" being in hardly of antiquity and authority. Nor was the mistaken in this confidence, though his visits are in very different circumstances from what d. See Acts, 28. 16—end. 30. Now I beseech you, for the Lord Jesus Christ's sake, and for the Spirit—or, 'by the Lord Jesus Christ, in love of the Spirit'—not the love which bears to us, but that love which He kindles in hearts of believers towards each other.—q.d., 'labour whose name is alike dear to all of us; unsearchable riches I live only to proclaim, not love one to another which the blessed uses through all the brotherhood, making the Christ's servants a matter of common interest—I beseech you' that ye strive together with prayers to God for me—implying that he had been for anxious fear in this matter. 31. that I diverged from them that do not believe ('that do i.e., the truth, by believing it; as in ch. 2. 8.) He saw the storm that was gathering overhead, which, if at all, would certainly burst upon him when he reached the capital; and the clearly showed the correctness of these apprehensions, and that my service which I have for—see on v. 25-28. may be accepted by ('prove to') the saints. Nor was he without apprehension the opposition he had made to the narrow of the Jewish converts against the free of their Gentile brethren, should make this irksome to the poor saints at Jerusalem less well it ought to be. He would have the Romans to join him in wrestling with God that this; be gratefully received, and prove a cement between two parties. But further, 32. that I may you with ('in') joy by the will of God (Acts, Corinthians, 4. 19; 16. 7; Hebrews, 6. 2; James, may with you be refreshed—rather, 'with you yourself,' after all his labours and anxieties, redrafted for future service. 33. Now the God with you all. Amen. The peace here sought is in its widest sense: the peace of reconciliation God, first, "through the blood of the ever-living" (Hebrews, 13. 20; 1 Thessalonians, 5. 23; 2 Thessalonians, 3. 16; Philippians, 4. 9); then, "which that reconciliation diffuses among all members of it" (1 Corinthians, 14. 33; 2 Corinthians, 13. 14); more widely still, that the children of God, in beautiful imitation of their Father in heaven, are called and privileged to reach and wide through this sin-distracted and world (ch. 12. 18; Matthew, 5. 9; Hebrews, 13. 15).—Note (1.) Did "the chief of sin" apologise for writing to a Christian which he had never seen, and a church that he addressed was above the need of it, save to "stir up minds by way of remembrance" (2 Peter, 1. 12) and did he put even this upon the sole plea of responsibility (v. 14-16)? What a contrast presented to hierarchical pride, and in particular the affected humility of the bishop of this very Rome! How close the bond which the one spirit draws between ministers and people—how wide the separation produced by the other! (2.) There is in the Christian Church no real priesthood, and none but figurative sacrifices. Had it been otherwise, it is inconceivable that the 16th verse of this chapter should have been expressed as it is. Paul's only priesthood and sacrificial offerings lay, first, in ministering to them as "the apostle of the Gentiles," not the sacrament, with the 'real presence' of Christ in it, or the sacrifice of the mass, but "the Gospel of God," and then, when gathered under the wing of Christ, presenting them to God as a grateful offering, "being sanctified (not by sacrificial gifts, but) by the Holy Ghost." See Hebrews, 13. 9-16. (3.) Though the debt we owe to those by whom we have been brought to Christ can never be discharged, we should feel it a privilege when we can render them any lower benefit in return (v. 26, 27). (4.) Formidable designs against the truth, and the servants of Christ should, above all other ways of counteracting them, be met by combined prayer to Him who rules all hearts and controls all events; and the darker the cloud, the more resolutely should all to whom Christ's cause is dear "strive together in their prayers to God" for the removal of it (v. 30, 31). (5.) Christian fellowship is so precious, that the most eminent servants of Christ, amidst the toils and trials of their work, find it refreshing and invigorating; and it is no good sign of any ecclesiastic, that he deems it beneath him to seek and enjoy it even amongst the humblest saints in the Church of Christ (v. 24, 32).

CHAPTER XVI.

VER. 1-27. CONCLUSION, EMBRACING SUNDRY SALUTATIONS AND DIRECTIONS, AND A CLOSING PRAYER. 1. I commend unto you Phoebe our sister, which is a servant (or 'deaconess') of the church which is at Cenchrea—The word is Cenchrea, the eastern port of Corinth: Acts, 18. 18. That in the earliest churches there were deaconesses, to attend to the wants of the female members, there is no good reason to doubt. So early at least as the reign of Trajan, we learn from Pliny's celebrated letter to that emperor—A.D. 110, or 111—that they existed in the eastern churches. Indeed from the relation in which the sexes then stood to each other, something of this sort would seem to have been a necessity. Modern attempts, however, to revive this office have seldom found favour; either from the altered state of society, or the abuse of the office, or both. 2. receive her in the Lord—i.e., as a genuine disciple of the Lord Jesus, as ('so as') become saints—so as saints should receive saints, assist her in whatever business she hath ('may have') need of you—some private business of her own, for she hath been a succourer of many, and of myself also—See Psalm 41. 1-3; 2 Timothy, 1. 16-18. 3-5. Salute Priscilla—The true reading here is 'Prisca' (as in 2 Timothy, 4. 19), a contracted form of Priscilla, as "Silas" of "Silvanus," and Aquila my helpers—The wife is here named before the husband (as in Acts, 18. 18, and v. 26, according to the true reading; also in 2 Timothy, 4. 19), probably as being the more prominent and helpful to the Church, who have for my life laid down ('who did for my life lay down') their own necks—i.e., risked their lives; either at Corinth (Acts, 18. 6, 9, 10), or more probably at Ephesus (Acts, 19. 30, 31; and cf. 1 Corinthians, 16. 32). They must have returned from Ephesus, where we last find them in the History of the Acts, to Rome, whence the edict of Claudius had banished them (Acts, 18. 2); and doubtless, if not the principal members of that Christian community, they were at least the most endeared to our apostle, unto whom not only I give thanks, but also all the churches of the Gentiles—whose special apostle this dear couple had rescued from imminent danger. 5. Likewise the church that is in their house—the Christian assembly that statedly met there for worship. 'From his occupation as tent-maker, he had probably better accommodations for the meetings of the church than most other Christians.' [HODGE.] Probably this devoted couple had written to the apostle such an account of the stated meetings at their house, as made him feel at home with them, and include them in this salutation, which doubtless would be read at their meeting with peculiar interest. Salute my [well-] beloved Egestus, who is the first-fruit (i.e., the first convert of Achaia unto Christ—The true reading here, as appears by the MSS., is, 'the first-fruit of Asia unto Christ'—i.e., proconular Asia (see Acts, 16. 6). In 1 Corinthians, 16. 15, it is said that "the household of Stephanus was the first-fruit of Achaia," and though if Egestus was one of that family, the two statements might be reconciled according to the received text, there is no need to resort to this supposition, as that text is in this instance without authority. Egestus, as the first believer in that region called proconular Asia, was dear to the apostle. See Hosea, 2. 10; and Micah, 7. 1. None of the names mentioned from v. 5-15, are otherwise known. One wonders at the number of them, considering that the writer had never been at Rome. But as Rome was then the centre of the civilized world, and from which journeys were continually taken to the remotest parts, there is no great difficulty in supposing that so active a travelling missionary as Paul would, in course of time, make the acquaintance of a considerable number of the Christians then residing at Rome. 6. Greet (or 'Salute') Mary, who bestowed much labour on us—labour, no doubt, of a womanly kind. 7. Andronicus and Junia—or, as it might be, 'Junias,' a contracted form of 'Junianus?' In this case, it is a man's name. But if, as is more probable, the word be, as in our version, "Junia," the person meant was no doubt either the wife or the sister of Andronicus. my kinsmen—or, 'relatives' and my fellow-prisoners—on what occasion, it is impossible to say, as the apostle elsewhere tells us that he was "in prisons more frequent" (2 Corinthians, 11. 23). which are of note among the apostles—Those who think the word "apostle" is used in a lax sense, in the Acts and the Epistles, take this to mean 'noted apostles' [CHRYSTOM, LUTHER, CALVIN, BENCKE, OLSHAUSEN, THOLUCK, ALFORD, JOWETT.]; others, who are not clear that the word "apostle" is applied to any without the circle of the Twelve, save where the connection or some qualifying words show that the literal meaning of 'one sent' is the thing intended, understand by the expression used here, 'persons esteemed by the apostles.' [BEZA, GROTIUS, DE WHETTE, MEYER, FRITZSCHE, STUART, PHILIPPI, HODGE.] And of course, if "Junia" is to be taken for a woman, this latter must be the meaning, who also were in Christ before me—The apostle writes as if he envied them this priority in the faith. And, indeed, if to be "in Christ" be the most enviable human condition, the earlier the date of this blessed translation, the greater the grace of it. This latter statement about Andronicus and Junia seems to throw some light on the preceding one. Very possibly they may have been among the first-fruit of Peter's labours, gained to Christ either on the day of Pentecost or on some of the succeeding days. In that case they may have attracted the special esteem of those apostles who for some time resided chiefly at Jerusalem and its neighbourhood; and our apostle, though he came late in contact with the other apostles, if he was aware of this fact, would have pleasure in alluding to it. 8. Amplias—a contracted form of 'Ampliatius.' my beloved in the Lord—an expression of dear Christian affection. 9. 10. Urbane—rather, 'Urbanus: It is a man's name, our helper ('fellow-labourer') in Christ. Salute Aelia approved ('the approved') in Christ—or, as we ... id say, 'that tried Christian'; a noble commendation. Salute them which are of Aristobulus [household]—It would seem, from what is said of Narcissus in the following verse, that this Aristobulus himself had not been a Christian, but that the Christians of his household simply were meant; very possibly some of his slaves. 11. Salute Herodias, my kinsman—(see on v. 7. Greet them that be of [the household] of Narcissus, which are in the Lord—which implies that others in his house, including probably himself, were not Christians. 12. Salute Tryphena and Tryphosa, who labour in the Lord—two active females. Salute the beloved Persis (another female), which laboured much in the Lord—referring probably, not to official services, such as would fall to the deaconesses, but to such higher Christian labours—yet within the sphere competent to woman—as Priscilla bestowed on Apollon and others (Acts, 18. 18). 13. Salute Rufus, chosen ('the chosen') in the Lord—meaning, not 'who is one of the elect, as every believer is, but 'the choice' or 'precious one' in the Lord. (See 1 Peter, 2. 4; 2 John, 12.) We read, in Mark, 15. 21, that Simon of Cyrene, whom they compelled to bear our Lord's cross, was "the father of Alexander and Rufus." From this we naturally conclude, that when Mark wrote his gospel, Alexander and Rufus must have been well known as Christians among those by whom he expected his gospel to be first read; and, in all likelihood, this was that very "Rufus," in which case our interest is deepened by what immediately follows about his mother. and (salute) his mother and mine—The apostle calls her "his own mother," not so much as our Lord calls every elderly female believer His mother (Matthew, 12. 49, 50), but in grateful acknowledgment of her motherly attentions to himself, bestowed no doubt for his Master's sake, and the love she bore to his honoured servants. To us it seems altogether likely that the conversion of Simon the Cyrenian dated from that memorable day when "passing (casually) by, as he came from the country" (Mark, 15. 21), "they compelled him to bear the Saviour's cross. Sweet compulsion, if what he thus beheld issued in his voluntary taking up his own cross! Through him it is natural to suppose that his wife would be brought in, and that this believing couple, now "hears together of the grace of life" (1 Peter, 3. 7), as they told their two sons, Alexander and Rufus, what honour had unwittingly been put upon their father at that hour of deepest and dearest moment to all Christians, might be blessed to the in-bringing of both of them to Christ. In this case, supposing the elder of the two to have departed to be with Christ ere this letter was written, or to have been residing in some other place, and Rufus left alone with his mother, how instructive and beautiful is the testimony here borne to her! 14. 15. Salute Asyncritus, &c.—These have been thought to be the names of ten less notable Christians than those already named. But this will hardly be supposed if it be observed that they are divided into two pairs of five each, and that after the first of these pairs it is added, "and the brethren which are with them," while after the second pair we have the words, "and all the saints which are with them." This perhaps hardly means that each of the five in both pairs had "a church at his house," else probably this would have been more expressly said. But at least it would seem to indicate that they were each a centre of some few Christians who met at his house—it may be for further instruction, for prayer, for missionary purposes, or for some other Christian objects. These little peeps into the rudimental forms which Christian fellowship first took in the great cities, though too indistinct for more than conjecture, are singularly interesting. Our apostle would seem to have been kept minutely informed as to the state of the Roman church, both as to its membership and its varied activities, probably by Priscilla and Aquila, 16. Salute one another with an holy kiss—So 1 Corinthians, 16, 20; 1 Thessalonians, 5, 26; 1 Peter, 5, 14. The custom prevailed among the Jews, and, doubtless, came from the East where it still obtains. Its adoption into the Christian churches, as the symbol of a higher fellowship than it had ever expressed before, was probably as immediate as it was natural. In this case the apostle's desire seems to be that on receipt of his epistle, with its salutations, they should in this manner expressly testify their Christian affection. It afterwards came to have a fixed place in the church service, immediately after the celebration of the Supper, and continued long in use. In such matters, however, the state of society and the peculiarities of different places require to be studied. The churches of Christ salute you—The true reading is, 'All the churches'; the word "all" gradually falling out, as seeming probably to express more than the apostle would venture to affirm. But no more seems meant than to assure the Romans in what affectionate esteem they were held by the churches generally; all that knew he was writing to Rome having expressly asked their own salutations to be sent to them. (See v. 19.) 17. Now, I beseech you, brethren, mark them which cause divisions and offences contrary to the doctrine which ye have learned ('which ye learned'), and avoid them—The fomenters of "divisions" here referred to are probably those who were unfriendly to the truths taught in this epistle, while those who caused "offences" were probably those referred to in ch. 14, 15, as haughtily disregarding the prejudices of the weak. The direction as to both is, first, to "mark" such, lest the evil should be done ere it was fully discovered; and next, to "avoid" them (cf. 2 Thessalonians, 3, 6, 14), so as neither to bear any responsibility for their procedure, nor seem to give them the least countenance. 18. For they that are such serve not our Lord Jesus Christ—our Lord Christ appears to be the true reading, but their own belly—not in the grosser sense, but as 'living for low ends of their own' (cf. Philipians, 3, 19). and by good words and fair speeches deceive the simple—the unwary, the unsuspecting. See Proverbs, 14, 15. 19. For your obedience (i.e., tractableness) is come abroad unto all. I am glad therefore on your behalf—I rejoice therefore over you, seems the true reading. but yet I would have you wise unto that which is good, and simple—'harmless,' as in Matthew, 10, 16, from which the warning is taken, concerning 'unto' evil—q.d., 'Your reputation among the churches for subjection to the teaching ye have received is to me sufficient ground of confidence in you; but ye need the serpent's wisdom to discriminate between transparent truth and plausible error, with that guileless simplicity which instinctively cleaves to the one and rejects the other.' 20. And the God of peace shall bruise Satan under your feet shortly—The apostle encourages the Romans to persevere in resisting the wiles of the devil with the assurance that, as good soldiers of Jesus Christ, they are "shortly" to receive their discharge, and have the satisfaction of "putting their feet upon the neck" of that formidable Enemy—a symbol familiar, probably, in all languages to express not only the completeness of the defeat, but the abject humiliation of the conquered foe. See John, 10, 24; 2 Samuel, 22, 41; Ezekiel, 21, 29; Psalm 91, 13. Though the apostle here styles Him who is thus to bruise Satan, "the God of peace," with special reference to the "divisions" (v. 17) by which the Roman church was in danger of being disturbed, this sublime appellation of God has here a wider sense, pointing to the whole purpose for which the Son of God was manifested, to destroy the works of the devil" (1 John, 3, 8); and indeed this assurance is but a reproduction of the first great promise, that the Seed of the woman should bruise the Serpent's head Genesis, 3, 15). The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you. Amen.—The "Amen" here has no MS. authority. What comes after this, where one would have expected the epistle to close, has its parallel in Philipians, 4, 20, &c., and being in fact common in epistolary writings, is simply a mark of genuineness. 21. Timothy, my work-fellow—my fellow-labourer; see Acts, 16, 1-6. The apostle mentions him here rather than in the opening address to this church, as he had not been at Rome. [BENGER.] and Lucius—not Luke, for the fuller form of 'Lucas' is not 'Lucius' but 'Lucanus.' The person meant seems to be "Lucius of Cyrene," who was among the "prophets and teachers" at Antioch with our apostle, before he was summoned into the missionary field. (Acts, 13, 1.) and Jason—See Acts, 17, 5. He had probably accompanied or followed the apostle from Thessalonica to Corinth. Sospater—See Acts, 20, 4. 22. I Tertius, who wrote this ('the') epistle—as the apostle's amanuensis, or penman, salute you in the Lord—So usually did the apostle dictate his epistles, that he calls the attention of the Galatians to the fact that to them he wrote with his own hand. (Galatians, 6, 11.) But this Tertius would have the Romans to know that, far from being a mere scribe, his heart went out to them in Christian affection; and the apostle, by giving his salutation a place here, would show what sort of assistants he employed. 23. Gaius mine host, and (the host) of the whole church—See Acts, 20, 4. It would appear that he was one of only two persons whom Paul baptized with his own hand: cf. 3 John, 1. His Christian hospitality appears to have been something uncommon. Erastus the chamberlain ('treasurer') of the city—doubtless of Corinth; See Acts, 19, 22; 2 Timothy, 4, 20. and Quartus a brother—rather, 'the' or 'our' brother—as Sothenes and Timothy are called, 1 Corinthians, 1, 1, and 2 Corinthians, 1, 1. [Greek.] Nothing more is known of this Quartus. 24. The grace, &c.—a repetition of the benediction precisely as in v. 20, save that it is here invoked on them "all." 25. Now to him that is of power—more simply, as in Jude, 24, 'to Him that is able' to stablish (confirm, or uphold) you, according to my gospel, and the preaching of Jesus Christ—i.e., in conformity with the truths of that gospel which I preach, and not I only, but all to whom has been committed "the preaching of Jesus Christ," according to the revelation of the mystery (see on ch. 11, 25), which was kept secret since the world began—lit., 'which hath been kept in silence during eternal ages,' but is now made manifest—The reference here is to that peculiar feature of the gospel economy which Paul himself was specially employed to carry into practical effect and to unfold by his teaching—the introduction of the Gentile believers to an equality with their Jewish brethren, and the new, and, to the Jews, quite unexpected form which this gave to the whole Kingdom of God: cf. Ephesians, 3, 1-10, &c. This the apostle calls here a mystery hitherto undisclosed, in what sense the next verse will show, but now fully unfolded; and his prayer for the Roman Christians, in the form of a doxology to Him who was able to do what he asked, is that they might be established in the truth of the gospel, not only in its essential character, but specially in that feature of it which gave themselves, as Gentile believers, their whole standing among the people of God, and by the Scriptures of the prophets, according to the commandment of the everlasting God, made known to all nations for (in order to the) obedience of faith—Lest they should think, from what he had just said, that God had brought in upon his people so vast a change on their condition without giving them any previous notice, the apostle here adds that, on the contrary, "the Scriptures of the prophets" contain all that and other preachers of the gospel had to declare on these topics, and indeed that the same "everlasting God," who "from eternal ages" had kept these things hid, and given "commandment" that they should now, according to the tenor of those prophetic Scriptures, be imparted to every nation for their believing acceptance. 27, to God, &c.—"To the only wise God through Jesus Christ, be—lit., 'to whom be; q. d., 'to Him, I say, be the glory for ever. Amen.' At its outset, this is an ascription of glory to the power that could do all this; at its close it ascribes glory to the wisdom that planned and that presides over the gathering of a redeemed people out of all nations. The apostle adds his devout "Amen," which the reader—if he has followed him with the astonishment and delight of him who pens these words—will fervently echo.—On this concluding section of the epistle. Note (1.) In the minute and delicate manifestations of Christian feeling, and lively interest in the smallest movements of Christian life, love, and zeal, which are here exemplified, combined with the grasp of thought and elevation of soul which this whole epistle displays, as indeed all the writings of our apostle, we have the secret of much of that grandeur of character which has made the name of Paul stand on an elevation of its own in the estimation of enlightened Christendom in every age, and of that influence which under God, beyond all the other apostles, he has already exercised, and is yet destined to exert, over the religious thinking and feeling of men. Nor can any approach him in these peculiarities without exercising corresponding influence on all with whom they come in contact (v. 1-16). (2.) "The wisdom of the serpent and the harmlessness of the dove"—in enjoining which our apostle here only echoes the teaching of his Lord (Matthew, 10. 16)—is a combination of properties the rarity of which among Christians is only equalled by its vast importance. In every age of the Church there have been real Christians whose excessive study of the serpent's wisdom has so sadly trenchanted upon their guileless simplicity, as at times to excite the distressing apprehension that they were no better than wolves in sheep's clothing: Nor is it to be denied, on the other hand, that, either from inaptitude or indisposition to judge with manly discrimination of character and of measures, many eminently simple, spiritual, devoted Christians, have throughout life exercised little or no influence on any section of society around them. Let the apostle's counsel on this head, v. 19, be taken as a study, especially by young Christians, whose character has yet to be formed, and whose permanent sphere in life is but partially fixed; and let them prayerfully set themselves to the combined exercise of both those qualities. So will their Christian character acquire solidity and elevation, and their influence for good be proportionably extended. (3.) Christians should cheer their own and each other's hearts, amidst the toils and trials of their protracted warfare, with the assurance that it will have a speedy and glorious end; they should accustom themselves to regard all opposition to the progress and prosperity of Christ's cause—whether in their own souls, in the churches with which they are connected, or in the world at large—as just "Satan" in conflict, as ever, with Christ their Lord; and they should never allow themselves to doubt that "the God of peace" will "shortly" give them the neck of their Enemy, and make them to bruise the Serpent's head (v. 20). (4.) As Christians are held up and carried through solely by divine power, working through the glorious gospel, so to that power, and to the wisdom that brought that gospel nigh to them, they should ascribe all the glory of their stability now, as they certainly will of their victory at last (v. 25-27). (5.) "Has the everlasting God" "commanded" that the gospel "mystery," so long kept hid but now fully disclosed, shall be "made known to all nations for the obedience of faith" (v. 22)? Then, what "necessity is laid upon" all the churches, and every Christian, to send the gospel "to every creature!" And we may rest well assured that the prosperity or decline of churches, and of individual Christians, will have not a little to do with their faithfulness or indifference to this imperative duty.

The ancient subscription at the end of this epistle—though of course of no authority—appears to be in this case quite correct.

THE FIRST EPISTLE OF PAUL THE APOSTLE TO THE

INTRODUCTION.

THE AUTHENTICITY of this epistle is attested by Clement of Rome (Ep. to Corinth. c. 47), Polycarp (Ep. to Philipp. c. 11), and Irenæus (adversus Hæres. 4. 27. 3). The city to which it was sent was famed for its wealth and commerce, which were chiefly due to its situation between the Ionian and Ægean seas on the Isthmus connecting the Peloponnesus with Greece. In St. Paul's time it was capital of the province Achaia, and the seat of the Roman proconsul (Acts, 18. 12). The state of morals in it was notorious for debauchery, even in the profigate heathen world; so much so that "to Corinthianize" was a proverbial phrase for "to play the wanton;" hence arose dangers to the purity of the Christian church as Corinth. That church was founded by St. Paul on his first visit (Acts, 18. 1-17).

He had been the instrument of converting many Gentiles (ch. 18. 2), and some Jews (Acts, 18. 8), notwithstanding the vehement opposition of the countrymen of the latter (Acts, 18. 5), during the year and a half in which he sojourned there. The converts were chiefly of the humbler classes (ch. 1. 26. &c.). Crispus (ch. 1. 14; Acts, 18. 8), Erastus, and Gaius (Gaius) were, however, men of rank (Roman, 16. 23). A variety of classes is also implied in ch. 11. 22. The risk of contamination by contact with the surrounding corruptions, and the temptation to a craving for Greek philosophy and rhetoric (which Apollo's eloquent style rather tended to foster, Acts, 18. 24, &c.) in contrast to Paul's simple preaching of Christ crucified (ch. 2. 1, &c.), as well as the opposition of certain teachers to him, naturally caused him anxiety. Emissaries from the Judaizers of Palestine boasted of "letters of commendation" from Jerusalem, the metropolis of the faith. They did not, it is true, insist on oromuncation in refined Corinth, where the attempt would have been hopeless, as they did among the simpler people of Galatia: but they attacked the apostolic authority of Paul (ch. 9. 1, 2; 3 Corinthians, 10. 1, 7, 8), some of them declaring themselves followers of Cephas, the chief apostle, others boasting that they belonged to Christ Himself (ch. 1. 12; 3 Corinthians, 10. 7), whilst they haughtily repudiated all subordinate teaching. Those persons gave out themselves for apostles (3 Corinthians, 11. 5, 13). The ground taken by them was, that Paul was not one of the twelve, and not an eye witness of the gospel facts, and durst not prove his apostleship by claiming sustenance from the Christian church. Another section avowed themselves followers of Paul himself, but did so in a party spirit, exalting the minister rather than Christ. The followers of Apollon, again, unduly prized his Alexandrian learning and eloquence, to the disparagement of the apostle, who studiously avoided any deviation from Christian simplicity (ch. 2. 1-5). In some of this least philosophising party there may have arisen the Antinomian tendency which tried to defend theoretically their own practical immorality; hence their denial of the future resurrection, and their adoption of the Epicurean motto, prevalent in heathen Corinth, "Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die" (ch. 15.). Hence, perhaps, arose their connivance at the incestuous intercourse kept up by one of the so-called Christian body with his step-mother, during his father's life. The household of Chloe informed St. Paul of many other evils: such as contentions, divisions, and lawsuits brought against brethren in heathen law courts by professing Christians; the abuse of their spiritual gifts into occasions of display and fanaticism; the interruption of public worship by simultaneous and disorderly ministrations, and decorum violated by women speaking unveiled (contrary to Oriental usage), and so usurping the office of men, and even the holy communion desecrated by greediness and revelling on the part of the communicants. Other messengers, also, came from Corinth, consulting him on the subject of (1.) the controversy about meats offered to idols; (2.) the disputes about celibacy and marriage; (3.) the due exercise of spiritual gifts in public worship; (4.) the best mode of making the collection which he had requested for the saints at Jerusalem (ch. 16. 1, &c.). Such were the circumstances which called forth the first epistle to the Corinthians, the most varied in its topics of all the epistles.

In ch. 5. 9, "I wrote unto you in an epistle not to company with fornicators," it is implied that St. Paul had written a previous letter to the Corinthians (now lost). Probably in it he had also enjoined them to make a contribution for the poor saints at Jerusalem, whereupon they seem to have asked directions as to the mode of doing so, to which he now replies (ch. 16. 2). It also probably announced his intention of visiting them on his way to Macedonia, and again on his return from Macedonia (2 Corinthians, 1. 15, 16), which purpose he changed on hearing the unfavourable report from Chloe's household (ch. 16. 2-7), for which he was charged with sickness (2 Corinthians, 1. 17). In the first epistle which we have, the subject of fornication is alluded to only in a summary way as if he were rather replying to an excuse set up after rebuke in the matter, than introducing it for the first time. [Alford.] Preceding this former letter, he seems to have paid a second visit to Corinth. For in 2 Corinthians, 12. 14; 13. 1, he speaks of his intention of paying them a third visit, implying he had already twice visited them. See also Notes on 2 Corinthians, 2. 1; 13. 2; also 1. 15, 16. It is hardly likely that during his three years' sojourn at Ephesus he would have failed to revisit his Corinthian converts, which he could so readily do by sea, there being constant maritime intercourse between the two cities. This second visit was probably a short one (cf. ch. 16. 7); and attended with pain and humiliation (2 Corinthians, 2. 1; 12. 23) occasioned by the scandalous conduct of so many of his own converts. His milder censures having then failed to produce reformation, he wrote briefly directing them "not to company with fornicators." On their misapprehending this injunction, he explained it more fully in the epistle, the first of the two extant (ch. 5. 9-12). That the second visit is not mentioned in Acts is no objection to its having really taken place, as that book is fragmentary and omits other leading incidents in St. Paul's life; e. g., his visit to Arabia, Syria, and Cilicia (Galatians, 1. 17-21).

The PLACE OF WRITING is fixed to be Ephesus (ch. 16. 8). The subscription in English Version, "From Philippi," has no authority whatever, and probably arose from a mistaken translation of ch. 16. 5, "For I am passing through Macedonia." At the time of writing St. Paul implies (ch. 16. 8) that he intended to leave Ephesus after Pentecost of that year. He really did leave it about Pentecost (57 A.D.). Cf. Acts, 19. 30. The allusion to Passover imagery in connection with our Christian Passover, Easter (ch. 5. 7), makes it likely that the season was about Easter. Thus the date of the epistle is fixed with tolerable accuracy, about Easter, certainly before Pentecost, in the third year of his residence at Ephesus, 57 A.D. For other arguments, see Conybeare and Howson's Life and Epp. of St. Paul.

The epistle is written in the name of Sosthenes "our brother." Birks supposes he is the same as the Sosthenes, Acts 18. 17, who, he thinks, was converted subsequently to that occurrence. He bears no part in the epistle itself, the apostle in the very next verses (4. 4, &c.) using the first person: so Timothy is introduced, 2 Corinthians, 1. 1. The bearers of the epistle were probably Stephanas, Fortunatus, and Achaicus (see the subscription), whom he mentions (ch. 16. 17, 18) as with him then, but who he implies are about to return back to Corinth; and therefore he commends them to the regard of the Corinthians.

CHAPTER I.

VER. 1-31. THE INSCRIPTION: THANKSGIVING FOR THE SPIRITUAL STATE OF THE CORINTHIAN CHURCH: REPROOF OF PARTY DIVISIONS: HIS OWN METHOD OF PRAECHEING ONLY CHRIST. 1. called to be—Found in some, not in others, of the oldest MSS. Possibly inserted from Romans, 1. 1; but as likely to be genuine. Translate, lit., "a called apostle." [CONYBEARE & HOWSON.] through ... will of God—not because of my own merit. Thus St. Paul's call as "an apostle by the will of God," whilst constituting the ground of the authority he claims in the Corinthian church (cf. Galatians, 1. 1), is a reason for humility on his own part (ch. 16. 8, 10). [BENGEL.] In assuming the ministerial office a man should see he does so not of his own impulse, but by the will of God (Jeremiah, 23. 21); Paul if left to his own will would never have been an apostle (Romans, 9. 16). Sosthenes—See my Introduction. Associated by St. Paul with himself in the inscription, either in modesty, Sosthenes being his inferior (CHRYSTOM), or in order that the name of a "brother" of note in Corinth (Acts, 18. 17) might give weight to his epistle, and might show in opposition to his detractors, that he was supported by leading brethren. Gallio had driven the Jews who accused Paul from the judgment seat. The Greek mob, who disliked the Jews, took the opportunity then of beating Sosthenes the ruler of the Jewish synagogue, whilst Gallio looked on and refused to interfere, being secretly pleased that the mob should second his own contempt for the Jews. Paul probably at this time had showed sympathy for an adversary in distress, which issued in the conversion of the latter. So Crispus also, the previous chief ruler of the synagogue, had been converted. Saul the persecutor turned into Paul the apostle, and Sosthenes the leader in persecution against that apostle, were two trophies of divine grace that, side by side, would appeal with double power to the church at Corinth. [BIRKS.] 2. the church of God—He calls it so notwithstanding its many blots. Fanatics and sectaries vainly think to anticipate the final sifting of the wheat and tares (Matthew, 13. 27-30). "It is a dangerous temptation to think there is no church where there is not apparent perfect purity. He who thinks so, must at last separate from all others and think himself the only holy man in the world, or establish a peculiar sect with a few hypocrites. It was enough for Paul in recognising the Corinthians as a church, that he saw among them evangelical doctrine, baptism, and the Lord's supper." [CALVIN.] It was the church of God, not of this or of that favourite leader. [CHRYSOSTOM.] at Corinth—a church at dis-solute Corinth—what a paradox of grace! sanctified—consecrated, or set apart as holy to God in (by union with) Christ Jesus. In the Greek there are no words "to them that are;" translate simply, "men sanctified," &c. called to be saints—rather, "called saints;" saints by calling: applied by Paul to all professing members of the church. As "sanctified in Christ" implies the fountain source of holiness, the believer's original sanctification in Christ (ch. 6. 11; Hebrews, 10. 10, 14; 1 Peter, 1. 2) in the purposes of God's grace; so "called saints" refers to their actual call (Romans, 8. 30), and the end of that call that they should be holy (1 Peter, 1. 15), with all that in every place call upon... Christ—The epistle is intended for these also, as well as for the Corinthians. The true CATHOLIC CHURCH (a term first used by Ignatius, ad Smyrnaeos, c. 8); not consisting of those who call themselves from Paul, Cephas, or any other eminent leader (e. 12), but of all, wherever they be, who call on Jesus as their Saviour in sincerity (cf. 2 Timothy, 2. 22). Still a general unity of discipline and doctrine in the several churches is implied in ch. 4. 17; 7. 17; 11. 16; 14. 33, 36. The worship due to God is here attributed to Jesus (cf. Joel, 2. 32; Matthew, 4. 10; Acts, 9. 14). both theirs and ours—"in every place which is their home, and our home also;" this is added to include the Christians throughout Achaia, not residing in Corinth the capital (2 Corinthians, 1. 1). St. Paul feels the home of his converts to be also his own. Cf. a similar phrase, Romans, 16. 13. [CONYBEARE & HOWSON.] "Ours" refers to Paul and St. Onesimus and the Corinthians' home. [ALFORD.] EBERA better explains, "Both their Lord and our Lord." All believers have one and the same Lord (ch. 8. 6; Ephesians, 4. 5); a virtual proof of the divisions of the Corinthians, as if Christ were divided (e. 13). 3. peace—peculiarly needed in the Corinthian church, on account of its dissensions. On this verse see Romans, 1. 7. 4. He puts the causes for praise and hope among them in the foreground, not to discourage them by the succeeding reproof, and in order to appeal to their better selves. my God—(Romans, 1. 8; Philippians, 1. 3). always—(cf. Philippians, 1. 4) the grace... given you—(cf. v. 7). by... Christ—lit., in Jesus Christ: given you as members in Christ. 5. utterance—ALFORD from MENOCHUS translates, "doctrine." Ye are rich in preachers or the preaching of the word, and rich in knowledge or apprehension of it: lit., (the) word (preached). English Version, as in 2 Corinthians, 8. 7, is better: for St. Paul, purposing presently to dwell on the abuse of the two gifts on which the Corinthians most prided themselves, utterance (speech) and knowledge (ch. 1. 20; 3. 18; 4. 19; ch. 13. and 14.), previously gains their good will by congratulating them on having those gifts. 6. According as the testimony of (of, and concerning) Christ (who is both the object and author of this testimony) [BENGE.] ch. 2. 1; 1 Timothy, 2. 6; 2 Timothy, 1. 8) was confirmed among [ALFORD] you, i.e., by God, through my preaching, and through the miracles accompanying it (ch. 12. 3; Mark, 16. 20; 2 Corinthians, 1. 21, 22; Galatians, 3. 2, 5; Ephesians, 4. 7, 8; Hebrews, 2. 4). God confirmed (cf. Philippians, 1. 7; Hebrews, 2. 3), or gave effect to the gospel among (or better as English Version, "in") the Corinthians by their accepting it and setting their seal to its truth, through the inward power of His Spirit, and the outward gifts and miracles accompanying it. [CALVIN.] 7. ye come behind—are inferior to other Christians elsewhere. [GROTIUS.] in no gift—Not that all had all gifts, but different persons among them had different gifts (ch. 12. 4, &c.), waiting for... coming of... Christ—The crowning proof of their "coming behind in no gift;" faith, hope, and love, are all exercised herein (cf. 2 Timothy, 4. 8; Titus, 2. 13). "Leaving to others their MEMBERSHIP (remember death), do thou earnestly cherish this joyous expectation of the Lord's coming." [BENGE.] The Greek verb implies, "to expect constantly, not only for a certain time, but even to the end till the expected event happens" (Romans, 8. 19). [TITM., Synonyms.] 8. Who—God, v. 4 (not Jesus Christ, v. 7, in which case it would be "in His day"). unto the end—viz., "the coming of Christ," blameless in the day of... Christ—(1 Thessalonians, 5. 23). After that day there is no danger (Ephesians, 4. 30; Philippians, 1. 6). Now is our day to work, and the day of our enemies to try us: then will be the day of Christ, and of His glory in the saints. [BENGE.] 9. faithful—to His promises (Philippians, 1. 6; 1 Thessalonians, 5. 24). called—according to His purpose (Romans, 8. 28). unto... fellowship of... Jesus—to be fellow-heirs with Christ (Romans, 8. 17-28), like Him sons of God and heirs of glory (Romans, 8. 30; 2 Thessalonians, 2. 14; 1 Peter, 3. 10; 1 John, 1. 3). CHRYSOSTOM remarks that the name of Christ is oftener mentioned in this than in any other epistle, the apostle designing thereby to draw them away from their party admiration of particular teachers to Christ alone. 10. Now—Ye already have knowledge, utterance, and hope, maintain also love, brethren—The very title is an argument for love. by... Christ—whom St. Paul wishes to be all in all to the Corinthians, and therefore names Him so often in this chapter. speak... same thing—not speaking different things as ye do (v. 12, in a spirit of variance, divisions—lit., splits, breaches, but—but rather, perfectly joined together—the opposite word to "divisions." It is applied to healing a wound, or making whole a rent, mind... judgment—the view taken by the understanding, and the practical decision arrived at [CONYBEARE & HOWSON.] as to what is to be done. The mind, within, refers to things to be believed: the judgment is displayed outwardly in things to be done. [BENGE.] Disposition—opinion. [ALFORD.] 11. (Ch. 11. 18). by them... of... house of Chloë—They seem to have been alike in the confidence of St. Paul and of the Corinthians. The Corinthians "wrote" to the apostle (ch. 7. 1) consulting him concerning certain points: marriage, the eating of things offered to idols, the decorum to be observed by women in religious assemblies. But they said not a syllable about the enormities and disorders that had crept in among them. That information reached Paul by other quarters. Hence his language about those evils is, "It hath been declared unto me," &c.; "It is reported commonly" (ch. 6. 1. 2). All this he says before he notices their letter, which shows that the latter did not give him any intimation of those evils. An undesigned proof of genuineness. [PALEY'S Horæ Paulinæ.] Observe his prudence: He names the family, to let it be seen that he made his allegation not without authority: he does not name the individuals, not to excite odium against them. He tacitly implies that the information ought rather to have come to him directly from their presbyters, as they had consulted him about matters of less moment. contentions—not so severe a word as "divisions," lit., schisms [Marpis, v. 10]. 12. This I say—this is what I mean in saying "contentions" (v. 11). every one of you saith—Ye say severally, "glorying in men" (v. 31; ch. 3. 21, 22), one, I am of Paul; another, I am of Apollos, &c. Not that they formed definite parties, but they individually betrayed the spirit of party in contentions under the name of different favourite teachers. St. Paul will not allow himself to be flattered even by those who made his name their party cry, so as to connive at the dishonour thereby done to Christ. These probably were converted under his ministry. Those alleging the name of Apollos, Paul's successor at Corinth (Acts, 18, 24, &c.), were persons attracted by his rhetorical style (probably acquired in Alexandria, ch. 3, 6), as contrasted with the "weak bodily presence" and "contemptible speech" of the apostle. Apollos, doubtless, did not willingly foster this spirit of undue preference (ch. 4, 6, 8); nay, to discourage it, he would not repeat his visit just then (ch. 16, 12). I of Cephas—Probably Judaisers who sheltered themselves under the name of St. Peter the apostle of the circumcision Cephas is the Hebrew, Peter the Greek name; John, 1, 42; Galatians, 2, 11, &c.): the subjects handled in chs. 7-9, were probably suggested as matters of doubt by them. The church there began from the Jewish synagogue, Crispus the chief ruler, and Sosthenes his successor (probably, being converts. Hence some Jewish leaven, though not so much as elsewhere, is traceable in 2 Corinthians, 11, 22). Petriism afterwards sprang up much more rankly at Rome. If it be wrong to boast "I am of Peter," how much more so to boast "I am of the Pope." (BENJEL.) I of Christ—A fair pretext used to slight the ministry of Paul and other teachers (ch. 4, 8; 2 Corinthians, 10, 7-11). 13. Is Christ divided?—into various parts (one under one leader, another under another). [ALFORD.] The unity of His body is not to be cut in pieces, as if all did not belong to Him, the One Head, was Paul crucified for you?—In the Greek the interrogation implies that a strong negative answer is expected: "Was it Paul (surely you will not say so) that was crucified for you?" In the former question the majesty of "CHRIST" (the Anointed One of God) implies the impossibility of His being "divided." In the latter, "Paul's" insignificance implies the impossibility of his being the head of redemption, "crucified" for them, and giving his name to the redeemed. This, which is true of Paul the founder of the church of Corinth, holds equally good of Cephas and Apollos, who had not such a claim as Paul in the Corinthian church, crucified... baptized—The cross claims us for Christ, as redeemed by Him; baptism, as dedicated to Him, in the name—rather, "in the name" (Galatians, 2, 27), implying the incorporation involved in the idea of baptism. 14. I thank God's providence now, who so ordered it that I baptized none of you but Crispus (the former ruler of the synagogue, Acts, 18, 8) and Gaius (written by the Romans Cœsus: the host of Paul at Corinth, and of the church, Romans, 16, 23: a person therefore in good circumstances). Baptizing was the office of the deacons (Acts, 10, 48) rather than of the apostles, whose office was that of establishing and superintending generally the churches. The deacons had a better opportunity of giving the necessary course of instruction preparatory to baptism. Crispus and Gaius, &c., were probably among the first converts, and hence were baptized by Paul himself, who founded the church. 15. Let—Not that Paul had this reason at the time, but God so arranged it that none might say. [ALFORD.] 16. household of Stephanus—"The first fruits of Achaia," i.e., among the first converted there (ch. 16, 15, 17). It is likely that such "households" included infants (Acts, 16, 33). The history of the church favours this view, as infant-baptism was the usage from the earliest ages. 17. St. Paul says this not to depreciate baptism; for he exalts it most highly (Romans, 6, 3). He baptized some first converts; and would have baptized more, but that his and the apostles' peculiar work was to preach the gospel, to found by their autoptic testimony particular churches, and then to superintend the churches in general, sent me—lit., as an apostle, not to baptize—even in Christ's name, much less in my own, not with wisdom of words—or speech; philosophical reasoning set off with oratorical language and secular learning, which the Corinthians set so undue a value upon (v. 6; ch. 2, 1, 4) in Apollos, and the want of which in St. Paul they were dissatisfied with (2 Corinthians, 10, 10). cross of Christ—the sum and substance of the gospel (v. 23; ch. 2, 2). Christ crucified, he made of none effect—lit., be made void (Romans, 4, 14); viz., by men thinking more of the human reasonings and eloquence in which the gospel was set forth, than of the gospel itself of Christ crucified, the sinner's only remedy, and God's highest exhibition of love. 18. preaching, &c.—lit., the word, or speech as to the cross: in contrast to the "wisdom of word" (so-called), v. 17, then that perish—rather, them that are perishing, viz., by preferring human "wisdom of words" to the doctrine of the "cross of Christ." It is not the final state that is referred to: but, "them that are in the way of perishing." So also in 2 Corinthians, 2, 16, 16, as which are saved—In the Greek the collocation is more modest, "to them that are being saved (that are in the way of salvation) as," i.e., to which class we belong, power of God—which includes in it that it is "the wisdom of God" (v. 24). God's powerful instrument of salvation: the highest exhibition of God's power (Romans, 1, 16). What seems to the world "weakness" in God's plan of salvation (v. 26), and in its mode of delivery by His apostle (ch. 2, 3), is really His mighty "power." What seems "foolishness" because wanting man's "wisdom of words" (v. 17), is really the highest "wisdom of God" (v. 20). 19. I will destroy—Slightly altered from the LXX., Isaiah, 29, 14. The Hebrew is, "The wisdom of the wise shall perish, and the understanding of their prudent men shall be hid." St. Paul by inspiration gives the sense of the Spirit, by making God the cause of their wisdom perishing, &c., "I will destroy," &c. understanding of the prudent—lit., of the understanding ones. 20. Where? &c.—Nowhere: for God "brings them to nought" (v. 19), the wise—generally, the scribe—Jewish. [ALFORD.] the disputer—Greek. [ALFORD.] Cf. the Jew and Greek of this world contrasted with the godly wise, v. 22, 23. VERRINGA thinks the reference is to the Jewish discourses in the synagogue, Darashoth, from a Hebrew root "to dispute." Cf. "questions," Acts, 26, 3; Titus, 3, 9. If so, "wise" refers to Greek wisdom (cf. v. 22). St. Paul applies Isaiah, 33, 18, here in a higher sense; there the primary reference was to temporal deliverance, here to external; v. 22, which is in threefold opposition to v. 18, is there, sanctions this higher application; the Lord in the threefold character being the sole ground of glorying to his people, of this world... of this world—rather, "dispensation (or age)... world;" the Greek words are distinct. The former is here, this age or worldly order of things in a moral point of view, as opposed to the Christian dispensation or order of things. The latter is the world viewed externally and cosmically, made foolish—shown the world's philosophy to be folly, because it lacks faith in Christ crucified. [CHRYSOSTOM.] Has treated it as folly, and not used its help in converting and saving men (v. 26, 27). [ESTIUS.] 21. after that—rather, whence, in the wisdom of God—in the wise arrangement of God, world by wisdom—rather, "by its wisdom," or its philosophy (John, 1, 10; Romans, 1, 28). knew not God—whatever other knowledge it attained (Acts, 17, 23, 27). The deistic theory that man can by the light of nature discover his duty to God, is disproved by the fact that man has never discovered it without revelation. All the stars and moon cannot make it day: that is the prerogative of the sun. Nor can nature's highest gifts make the moral day arise: that is the office of Christ. Even the Jew missed this knowledge, in so far as he followed after mere carnal world-wisdom, it pleased God—St. Paul refers to Jesus' words (Luke, 10, 21). by the foolishness of preaching—by that preaching which the world (unbelieving Jews and Gentiles alike) deem foolishness, save them that believe—(Romans, 1, 16). 22. For—lit., since; seeing that. This verse illustrates how the "preaching" of Christ crucified came to be deemed "foolishness" (v. 23).

sign — The oldest MSS. read "signs." The singular was a later correction from Matthew, 12. 28; 16. 1; John, 2. 18. The signs the Jews craved for were not mere miracles, but direct tokens from heaven that Jesus was Messiah (Luke, 11. 16). Greeks seek...wisdom—viz., a philosophic demonstration of Christianity. Whereas Christ, instead of demonstrative proof, demands faith on the ground of His word, and of a reasonable amount of evidence that the alleged revelation is His word. Christianity begins not with solving intellectual difficulties, but with satisfying the heart that longs for forgiveness. Hence not the refined Greeks, but the theocratic Jews were the chosen organ for propagating revelation. Again, intellectual Athens (Acts, 17. 19-21, &c.) received the gospel less readily than commercial Corinth. 23. we—Paul and Apollos. Christ crucified—The Greek expresses not the mere fact of His crucifixion but the permanent character acquired by the transaction, whereby He is now a Saviour (Galatians, 3. 1). [GREEK.] A Messiah (Christ) crucified was the stone on which the Jews stumbled (Matthew, 21. 44). The opposition of Jew and Gentile alike shows that a religion so seemingly contemptible in its origin could not have succeeded if it had not been divine. unto the Gentiles—the oldest MSS. read "unto the Gentiles." 24. called—(cf. v. 26). The same class as the "us which are (being) saved" (v. 18); the elect, who have obeyed the call: called effectually (Romans, 8. 28, 30). Christ—Crucified" is not here added, because when the offense of the cross is overcome, "Christ" is received in all His relations, not only in His cross, but in His life and His future kingdom. power—so meeting all the reasonable requirements of the Jews who sought "a sign." The cross (the death of a slave), which to the Jews (looking for a temporal Messiah) was a "stumblingblock," is really "the power of God" to the salvation of all who believe. wisdom of God—so really exhibiting, and in the highest degree if they would but see it), that which the Greeks sought after—wisdom (Colossians, 2. 3). foolishness of God—i.e., God's plan of salvation which men deem "foolishness," weakness of God—Christ "crucified through weakness" (2 Corinthians, 13. 4, the great stumblingblock of the Jews), yet "living by the power of God." So He perfects strength out of the weakness of His servants (ch. 2. 3; 2 Corinthians, 12. 9). 26. ye see—rather, from the prominence of the verb in the Greek, "see" or "consider" (imperative). [ALFORD from Vulgate and Irenaeus.] your calling...are called—Instead of the words in Italian, supplied by English Version, supply, "we were your callers." What St. Paul is dwelling on (cf. v. 27, 28), is the weakness of the instrumentality which the Lord employed to convert the world. [HINDS and WHATLEY; so ANSELM.] However, English Version accords well with v. 24. "The whole history of the expansion of the church is a progressive victory of the ignorant over the learned, the lowly over the lofty, until the emperor himself laid down his crown before the cross of Christ." [OLSHAUSEN.] wise...after the flesh—the wisdom of this world acquired by human study without the Spirit. Contrast Matthew, 16. 17. 27. the foolish things—a general phrase for all persons and things foolish. Even things (and those, too, foolish things) are chosen by God to confound persons (and those too persons who are wise). This seems to me the force of the change from neuter to masculine. to confound—The Greek is stronger, "that He might confound (or put to shame)," &c. God confounds the wise by effecting through His instruments, without human wisdom, what the worldly wise, with it, cannot effect, viz., to bring men to salvation. chosen...chosen—The repetition indicates the gracious deliberateness of God's purpose (James, 2. 6). 28. ye, and things which are not—Ye is not in the Greek. Also some of the oldest MSS. omit "and." Thus the clause, "things which are not" (are regarded as nought), is in opposition with "foolish...weak...base (i.e., low born) and despised things." God has chosen all four, though regarded as things that are not, to bring to nought things that are. 29. no flesh...glory—For they who try to glory (boast) because of human greatness and wisdom, are "confounded" or put to shame (v. 27). Flesh, like "the flower of the field," is beautiful, but frail (Isaiah, 40. 6), in his presence—We are to glory not before Him, but in Him. [BENOEL.] 30. But...ye—in contrast to them that "glory" in worldly wisdom and greatness. of him are—not of yourselves (Ephesians, 2. 8), but of Him (Romans, 11. 36). From Him ye are (i.e., have spiritual life, who once were spiritually among the "things which are not," v. 28), in Christ—by living union with Him. Not "in the flesh" (v. 28, 29), of God—from God: emanating from Him and sent by Him. 31 made us—has been made to us, to our eternal gain. wisdom—unattainable by the worldly mode of seeking it (v. 19, 20); contrast Colossians, 2. 3; Proverbs, 8.; Isaiah, 9. 6. By it we become "wise unto salvation," owing to His wisdom in originating and executing the plan whereas once we were "fools," righteousness—the ground of our justification (Jeremiah, 23. 5, 6; Romans, 4. 25; 2 Corinthians, 5. 21); whereas once we were "weak" (Romans, 5. 6). Isaiah, 42. 21; 45. 24. sanctification—by His Spirit; whereas formerly we were "base." Hereafter our righteousness and sanctification alike shall be both perfect and inherent. Now the righteousness wherewith we are justified is perfect, but not inherent; that wherewith we are sanctified is inherent, but not perfect. [HOOKER.] Now sanctification is perfect in principle, but not in attainment. These two are joined in the Greek as forming essentially but one thing, as distinguished from the "wisdom" in devising and executing the plan for us ("abounded toward us in all wisdom," Ephesians, 1. 8), and "redemption," the final completion of the scheme in the deliverance of the body (the position of "redemption" last shows that this limited sense is the one intended here. Luke, 21. 28; Romans, 5. 23; Ephesians, 1. 14; 4. 30. redemption—whereas once we were "despised." 31 glory in...Lord—(Jeremiah, 9. 23, 24)—in opposition to "flesh glorying in His presence" (v. 20). In contrast to morbid slavish self-abasement, St. Paul joins with humility the elevating consciousness of our true dignity in Christ. He who glories is to glory in the Lord, not in the flesh, nor in the world.

CHAPTER II.

VER. 1-16. ST. PAUL'S SUBJECT OF PREACHING, CHRIST CRUCIFIED, NOT IN WORLDLY, BUT IN HEAVENLY, WISDOM AMONG THE PERFECT. 1. And I—so I, (COYBERR) as one of the "foolish, weak, and despised" instruments employed by God (ch. 1. 27, 28): "glorying in the Lord," not in man's wisdom (ch. 1. 31). Cf. ch. 1. 25, "We," when I came—(Acts, 18. 1, &c.). Paul might, had he pleased, have used an ornate style, having studied secular learning at Tarsus of Cilicia, which Strabo preferred as a school of learning to Athens or Alexandria; here, doubtless, he read the Oedipus Aratus' poems (which he quotes, Acts, 17. 28), and Elymendes (Titus, 1. 12), and Memander (1 Corinthians, 15. 32). Grecian intellectual development was an important element in preparing the way for the gospel, but it failed to regenerate the world, showing that for this superhuman power is needed. Hellenistic (Grecian) Judaism at Tarsus and Alexandria was the connecting link between the schools of Athens, and those of the Rabbis. No more fitting birth-place could there have been for the apostle of the Gentiles than Tarsus, free as it was from the warping influences of Rome, Alexandria, and Athens. He had at the same time Roman citizenship, which protected him from sudden violence. Again, he was reared in the Hebrew divine law at Jerusalem. Thus, as the three elements, Greek salvation, Roman polity (Luke, 2, 1), and the Divine will given to the Jews, combined just at Christ's time, to prepare the world for the gospel; so the same three, by God's marvellous providence, met together in the castle to the Gentiles. [CONYBEARE & HOWSON.] testimony of God—"the testimony of Christ" (ch. 1, 6), therefore Christ is God. 2. The Greek implies, "The only definite thing that I made it my business to know about you, was, to know Jesus Christ (His person) and Him crucified (His office), [ALFORD.] not exalted to the earthly throne of David, but executed as the best malefactor. The historical fact of Christ's crucifixion had probably been put less prominently forward to the seekers after human wisdom in the Corinthian church, to avoid offending learned heathens and Jews. Christ's person and Christ's office constitute the sum of the gospel. 3. 1—the preacher: as v. 2 describes the object, "Christ crucified," and v. 4, the mode of preaching—"my speech...not with enticing words," &c., "but demonstration of the Spirit," weakness—personal and bodily (2 Corinthians, 10, 19; 12, 7, 9; Galatians, 4, 13). weaving—(cf. Philippians, 2, 12.) Not personal fear, but a trembling anxiety to perform a duty; anxious conscientiousness, as proved by the contrast to "eye service" (Ephesians, 6, 6). [CONYBEARE & HOWSON.] 4. speech—in private, preaching—in public. [BENGEL.] ALFORD explains it, My discourses on doctrines, and by preaching or announcement of facts, enticing—rather, persuasion. MAN'S wisdom—"man's" is omitted; the oldest authorities. Still "wisdom" does refer to man's wisdom, demonstration of... Spirit, &c.—persuasion is man's means of moving his fellowman. God's sense is demonstration, leaving no doubt, and inspiring implicit faith, by the powerful working of the Spirit here exhibited both outwardly by miracles, and inwardly by working on the heart, now in the latter and more important way only (Matthew, 7, 29; Acts, 6, 9; Hebrews, 4, 12; cf. also Romans, 15, 19). The same ample power accompanies divine truth now, producing certain persuasion and conversion, when the Spirit condescends by it. 5. stood in ... wisdom of men—rest it, owe its origin and continuance to it. 6, 7. Yet the gospel preaching, so far from being at variance with true "wisdom," is a wisdom infinitely higher than that of the wise of the world. We speak—resuming "we preachers, I, Apollos, &c.) from "we preach" (ch. 1, 3), only that here, "we speak," refers to something less public (cf. v. 7, 13, "mystery," "hidden") than "we reach," which is public. For "wisdom" here denotes not the whole of Christian doctrine, but its sublimer and deeper principles. perfect—those matured in Christian experience and knowledge alone can understand the true superiority of the Christian wisdom which St. Paul preached. Distinguished not only from worldly and natural men, but also from babes, who though "in Christ" retain much that is "carnal" (ch. 3, 1, 2), and cannot therefore understand the deeper truths of Christianity (ch. 14, 20; Philippians, 3, 15; Hebrews, 5, 14). St. Paul does not mean by the "mystery" or "hidden wisdom" (v. 7), some hidden tradition distinct from the gospel (like the church of Rome's "disciplina arcani," and doctrine of reserve), but the unfolding of the treasures of knowledge, once hidden in God's counsels, but now announced to all, which would be intelligently comprehended in proportion as the sinner's inner life became perfectly transformed into the image of Christ. Cf. instances of such "mysteries," &c., deeper Christian truths, not preached at St. Paul's first coming to Corinth, when he confined himself to the fundamental elements (v. 2), but now spoken to the "perfect" (ch. 15, 51; Romans, 11, 25; Ephesians, 3, 5, 6). "Perfect" is used not of absolute perfection, but relatively to "babes," or those less ripe in Christian growth (cf. Philippians, 3, 12, 16, with 1 John, 2, 12-14). "God" v. 7, is opposed to the world, the apostles to "the princes (great and learned men) of this world" (v. 8; cf. ch. 1, 20). [BENGEL.] come to nought—nothingness (ch. 1, 28). They are transient, not immortal. Therefore their wisdom is not real. [BENGEL.] Rather, translate with ALFORD, "Which are being brought to nought," viz., by God's choosing the "things which are not (the weak and despised things of the gospel), to bring to nought (the same verb as here) things that are" (ch. 1, 28). 7. wisdom of God—emphatically contrasted with the wisdom of men and of this world (v. 5, 6). is a mystery—connected in construction with "we speak." We speak as dealing with a mystery, i.e., not something to be kept hidden, but what heretofore was so, but is now revealed. Whereas the Pagan mysteries were revealed only to a chosen few, the gospel mysteries were made known to all who would obey the truth. "If our gospel be hid, it is hid to them that are lost" (2 Corinthians, 4, 3), "whom the God of this world hath blinded." Ordinarily we use "mystery" in reference to those from whom the knowledge is withheld; the apostles, in reference to those to whom it is revealed. [WHATKEY.] It is hidden before it is brought forward, and when it is brought forward, it still remains hidden to those that are imperfect. [BENGEL.] ordained—lit., foreordained (cf. v. 9), "prepared for them that love Him," before the world—rather, "before the ages" (of time), i.e., from eternity. This infinitely antedates worldly wisdom in antiquity. It was before not only the wisdom of the world, but eternally before the world itself and its ages. to our glory—ours both now and hereafter, from "the Lord of glory" (v. 8), who brings to nought the "princes of this world." 8. Which—wisdom. The strongest proof of the natural man's destitution of heavenly wisdom, crucified... Lord of glory—implying the inseparable connexion of Christ's humanity and His divinity. The Lord of glory (which He had in His own right before the world was, John, 17, 4, 24) was crucified. 9. But—(it has happened) as it is written. Eye hath not seen, &c.—ALFORD translates, "The things which eye saw not, &c., the things which God prepared, &c., to us God revealed through His Spirit." Thus, however, the "but" of v. 10 is ignored. Rather construe, as ESTIUS, "(We speak," supplied from v. 8), things which eye saw not (heretofore), &c., things which God prepared, &c. But God revealed them to us, &c." The quotation is not a verbatim one, but an inspired exposition of the "wisdom" v. 6, from Isaiah, 64, 4. The exceptive words, "O God, beside (i.e., except) thee," are not quoted directly, but are virtually expressed in the exposition of them (v. 10). "None but thou, O God, seest these mysteries, and God hath revealed them to us by His spirit, entered—lit., come up into the heart. A Hebraism (cf. Margin, Jeremiah, 3, 16). In Isaiah, 64, it is "Prepared (lit., "will do") for him that waiteth for him," here, "for them that love Him." For Isaiah spake to them who waited for Messiah's appearance as future; St. Paul, to them who love Him as having actually appeared (1 John, 4, 19), cf. v. 12, "the things that are freely given to us of God." [BENGEL.] 10. revealed... by... Spirit—the inspiration of thoughts (so far as truth essential to salvation is concerned) makes the Christian (ch. 3, 16; 12, 3; Matthew, 16, 17; John, 16, 13; 1 John, 2, 20, 27); that of words, the PROPHECY (2 Samuel, 23, 1, 2; 1 Kings, 18, 1, 6), "by the word of the Lord" (v. 13; John, 20, 30, 31; 2 Peter, 1, 21). The secrets of revelation are secret to some, not because those who know them will not reveal them (for indeed, the very notion of revelation implies an unveiling of what had been veiled), but because those to whom they are announced have not the will or power to comprehend them. Hence the Spirit-taught alone know these secrets (Psalm 25, 14; Proverbs, 3, 32; John, 7, 17; 15, 15). unto us—the "perfect" or fully matured in Christian experience (v. 6). Intelligent men may understand the outline of doctrines; but without the Holy Spirit's revelation to the heart, these will be to them a mere outline—a skeleton, correct perhaps, but wanting life [CAUTION FOR THE TIMES, xiv.] (Luka, 10, 21). the Spirit searcheth—working in us and with our Spirits (cf. Romans, 8, 16, 26, 27). The Old Testament shows us God (the Father) for us. The gospel, God (the Son) with us. The Acts and Epistles, God (the Holy Ghost) in us. [MORSON.] (Galatians, 3, 14). deep things of God—(Psalm 92, 8). His divine nature, attributes, and counsels. The Spirit delights to explore the infinite depths of His own divine mind, and then reveal them to us, according as we are capable of understanding them (Deuteronomy, 29, 29). This proves the personality and Godhead of the Holy Ghost. Godhead cannot be separated from the Spirit of God, as manhood cannot be separated from the spirit of man. [HARRIS.] 11. what man, etc.—He, who of MEN knoweth the things of a MAN, saith the spirit of that man! things of God knoweth no man—rather, “none knoweth,” not angel or man. This proves the impossibility of any knowing the things of God, save by the Spirit of God (who alone knows them, since even in the case of man, so infinitely inferior in mind to God, none of his fellow-men, but his own spirit alone knows the things hidden within him): 12. we...received, not...spirit of...world—the personal evil “spirit that now worketh in the children of disobedience” (Ephesians, 3, 2). This spirit is natural in the unregenerate, and needs not to be received. Spirit which is of God—i.e., which comes FROM God. We have received it only by the gift of God whose Spirit it is, whereas our own spirit is the spirit that is IN us men (c. 11). that we might know... things... freely given... of God—present experimental knowledge, to our unspeakable comfort, of His deep mysteries of wisdom, and of our future possession of the good “things which God hath prepared for them that love Him” (c. 6, 13). also—we not only know by the Holy Ghost, but we also speak the “things freely given to us of God” (c. 13). which the Holy Ghost teacheth—the oldest MSS. read “the Spirit” simply, without “Holy.” comparing spiritual things with spiritual—expounding the Spirit-inspired Old Testament scripture, by comparison with the gospel which Jesus by the same spirit revealed (GORTIUS); and conversely illustrating the gospel mysteries by comparing them with the Old Testament types. (CHRYSOBOSTOM.) So the Greek verb is translated, “comparing” (3 Corinthians, 10, 12). WAHL (Claris) translates, “explaining (as the Greek is translated, Genesis, 40, 6, LXX) to spiritual (i.e., Spirit-taught) men, spiritual things (the things which we ourselves are taught by the Spirit).” Spirit-taught men alone can comprehend spiritual truths. This accords with v. 6, 9, 10, 14, 15; ch. 3, 1. ALFORD translates, “Putting together (combining) spirituals with spirituals:” i.e., attaching spiritual words to spiritual things, which we should not do, if we were to use words of worldly wisdom to expound spiritual things (so v. 1, 4; 1 Peter, 4, 11). Perhaps the generality of the neuter is designed to comprehend these several notions by implication. Comparing, or combining, spirituals with spirituals: implying both that spiritual things are only suited to spiritual persons (so “things” comprehended persons, ch. 1, 27), and also that spiritual truths can only be combined with spiritual (not worldly-wise) words, and lastly, spirituals of the Old and New Testaments can only be understood by mutual comparison or combination, not by combination with worldly “wisdom,” or natural perceptions (ch. 1, 21, 22; 3, 1, 4-9; cf. Psalm 119, 18). 14. natural man—He, a man of animal soul. As contrasted with the spiritual man, he is governed by the animal soul, which overbears his spirit, which latter is without the Spirit of God (Jude, 19). So the animal (English “natural”) body, or body led by the lower animal nature (including both the more human fallen reason and Aesop), is contrasted with the Spirit-quickened body (ch. 15, 44-46). The animal man (the man led by bodily appetites, and also by a self-writhing spirit, estranged from the divine life) is closely akin; so too the “earthly,” “Devilish,” or “demon-like,”—led by an evil spirit, is the awful character of such a one, in its worst type (James, 3, 15). receiveth not—though they are offered to him, and are “worthy of being received by all men” (1 Timothy, 1, 14), they are selfishness unto him—whereas he seeks “wisdom” (ch. 1, 23). neither can he—not only does he not, but he cannot know them, and therefore has no wish to “receive” them (Romans, 8, 7). 14. he that is spiritual—He, the spiritual man. In v. 14, it is “A not ‘the,’ as English Version) natural man.” The spiritual is the man distinguished above his fellow-men, as he is whom the Spirit rules. In the unregenerate, the spirit which ought to be the organ of the Holy Spirit (and which is so in the regenerate), is overridden by the animal soul, and is in abeyance, so that such a one is never called “spiritual.” judges all things—and persons, by their true standard (cf. ch. 6, 2-4; 1 John, 4, 11, in so far as he is spiritual. “Discerned...is discerned,” would better accord with the translation of the same Greek (v. 14). Otherwise for “discerned,” in v. 14, translates “judged of,” to accord with the translation, “judged...is judged,” in this 14th verse. He has a practical insight into the verities of the gospel, though he is not infallible on all theoretical points. If an individual may have the Spirit without being infallible, why may not the Church have the Spirit, and yet not be infallible a refutation of the plea of Rome for the Church’s infallibility, from Matthew, 28, 20; John, 16, 13. As the believer and the Church have the Spirit, and are yet not therefore impeccable, so be and the Church have the Spirit, and yet are not infallible or impeccable. He and the Church are both infallible and impeccable, only in proportion to the degree in which they are led by the Spirit. The Spirit leads into all truth and holiness; but His influence on believers and on the Church is as yet partial. Jesus alone, who had the Spirit without measure (John, 3, 34), is both infallible and impeccable. Scripture, because it was written by men, who whilst writing were infallibly inspired, is unmixt truth (Proverbs, 23, 6; 1 John, 2, 27). 16. For—proof of v. 15, that the spiritual man “is judged of no man.” In order to judge the spiritual man, the ordinary man must “know the mind of the Lord.” But “who of ordinary men know” that? that he may instruct him—i.e., so as to be able to set Him right as His counsellor (quoted from Isaiah, 40, 13, 14). So the LXX. translates the Greek verb, which means to prove, in Acts, 9, 22. Natural men who judge spiritual men, living according to the mind of God (“We have the mind of Christ”), are virtually wishing to instruct God, and bring Him to another mind, as counsellors setting to right their king. we have the mind of Christ—in our degree of capability to apprehend it. Isaiah, 46, refers to JEHOVAH; therefore, as it is applied here to Christ, He is Jehovah.

CHAPTER III.

VER. 1-23. ST. PAUL COULD NOT SPEAK TO THEM OF DEEP SPIRITUAL TRUTHS, AS THEY WERE CARNAL, CONTENTING FOR THEIR SEVERAL TEACHERS; THERE ARE NOTHING, BUT WORKERS FOR GOD, TO WHOM THEY MUST GIVE ACCOUNT IN THE DAY OF FIERY JUDGMENT. THE HEARERS ARE GOD’S TEMPLE, WHICH THEY MUST NOT DEFILE BY CONTENTIONS FOR TEACHERS, WHO, AS WELL AS ALL THINGS, ARE THEIRS, BEING CHRIST’S. 1. AND I—i.e., as the natural (animal) man cannot receive, so I also could not speak unto you the deep things of God, as I would to the spiritual; but I was compelled to speak to you as I would to MEN OF FLESH. The oldest MSS. read this

The former (lit., fleshy) implies men or natural. Carnal, or fleshy, implies were wholly natural or unregenerate that they had much of a carnal tendency; idola. St. Paul had to speak to them as men wholly natural, inasmuch as they of (v. 3) in many respects, notwithstanding (ch. 1. 4-9). babes—contrasted of (fully matured) in Christ (Colossians, 2, 13, 14). This implies they were not flesh, though carnal in tendencies. They felt, but it was weak. He blames them in a degree (not altogether, cf. ch. 1. 5, 7; ye "as") babes in Christ, when by this it is to have "come unto a perfect man, to the stature of the fulness of Christ" etc. In Romans, 7, 14, also the oldest man a man of flesh. 2. (Hebrews, 6. 12.) necessary "principles of the doctrine of 11. 2. envying—jealousy, rivalry. As their feelings, "strife" refers to their visions to their visions. [BENGEL.] vision, or ascending climax: envying had, and strife divisions (factious parties). In language becomes severer now as He 1. 11, he had only said "contentions," in the words (of the stronger term, ch. 1. 2, 23). carnal—for "strife" is a "work situation, a 23. The "flesh" includes all in not at the glory of God, and the good is, but at gratifying self. walk as men see men (cf. Matthew, 16. 23). "After the Spirit of God, as becomes you of the Spirit (Romans, 8. 4; Galatians, 5. 1. 12.) are ye not carnal—the oldest MSS. not men" (i.e., "walking as men") unre- & Paul...Apollon—the oldest MSS. read vider, Apollon...Paul. He puts Apollon in humility, who then—seeing then that strive so for your favourite teachers, hat intrinsic power and dignity) Paul? poetle reasons so of himself, how much ability, rather than self-seeking, become stern, but ministers, &c.—the oldest "but." "Who is Apollon...Paul? (mere) ry word appropriate here, servants), by a whom?" by whose ministrations) ye Lord gave to every man—i.e., to the sever it was God that "gave the increase" mind. Apollon watered—(Acts, 18. 1; 19. 1), own desire (Acts, 18. 27) was sent by the rinth, and there followed up the work it had begun. God gave the increase— (v. 10; Acts, 18. 27). "Believed through ministers are nothing, and God all works by instruments, and promises in the faithful use of means. This is of the Spirit, and ours is the ministry 7. neither is he that...any thing...but God all. "God" is emphatically last in the at giveth the increase (namely, God.) parenthesis from v. 8. to v. 31, where glory in MAN stands in antithetic con- & one—essentially in their aim they d in one and the same ministry; there: not to be made by you the occasion of is parties, and every man—rather, "but though in their service or ministry, they "one," yet every minister is separately "his own" work, and "shall receive his ally repeated) reward, according to his be reward is something over and above ion (v. 14, 15; 2 John, 8). He shall be rding so, not his success or the amount but "according to his own labour." It shall be said to him, "Well done, thou good and (not successful, but) faithful servant, enter thou into the joy of thy Lord" (Matthew, 25. 23). 9. Translate, as the Greek collocation of words, and the emphasis on "God" thrice repeated, requires, "For (in proof that) each shall receive reward according to his own labour," vis., from God) it is of God that we are the fellow-workers (labouring with, but under, and belonging to Him as His servants, 2 Corinthians, 5. 20; 6. 1; cf. Acts, 15. 4; Note, 1 Thessalonians, 3. 2) of God that ye are the field, (or tillage), of God that ye are the building." [ALFORD.] "Building" is a new image introduced here, as suited better than that of husbandry, to set forth the different kinds of teaching and their results, which he is now about to discuss. "To edify" or "build up" the Church of Christ is similarly used (Ephesians, 2. 21, 22; 4. 29). 10. grace. . . given unto me—St. Paul puts this first, to guard against seeming to want humility, in pronouncing himself "a WISE master-builder," in the clause following. [CHRYSOBOSTOM.] The "grace" is that "given" to him in common with all Christians (v. 8), only proportioned to the work which God had for him to do. [ALFORD.] wise—i.e., skilful. His skill is shown in his laying a foundation. The unskilful builder lays none (Luke, 6. 49). Christ is the foundation (v. 11), another—who ever comes after me. He does not name Apollon; for he speaks generally of all successors, who ever they be. His warning, "Let every man (every teacher) take heed how," &c., refers to other successors rather than Apollon, who doubtless did not, as they, build wood, hay, &c., on the foundation (cf. ch. 4. 14). "I have done my part, let them who follow me see (so the Greek for "take heed") to theirs." [BENGEL.] how—with what material. [ALFORD.] How far wisely, and in builder-like style (1 Peter, 4. 11). bulldeth thereupon—here the building or superstructure raised on Christ the "foundation," laid by Paul (ch. 2. 2) is not, as in Ephesians, 2. 20, 21, the Christian Church made up of believers, the "lively stones" (1 Peter, 2. 5), but the doctrinal and practical teaching which the teachers who succeeded Paul, superadded to his first teaching; not that they taught what was false, but their teaching was subtle and speculative reasoning, rather than solid and simple truth. 11. (Isaiah, 28. 16; Acts, 4. 13; Ephesians, 2. 20.) For—my warning ("take heed," &c., v. 10) is as to the superstructure ("bulldeth thereupon"), not as to the foundation: "For other foundation can no man lay, than that which has (already) been laid (by God) Jesus Christ," the person, not the mere abstract doctrine about Him, though the latter also is included; Jesus, GOD-SAVIOUR; Christ, MESSIAH or ANointed. can—a man can not lay any other, since the only one recognised by God has been already laid. 12. Now—rather, "But". The image is that of a building on a solid foundation, and partly composed of durable and precious, partly of perishable materials. The "gold, silver, precious stones," which all can bear fire (Revelation, 21. 18, 19), are teachings that will stand the fiery test of judgment; "wood, hay, stubble," are those which cannot stand it; not positive heresy, for that would destroy the foundation, but teaching mixed up with human philosophy and Judaism, curious rather than useful. Besides the teachings, the superstructure represents also the persons cemented to the Church by them, the reality of whose conversion, through the teachers' instrumentality, will be tested at the last day. Where there is the least grain of real gold of faith, it shall never be lost (1 Peter, 1. 7; cf. ch. 4. 12). On the other hand, the lightest straw feeds the fire [BENGEL.] (Matthew, 5. 19). 13. Every man's work—Each teacher's superstructure on the foundation. the day—of the Lord (ch. 1. 8; Hebrews, 10. 25; 1 Thessalonians, 5. 4). The article is emphatic, "The day," i.e., the great day of days, the long expected day. declares it—old English for "make it clear" (ch.

6. 5). It shall be revealed by fire—i. e., "every man's work." Rather, "He, the Lord, whose day it is (3 Thessalonians, 1. 7, 8). Translates He, "Is being revealed (the present in the Greek implies the certainty and nearness of the event, Revelation, 22. 10, 20) in fire" (Malachi, 2. 2, 3; 4. 1). The fire (probably figurative here, as the gold, hay, &c.) is not purgatory (as Rome teaches, i. e., purgatory and punitive), but probatory, not restricted to those dying in "venial sin;" the supposed intermediate class between those entering heaven at once, and those dying in mortal sin who go to hell, but answered, testing the godly and ungodly alike (3 Corinthians, 5. 10; cf. Mark, 9. 49). This fire is not till the last day, the supposed fire of purgatory begins at death. The fire of St. Paul is to try the works, the fire of purgatory the persons, of men. St. Paul's fire consumes "loss" to the sufferers: Rome's purgatory, great gain, etc., heaven at last to those purged by it, if only it were true. Thus this passage, quoted by Rome for, is altogether against, purgatory. "It was not this doctrine that gave rise to prayers for the dead; but the practice of praying for the dead (which crept in from the affectionate but mistaken solicitude of survivors) gave rise to the doctrine." [WHEATLY.] 14. Abide—abide the testing fire (Matthew, 3. 11, 12). which he hath built thereupon—which he built on the foundation, reward—scopus, as a builder, i. e., teacher. His converts built on Christ the foundation, through his faithful teaching, shall be his "crown of rejoicing" (3 Corinthians, 1. 16; Philippians, 2. 16; 1 Thessalonians, 2. 19). 15. If ... be burnt—if any teacher's work consist of such materials as the fire will destroy. [ALFORD.] suffer loss—i. e., forfeit the special "reward;" not that he shall lose salvation (which is altogether a free gift, not a "reward" or wages) for he remains still on the foundation (v. 12; 2 John, 8). saved; yet so as by fire—rather, "so as through fire" (Zechariah, 3. 2; Amos, 4. 11; Jude, 23). "Saved, yet not without fire" (Romans, 2. 27). [BENGL.] As a builder whose building, not the foundation, is consumed by fire, escapes, but with the loss of his work, [ALFORD] as the shipwrecked merchant, though he has lost his merchandise, is saved, though having to pass through the waves. [BENGL.] Malachi, 3. 1, 2; and 4. 1, give the key to explain the imagery. The "Lord suddenly coming to His temple" in flaming "fire," all the parts of the building which will not stand that fire, will be consumed; the builders will escape with personal salvation, but with the loss of their work, through the midst of the conflagration. [ALFORD.] Again, a distinction is recognised between minor and fundamental doctrines (if we regard the superstructure as representing the doctrines super-added to the elementary essentials); a man may err as to the former, and yet be saved, but not so as to the latter (cf. Philippians, 3. 16). 16. Know ye not—it is no new thing I tell you, in calling you "God's building;" ye know and ought to remember, ye are the noblest kind of building, "the temple of God." ye—all Christians form together one vast temple. The expression is not, "ye are temples," but "ye are the temple" collectively, and "lively stones" (1 Peter, 2. 5) individually. God ... Spirit—God's indwelling, and that of the Holy Spirit, are one; therefore the Holy Spirit is God. No literal "temple" is recognised by the New Testament in the Christian church. The only one is the spiritual temple, the whole body of believing worshippers which the Holy Spirit dwells in (ch. 6. 19; John, 4. 23, 24). The synagogue, not the temple, was the model of the Christian house of worship. The temple was the house of sacrifice, rather than of prayer. Prayers in the temple were silent and individual (Luke, 1. 10; 18. 10-13), not joint and public, nor with reading of Scripture, as in the synagogue. The temple, as the name means (from a Greek root "to dwell"), was the earthly dwelling-place of God, where alone He put His name. The synagogue (as the name means an assembly) was the place for assembling men. God now too has His earthly temple, not one of wood and stone, but the congregation of believers, the "living stones" on the "spiritual house." Believers are all spiritual priests in It. Jesus Christ, our High Priest, has the only literal priesthood (Malachi, 1. 11; Matthew, 18. 20; 1 Peter, 2. 9). [VITTIPO.] 17. If any... edificatio—rather, as the Greek verb is the same in both cases, "destroy... destroy." God repays in kind by a righteous retaliation. The destroyer shall himself be destroyed. As temporal death was the penalty of marring the material temple (Leviticus, 24. 3; Daniel, 5. 2, 3, 20), so eternal death is the penalty of marring the spiritual temple—the Church. The destroyers here (v. 16, 17), are distinct from the operarios or unskilful builders (v. 13, 14); the latter had fast the "foundation" (v. 11), and, therefore, though they lose their work of superstructure and the special reward, yet they are themselves saved; the destroyers, on the contrary, assailed with false teaching the foundation, and so subvert the temple itself, and shall therefore be destroyed. (See Note, v. 14.) [ESTIUS & HAZARD.] I think St. Paul passes here from the teachers to all the members of the Church, who, by profession, are "priests unto God" (Exodus, 19. 6; 1 Peter, 2. 9; Revelation, 1. 6). As the Aaronic priests were doomed to die if they violated the old temple (Exodus, 31. 43), so any Christian who violates the sanctity of the spiritual temple, shall perish eternally (Hebrews, 13. 14; 10. 29, 31). holy—inviolable (Habakkuk, 2. 20). which temple ye are—rather, "the which (i. e., holy) are ye." [ALFORD] and, therefore, want of holiness on the part of any of you (or, as ESTIUS, "to tamper with the foundation in teaching you") is a violation of the temple, which cannot be let to pass with impunity. GROTIUS supports English Version. 18. seemeth—i. e., is, and is regarded by himself and others. wise in this world—wise in mere worldly wisdom (ch. 1. 20). let him become a fool—by receiving the gospel in its unworshiped simplicity, and so becoming a fool in the world's sight. [ALFORD.] Let him no longer think himself wise, but seek the true wisdom from God, bringing his understanding into captivity to the obedience of faith. [ESTIUS.] 19. with God—in the judgment of God. It is written—in Job, 5. 13. The formula of quoting SCRIPTURE used here, establishes the canonicity of Job. He taketh... wise in... own craftiness—proving the "foolishness" of the world's wisdom, since it is made by God the very snare to catch those who think themselves so wise. Lit., He who taketh, &c. the whole of the sentence not being quoted, but only the part which suited St. Paul's purpose. 20. Quotation from Psalm 94. 11. There it is of men; here it is "of the wise." St. Paul by inspiration states the class of men whose "thoughts" (or rather, "reasonings," as suits the Greek and the sense of the context) the Spirit designated in the psalm, "vanity," etc., the "proud" (v. 2) and worldly-wise, whom God in v. 8 calls "fools," though they "boast themselves" of their wisdom in pushing their interests (v. 4). 21. let no man glory in men—resuming the subject from v. 4; cf. ch. 1. 12, and 31, where the true object of glorying is stated: "he that glorieth let him glory in THE LORD" Also ch. 4. 6, "That no one of you be puffed up for one against another." For all things—not only all men. For you to glory thus in men, is lowering yourselves from your high position as heirs of all things. All men (including your teachers) belong to Christ, and therefore to you, by your union with Him: He makes them and all things work together for your good (Romans, 8. 28). Ye are not for the sake of them, but they for the sake of you 3 Corinthians, 4. 6, 16). They belong to you, not you to them. 22. Enumeration of some of the "all things." The teachers, in whom they gloried, he puts first (ch. 1. 12). He omits after "Cephas" or Christ (to whom exclusively Corinth (ch. 1. 12) professed to belong; but, substitutes "ye are Christ's" (v. 23). world... things present... things to come—not only not "separate you from the love of God in Romans, 8. 38, 39), but they "all are yours," or you (Romans, 8. 28), and belong to you, along to Christ your Head (Hebrews, 1. 2). sent—"things actually present." [ALFORD.] Christ's—not Paul's, or Apollo's, or Cepha's (Matthew, 23. 8-10). "Neither be ye called by one is your Master, even Christ" (Romans, 8. merely a particular section of you, but ye Christ's (ch. 1. 12). Christ is God's—(ch. 11. 3). ultimate end of all, even of Christ, His co- (ch. 15. 28; Philippians, 2. 6-11).

CHAPTER IV.

TRUE VIEW OF MINISTERS: THE JUDGMENT TO BE FORESTALLLED MEANWHILE THE LOW STATE CONTRASTS WITH THE CORINTHIAN PRIDE, NOT THAT ST. PAUL WOULD HUMBLY, BUT AS A FATHER WARN THEM; FOR HE SENT TIMOTHY, AND WILL SOON COME HIMSELF. 1. account... us—Paul and Apollos. ministers—not heads of the Church in whom ye glory to glory (ch. 1. 12); the headship belongs alone: we are but His servants ministering to you. 1. 13; 3. 5, 22). stewards—(Luke, 12. 42; 16). Not the depositories of grace, but dischargers ("rightly dividing" or dispensing it), so give us it, to others. The Chazan, or over-synagogue answered to the bishop or "angel" arch, who called seven of the synagogue to see every sabbath, and oversaw them. The arch of the synagogue, like the ancient "deacon" arch, took care of the poor (Acts, 6.), and subordinated in subordination to the presbytery, as Stephen and Philip did. The church appendage to the priesthood; but the minister-steward of God to the church. Man shrinks close contact with God, hence he willingly ascribed between, and would serve God by the Pagan like the modern Romish priest, rather to conceal than to explain "the mysteries

The minister's office is to "preach" (1st. as a herald, Matthew, 10. 27) the deep truths mysteries," heavenly truths, only known by faith, so far as they have been revealed, and so hearers are disposed to receive them. Joseph, the Jewish religion made known to all the mysteries of their religion, whilst the Pagans from all but the "initiated" few, the mysteries. 2. Moreover—The oldest MSS. read, HERE "i.e., on earth). The contrast thus man's usage as to stewards (v. 2), and God's Though here below, in the case of stewards, made, that one may be found (i.e., proved to be); yet God's steward awaits no such judgment, in man's day, but the Lord's judgment in day. Another argument against the Corinthian partial preferences of certain teachers: whereas what God requires in His stewardship (1 Samuel, 3. 20; Hebrews, 3. 5; Mandate is required in earthly stewards, but difference (v. 3), that God's stewards wait no judgment to test them, but the testing which in the day of the Lord. 3. it is a very small matter... it amounts to a very small matter;" not upon your judgment, but as compared with almost comes to nothing. judged... of man's life, "man's day," contrasted with the day of the Lord (v. 5; 1 Thessalonians, 5. 4). "The one is here put before us as a person. [WAHL.] previous to the day of the Lord are man's days, unstates the thrice recurring Greek for judged judgeth (v. 4), thus: To me for my part (though capable of being found faithful) it is a very small matter that I should be approved of by man's judgment; yes, I do not even assume the right of judgment and approving myself,—but He that has the right, and is able to judge on my case (the Djudicator), is the Lord. 4. by myself—translate, "I am conscious to myself of no (ministerial) unfaithfulness." BENOET explains the Greek compound, "to decide in judgments on one in relation to others," not simply to judge, as I am hereby justified—Therefore conscience is not an infallible guide. St. Paul did not consider his so. This verse is directly against the judicial power claimed by the priests of Rome. 5. Disproving the judicial power claimed by the Romish priesthood in the confessional, therefore—as the Lord is the sole Decider or Djudicator. Judge—not the same Greek word as in v. 3, 4, where the meaning is to approve of, or decide on, the merits of one's case. Here all judgments in general are forbidden, which would, on our part, presumptuously forestall God's prerogative of final judgment. Lord—Jesus Christ, whose "ministers" we are (v. 1), and who is to be the judge (John, 8. 22, 27; Acts 10. 42; 17. 31). manifest... hearts—our judgments now (as those of the Corinthians respecting their teachers) are necessarily defective, as we only see the outward act, we cannot see the motives of "hearts." "Faithfulness" (v. 2) will hereby be estimated, and the "Lord" will "justify," or the reverse (v. 4), according to the state of the heart, then shall every man have praise—ch. 3. 8; 1 Samuel, 20. 23; Matthew, 25. 21, 23, 28.). Rather, "his due praise," not exaggerated praise, such as the Corinthians heaped on favourite teachers; "THE praise" (so the Greek; due for acts estimated by the motives. "Then;" not before; therefore wait till then (James, 5. 7). 6. And—"Now," marking transition, in a figure transferred to myself—i.e., I have represented under the persons of Apollos and myself what really holds good of all teachers, making us two a figure or type of all the others. I have mentioned us two, whose names have been used as a party cry; but under our names I mean others to be understood, whom I do not name, in order not to shame you. [ESTIUS.] not to think, &c.—the best MSS. omit "think." Translate, "That in us (as your example) ye might learn (this), not (to go) beyond what is written." Revere the silence of holy writ, as much as its declarations: so you will less dogmatize on what is not expressly revealed (Deuteronomy, 29. 29). puffed up for one—viz., "for one (favourite minister) against another." The Greek indicative implies, "That ye be not puffed up AS YE ARE." 7. Translate, "Who distinguisheth thee (above another)?" not thyself, but God, glory, as if thou hadst not received it—as if it was to thyself, not to God, thou owest the receiving of it. 8. Irony. Translate, "Already ye are filled full (with spiritual food), already ye are rich, ye have seated yourselves upon your throne as kings, without us." The emphasis is on "already" and "without us;" ye act as if ye needed no more to "hunger and thirst after righteousness," and as if already ye had reached the "kingdom" for which Christians have to strive and suffer. Ye are so puffed up with your favourite teachers, and your own fancied spiritual attainments in knowledge through them, that ye feel like those "filled full" at a feast, or as a "rich" man priding himself in his riches; so ye feel ye can now do "without us," your first spiritual fathers (v. 15). They forgot that before the "kingdom" and the "fulness of joy," at the marriage feast of the Lamb, must come the cross, and suffering, to every true believer (2 Timothy, 2. 5, 11, 12). They were like the self-complacent Laodiceans (Revelation, 3. 17; cf. Hosea, 12. 8). Temporal fulness and riches doubtless tended in some cases at Corinth, to generate this spiritual self-sufficiency; the contrast to the apostle's literal "hunger and thirst" (v. 11) proves this. I would... ye did reign—translate, "I would indeed," &c., and I would truly it were so, and that your kingdom had really begun, that we also might reign with you—(2 Corinthians, 12, 14). "I seek not yours, but you." Your spiritual prosperity would redound to that of us, your fathers in Christ (ch. 9, 23). When you reach the kingdom, you shall be our "crown of rejoicing, in the presence of our Lord Jesus" (1 Thessalonians, 2, 19). 9. For—assigning the reason for desiring that the "reign" of himself and his fellow-apostles with the Corinthians were come, via, the present afflictions of the former. I talk—the Corinthians (ch. 3, 18) "seemed" to fit, as here, "thought" themselves "wise in this world." St. Paul, in contrast, "thinks" that God has sent forth him and his fellow-ministers "last," i.e., the lowest in this world. The apostles fared worse than even the prophets, who, though sometimes afflicted, were often honoured (2 Kings, 1, 10; 5, 9; 8, 9, 12), set forth—as a spectacle or gasingstock, as the apostles—St. Paul includes Apollos with the apostles, in the broader sense of the word, so Romans, 16, 7; 3 Corinthians, 8, 23 (Great for "messengers," apostles), as it were appointed to death—as criminals condemned to die. made a spectacle—fit, a theatrical spectacle. So the Great in Hebrews, 10, 23, "made a gasingstock by reproaches and afflictions." Criminals "condemned to die," in St. Paul's time, were exhibited as a gasingstock to amuse the populace in the amphitheatre. They were "set forth last" in the show, to fight with wild beasts. This explains the imagery of St. Paul here. (Cf. Tertullian de Pudicitia, ch. 14), the world—to the whole world, including "both angels and men"—"the whole family in heaven and earth" (Ephesians, 3, 16). As Jesus was "seen of angels" (1 Timothy, 3, 16), so His followers are a spectacle to the holy angels who take a deep interest in all the progressive steps of redemption (Ephesians, 3, 10; 1 Peter, 1, 12). St. Paul tacitly implies that, though "last" and lowest in the world's judgment, Christ's servants are deemed by angels a spectacle worthy of their most intense regard. (Cf. ЧЕРНОБОМ.) However, since "the world" is a comprehensive expression, and is applied in this epistle to the evil especially (ch. 1, 27, 28), and since the spectators (in the image drawn from the amphitheatre) gaze at the show with savage delight, rather than sympathy for the sufferers, I think bad angels are included, besides good angels. ESTIUS makes the bad alone to be meant. But the generality of the term "angels," and its frequent use in a good sense, as well as Ephesians, 3, 10; 1 Peter, 1, 12, incline me to include good as well as bad angels, though, for the reasons stated above, the bad may be principally meant. 10. Irony. How much your lot (supposing it real) is to be envied, and ours to be pitied, fools—(ch. 1, 21; 3, 15; cf. Acts, 17, 18; 29, 24). for Christ's sake, ... in Christ—our connexion with Christ only entails on us the lowest ignominy, "ON ACCOUNT OF," or, "FOR THE SAKE OF" Him, as "fools"; yours gives you full fellowship in Him as "wise" (i.e., supposing you really are all you seem, ch. 3, 18). we . . . weak . . . ye . . . strong—(ch. 2, 3; 2 Corinthians, 13, 9). we, despised—2 Corinthians, 10, 10 because of our "weakness," and our not using worldly philosophy and rhetoric, on account of which ye Corinthians and your teachers are (seemingly) so "honourable." Contrast with "despised" the "ye (Galatians) despised not my temptation, in my flesh" 11. (3 Corinthians, 11, 23-27), naked—i.e., insufficiently clad (Romans, 8, 35), buffeted—as a slave (1 Peter, 2, 20), the reverse of the state of the Corinthians, "reigning as kings" (Acts, 23, 2). So Paul's master before him was "buffeted" as a slave, when about to die a slave's death (Matthew, 26, 67). 12, working with our own hands—viz., "even unto this present hour" (v. 13). This is not stated in the narrative of St. Paul's proceedings at Ephesus, from which city he wrote this epistle though it is expressly stated of him at Corinth, cf.

Acts, 18, 2, &c., and 18. But in his address to the Ephesian elders at Miletus (Acts, 20, 34), he says, "Ye yourselves know that these hands have ministered unto my necessities," &c. The undesignedness of the coincidence thus indirectly brought out is incompatible with forgery. 13. despised, we esteem—viz., God for our despisers, as Christ enjoined (Matthew, 5, 18, 44). (Glossaria.) We reply gently. (ERRATA.) 14th—"The refuse," (COWPERMAN & HOWSON) the sweepings or rubbish thrown out after a cleaning, of all things—not of the "world" only. 14. warn—rather, "admonish" as a father uses "admonition" to "beloved sons," not provoking them to wrath (Ephesians, 4, 4). The Corinthians might well be "ashamed" at the disparity of state between the father, St. Paul, and his spiritual children, themselves. 15. ten thousand—implying that the Corinthians had more of them than was desirable. instructors—tutors who had the care of rearing, but had not the rights, or peculiar affection, of the father, who alone had begotten them spiritually, in Christ—St. Paul admits that these "instructors" were not mere legalists, but evangelical teachers. He uses however, a stronger phrase of himself in begetting them spiritually, "In Christ Jesus," implying both the Saviour's office and person. As Paul was the means of spiritually regenerating them, and yet "baptized none of them save Crispus, Gaius, and the household of Stephanus," regeneration cannot be inseparably in and by baptism (ch. 1, 14-17). 16. be ye followers of me—lit., imitators, viz., in my ways, which be in Christ (3, 17; ch. 11, 1), not in my crosses (e. 8-13; Acts, 26, 29; Galatians, 4, 12). 17. For this cause—that ye may the better "be followers of me" (v. 10), through his admonitions, sent . . . Timothy—(ch. 16, 10; Acts, 19, 21, 22). "Paul purposed, . . . when he had passed through Macedonia and Achaia, to go to Jerusalem.—So he sent into Macedonia Timothy and Erastus." Here it is not expressly said, he sent Timothy unto Achaia (of which Corinth was capital), but it is implied, for he sent him with Erastus before him. As he therefore purposed to go into Achaia himself, there is every probability they were to go thither also. They are said only to have been sent into Macedonia, because it was the country to which they went immediately from Ephesus. The undesignedness of the coincidence establishes the genuineness of both the epistle and the history. In both, Timothy's journey is closely connected with St. Paul's own (cf. v. 19). Erastus is not specified in the epistle, probably because it was Timothy who was charged with St. Paul's orders, and possibly Erastus was a Corinthian, who, in accompanying Timothy, was only returning home. The seeming discrepancy at least shows that the passages were not taken from one another. (PALEY'S Horæ Paulinæ.) son—i.e., converted by me (cf. v. 14, 15; Acts, 14, 6; 7; with 1d. 1; 1 Timothy, 1, 2, 18; 3 Timothy, 1, 2). Translate, "My son, beloved and faithful in the Lord." bring you into remembrance—Timothy, from his spiritual connexion with St. Paul, as converted by him, was best suited to remind them of the apostle's walk and teaching (3 Timothy, 3, 10), which they in some respects, though not altogether (ch. 11, 2) had forgotten. As I teach . . . in every church—an argument implying that what the Spirit directed St. Paul to teach "every where" else, must be necessary at Corinth also (ch. 7, 17). 18. Sime . . . as though I would not come—he guards against some misconstruing (as by the Spirit he foresees they will, when his letter shall have arrived), his sending Timothy, "as though" he "would not come" (or, "were not coming") himself. A putted up spirit was the besetting sin of the Corinthians (cf. ch. 1, 11; 5, 2). 19. ALFORD translates, "But come I will;" an emphatical negation of their supposition (v. 15). shortly—after Pentecost (ch. 16, 8). if the Lord will—a wise proviso (James, 4, 14). He does not seem to have been able to son as he intended, and will know—take cognate of, but the power—I care not for their high speech," "but" what I desire to know is power," whether they be really powerful in the or not. The predominant feature of Grecian or, a love for power of discourse, rather than godliness, showed itself at Corinth. 20, kinged is not in word—translate, as in v. 19, to which hence is, "speech." Not empty "speeches," but effect "power" of the Spirit attests the presence kingdom of God" (the reign of the gospel spirit in a church or in an individual (cf. ch. 2. 1, 4; slonians, 1. 5). 21. with a rod, or in love—the reposition is used in both clauses: must I come leisure to exercise the rod, or in love, and the f meekness (Isaiah, 11. 4; 2 Corinthians, 13. 3).

Paul speaking of himself uses the 'spirit' of Christ, "power." Christ's power mised to be present with His church "gathered r in His name" (Matthew, 18. 18-20); and here l by inspiration gives a special promise of his ic spirit, which in such cases was guided by the Holy Spirit, ratifying their decree passed according to his judgment ("I have judged," v. 3), as though he were present in person (John, 20. 21-23; 2 Corinthians, 13. 3-10). This power of infallible judgment was limited to the apostles; for they alone had the power of working miracles as their credentials to attest their infallibility. Their successors, to establish their claim to the latter, must produce the former (2 Corinthians, 12. 12). Even the apostles in ordinary cases, and where not specially and consciously inspired, were fallible (Acts, 8. 13, 23; Galatians, 2. 11-14). 5. Besides excommunication (which the Corinthians themselves had the power of), St. Paul delegates here to the Corinthian church his own special power as an apostle, of inflicting corporeal disease or death in punishment for sin ("to deliver to Satan such an one," i.e., so heinous a sinner). For instances of this power, see Acts, 5. 1-11; 13. 11; 1 Timothy, 1. 20. As Satan receives power at times to try the godly, as Job (Job, 2. 4-7) and Paul (2 Corinthians, 12. 7; cf. also as to Peter, Luke, 22. 31), much more the ungodly, Satan, the "accuser of the brethren" (Re. 12. 10) and the "adversary" (1 Peter, 5. 8), demands the sinner for punishment on account of sin (Zechariah, 3. 1). When God lets Satan have his way, He is said to "deliver the sinner unto Satan" (cf. Psalm 109. 8). Here it is not finally; but for the affliction of the body with disease, and even death (ch. 11. 30, 32), so as to destroy fleshly lust. He does not say, "for the destruction of the body," for it shall share in redemption (Romans, 8. 23); but of the corrupt "flesh" which "cannot inherit the kingdom of God," and the lusts of which had prompted this offender to incest (Romans, 7. 5; 8. 9, 10). The "destruction of the flesh" answers to "mortify the deeds of the body" (Romans, 8. 13), only that the latter is done by one's self, the former is effected by chastisement from God (cf. 1 Peter, 4. 6), the spirit... saved—the spiritual part of man, in the believer the organ of the Holy Spirit. Temporary affliction often leads to permanent salvation (Psalm 83. 16). 6. Your glorying in your own attainments and those of your favourite teachers (ch. 3. 21; 4. 19; 5. 2), whilst all the while ye connive at such a scandal, is quite unseemly. a little leaven leaveneth... whole lump—(Galatians, 5. 9), viz., with present complicity in the guilt, and the danger of future contagion (ch. 15. 33; 2 Timothy, 2. 17). 7. old leaven—The remnant of the "old" (Ephesians, 4. 22-24) heathenish and natural corruption. The image is taken from the extreme care of the Jews in searching every corner of their houses, and "purging out" every particle of leaven from the time of killing the lamb before the Passover (Deuteronomy, 16. 3, 4). So Christians are continually to search and purify their hearts (Psalm 139. 23, 24), as ye are unleavened—normally, and as far as your Christian calling is concerned: free from the leaven of sin and death (ch. 6. 11). St. Paul often grounds exhortations on the assumption of Christian professors' normal state as realized (Romans, 6. 3, 4). [ALFORD.] Regarding the Corinthian church as the Passover "unleavened lump" or mass, he entreats them to correspond in fact with this their normal state. "For Christ our Passover (Exodus, 12. 5-11, 21-23; John, 1. 29) has been (English Version, "is") sacrificed for us;" i.e., as the Jews began the days of unleavened bread with the slaying of the Passover lamb, so, Christ our Passover having been already slain, let there be no leaven of evil in you who are the "unleavened lump." Doubtless he alludes to the Passover which had been two or three weeks before kept by the Jewish Christians (ch. 16. 8): the Gentile Christians probably also refraining from leavened bread at the love feasts. Thus the Jewish Passover naturally gave place to our Christian Easter. The time, however, of keeping feast (metaphorical; i.e., leading the Christian life of joy in Christ's finished work, cf. Proverbs, 15. 15) among us Christians, corresponding to the Jewish Passover, is not limited, as the latter to one season, but is ALL our time: for the transcendent benefits of the once for all completed sacrifice of our Passover Lamb extends to all the time of our lives and of this Christian dispensation: in no part of our time is the heaven of evil to be admitted. "For even" an additional reason, besides that in v. 6, and a more cogent one for purging out every leaven of evil, viz., that Christ has been already sacrificed, whereas the old leaven is yet unremoved, which ought to have been long ago purged out. 8. net...old leaven—of our unconverted state as Jews or heathen. malice—the opposite of "sincerity," which allows no leaven of evil to be mixed up with good (Matthew, 16. 6). wickedness—the opposite of "truth," which allows not evil to be mistaken for good. The Greek for "malice" means the evil Ahab's of mind; "wickedness," the outcoming of the same in word and deed. The Greek for "sincerity" expresses lit. a thing which, when examined by the sun's light, is found pure and unadulterated. 9. I wrote... in an epistle—rather, "in THE epistle;" a former one not now extant. That St. Paul does not refer to the present letter is proved by the fact that no direction "not to company with fornicators" occurs in the previous part of it; also the words, "in an or the epistle," could not have been added if he meant, "I have just written" (2 Corinthians, 10. 10). "His letters" (plural; not applying to merely one) confirm this. 3 Corinthians, 7. 8, also refers to our first epistle, just as here a former letter is referred to by the same phrase. St. Paul probably wrote a former brief reply to enquiries of the Corinthians: our first epistle, as it enters more fully into the same subject, has superseded the former, which the Holy Spirit did not design for the guidance of the church in general, and which therefore has not been preserved. See my Introduction, 10. Limitation of the prohibition alluded to in v. 9: As in dissolute Corinth to "company with no fornicators," &c., would be almost to company with none in the unbelieving world; ye need not utterly "altogether" forego intercourse with fornicators, &c., of the unbelieving world (cf. ch. 10. 17; 1 John, 5. 18, 19). As "fornicators" sin against themselves; so "extortioners" against their neighbours, and "idolaters" against God. The attempt to get "out of the world," in violation of God's will that believers should remain in it but keep themselves from its evil, led to monasticism and its consequent evils. 11. But now I have written—"Now" does not express time, but "the case being so," viz., that to avoid fornicators," &c., of the world, you would have to leave the world altogether, which would be absurd. So "now" is used, Hebrews, 11. 16. Thus we avoid making the apostle now retract a command which he had before given. I have written—i.e., my meaning in the letter I wrote, was, &c. a broker—contrasted with a "fornicator, &c., of the world" v. 10. There is less danger in associating with open worldlings than with carnal professors. Here, as in Ephesians, 5. 3, 5, "covetousness" is joined with "fornication;" the common fount of both being "the fierce and ever fiercer longing of the creature, which has turned from God, to fill itself with the inferior objects of sense." [TRENCH, Syn. New Testament.] Hence "idolatry" is associated with them: and the covetous man is termed an "idolater" (Numbers, 25. 1, 2). The Corinthians did not fall into open idolatry, but ate things offered to idols, so making a compromise with the heathen; just as they connived at fornication. Thus this verse prepares for the precepts, ch. 8. 4, &c. Cf. the similar case of fornication, combined with a similar idolatrous compromise, after the pattern of Israel with the Midianites (Revelation, 2. 14). no not to eat—not to sit at the same table with such: whether at the love feasts (Agape) or in private intercourse, much more at the Lord's table: at the last, too often now the guests "are not as children in one family, but like a heterogeneous crowd of strangers in an inn" (BARNES) (cf. Galatians, 2. 15; 2 John, 10. 11). 12. what have I to do—You might have easily understood that my concern is not with unbelievers outside the church, but that I referred to those within it, also—implying, These within give me enough to do without those outside. do not ye, &c.—Ye judge your fellow-citizens, not strangers: much more should I. [BARNES.] Rather, Is it not your duty to judge those that are within? God shall judge those that are without: do you look at home. [GROTIUS.] God is the Judge of the salvation of the heathen, not we (Romans, 2. 13-16). St. Paul here gives an anticipatory censure of their going to law with saints before heathen tribunals, instead of judging such causes among themselves within. 13. put away from among yourselves that which—Sentence of excommunication in language taken from Deuteronomy, 24. 7.

CHAPTER VI.

VER. 1-11. LITIGATION OF CHRISTIANS IN HEATHEN COURTS CENSURED: ITS VERY EXISTENCE DEBARRS A WRONG SPIRIT: BETTER TO BEAR WRONG NOW; AND HEREAFTER THE DOORS OF WRONG SHALL BE SHUT OUT OF HEAVEN. 1. Dare—This word implies treason against Christian brotherhood. [BARNES.] before the unjust—The Gentile judges are here so termed by an epithet appropriate to the subject in question, viz., one concerning justice. Though all Gentiles are not altogether unjust, yet in the highest view of justice which has regard to God as the Supreme Judge, they are so: Christians, on the other hand, as regarding God as the only Fountain of justice, should not expect justice from them. before...saints—The Jews abroad were permitted to refer their disputes to Jewish arbitrators JOSHAPHAT'S, Antiquities 14. 10, 17). So the Christians were allowed to have Christian arbitrators. 2. Do ye not know—as a truth universally recognised by Christians. Notwithstanding all your glorying in your "knowledge," ye are acting contrary to it. ch. 1. 4, 5; 8. 1. The oldest MSS. have "Or before" "Know ye not;" &c., "What! (expressing surprise) know ye not;" &c. saints... judge—i.e., rule, including judgment; as assessors of Christ. Matthew, 19. 28, "judging;" i.e., ruling over. Cf. Psalm 69. 14; Daniel 7. 22, 27; Revelation, 2. 26; 3. 21; 20. 4. There is a distinction drawn by able expositors between the saints who judge or rule, and the world which is ruled by them: as there is between the elected (Matthew, 20. 23) twelve apostles who sit on thrones judging, and the twelve tribes of Israel that are judged by them. To reign, and to be ruled, are not necessarily synonymous. As Jehovah employed angels to carry the law into effect when He descended on Sinai to establish His throne in Israel, so at His coming the saints shall administer the kingdom for, and under, Him. The nations of the earth, and Israel the foremost, in the flesh, shall, in this view, be the subjects of the rule of the Lord and His saints in glorified bodies. The mistake of the Chiliasts was, they took the merely carnal view, restricting the kingdom to the terrestrial part. This part shall have place with the accession of spiritual and temporal blessings such as Christ's presence must produce. Besides this earthly glory, there shall be the heavenly glory of the saints reigning in transfigured bodies, and holding such blessed intercourse with mortal men, as angels had with men of old, and as Christ, Moses, and Elias, in glory had with Peter, James, and John, in the flesh at the transfiguration (2 Timothy, 2. 12; 3 Peter, 1. 16-18). But here the "world" seems to be the unbelieving world that is to be "condemned" ch. 11. 22., rather than the whole world, including the subject nations which are to be brought under Christ's sway; however, it may include both those to be condemned with the bad angels, and those about to be brought into obedience to the sway of Christ with His saints. Cf. Matthew, 25. 23, 29, "all nations," "these my brethren" on the thrones with Him. The event will decide the truth of this view, judged by you—or before you (cf. ch. 3, 23). smallest matters—The weightiest of earthly questions at issue are infinitely small compared with those to be decided on the judgment day. 3. Judge angels—viz., bad angels. We who are now "a spectacle to angels" shall then "judge angels." The saints shall join in approving the final sentence of the Judge on them (Jude, 6). Believers shall, as administrators of the kingdom under Jesus, put down all rule that is hostile to God. Perhaps, too, good angels shall then receive from the Judge, with the approval of the saints, higher honours. 4. Judgments—i.e., cases for judgment, least esteemed—id., those of no esteem. Any, however low in the church, rather than the heathen (ch. 1, 28). Questions of earthly property are of secondary consequence in the eyes of true Christians, and are therefore delegated to those in a secondary position in the church. 5. Your shame—Thus he checks their puffed up spirit (ch. 5, 2; cf. ch. 15, 34). To shame you out of your present unworthy course of litigation before the heathen, I have said (v. 4). "Set the least esteemed in the church to judge." Better even this, than your present course. IS IT SO?—Are you in such a helpless state that, &c. not a wise man—though ye admire "wisdom" so much on other occasions (ch. 1, 5, 22). St. Paul alludes probably to the title "Cacham," or wise man, applied to each Rabbi in Jewish councils, so, not one—not even one, amidst so many reputed among you for wisdom (ch. 3, 18; 4, 6). shall ye able—when applied to, brethren—id., brother; i.e., judge between brother and brother. As each case should arise, the arbitrator was to be chosen from the body of the church such a wise person as had the charism, or gift, of church government. 6. But—emphatically answering the question in the end of v. 5 in the negative. Translate, "Nay," &c. 7. utterly a fault—id., a shortcoming not so strong as sin). Your going to law at all is a falling short of your high privileges, not to say your doing so before unbelievers, which aggravates it, rather take wrong—(Proverbs, 20, 22; Matthew, 5, 29, 40); i.e., suffer yourselves to be wronged. 8. Ye—emphatic. Ye, whom your Lord commanded to return good for evil, on the contrary, "do wrong (by taking away and defraud" by retaining what is intrusted to you; or "defraud" marks the effect of the "wrong" done, viz., the loss inflicted). Not only do ye not bear, but ye inflict wrongs. 9. unrighteous—translate, "Doers of wrong" referring to v. 8 (cf. Galatians, 5, 21). Kingdom of God—which is a kingdom of righteousness (Romans, 14, 17). fornicators—alluding to ch. 5; also below, v. 12-18. effeminate—self-polluters, who submit to unnatural lusts. 11. ye are washed—The Greek middle voice expresses, "Ye have had yourselves washed." This washing implies the admission to the benefits of Christ's salvation generally; of which the parts are, (1.) Sanctification, or the setting apart from the world, and adoption into the church; so "sanctified" is used ch. 7, 14; John, 17, 19. Cf. 1 Peter, 1, 2, where it rather seems to mean the setting apart of one as consecrated by the Spirit in the eternal purpose of God. (2.) Justification from condemnation through the righteousness of God in Christ by faith (Romans, 1, 17). So FAREVS. The order of sanctification before justification shows that it must be so taken, and not in the sense of progressive sanctification. "Washed" precedes both, and so must refer to the Christian's outward new birth of water, the sign of the inward setting apart to the Lord by the inspiration of the Spirit as the seed of new life (John, 3, 5; Ephesians, 5, 26; Titus, 3, 5; Hebrews, 10, 22). St. Paul (cf. the Church of England Baptismal Service), in charity, and faith in the ideal of the church, presumes that baptism realizes its original design, and that those outwardly baptized inwardly enter into vital communion with Christ (Galatians, 3, 27). He presents the grand ideal which those alone realized in whom the inward and the outward baptism coalesced. At the same time he recognises the fact that this in many cases does not hold good (v. 8-10), leaving it to God, to decide who are the really "washed," whilst he only decides on broad general principles, in the name of... Jesus, and by the Spirit—rather, "in the Spirit," i.e., by His in-dwelling. Both clauses belong to the three—"washed, sanctified, justified," our God—The "our" reminds them that amidst all his reproofs God is still the common God of himself and them.

12-20. REFUTATION OF THE ANTI-NOMIAN DEFENCE OF FORNICATION, AS IF IT WAS LAWFUL BECAUSE MEATS ARE SO. 12. All things are lawful unto me—These, which were St. Paul's own words on a former occasion (to the Corinthians, cf. ch. 10, 23, and Galatians, 5, 23), were made a pretext for excusing the eating of meats offered to idols, and so of what was generally connected with idolatry (Acts, 18, 29), "fornication" (perhaps in the letter of the Corinthians to St. Paul, ch. 7, 1). St. Paul's remark had referred only to things indifferent; but they wished to treat fornication as such, on the ground that the existence of bodily appetites proved the lawfulness of their gratification. He—St. Paul giving himself as a sample of Christians in general, but I—whatever others do, I will not, &c. lawful—brought under the power—The Greek words are from the same root, whence there is a play on the words: All things are in my power, but I will not be brought under the power of any of them (the "all things"). He who commits "fornication," steps aside from his own legitimate power or liberty, and is "brought under the power" of an harlot (v. 15; cf. ch. 7, 4). The "power" ought to be in the hands of the believer, not in the things which he uses (BENGE); else his liberty is forfeited, he ceases to be his own master (John, 8, 34-36; Galatians, 5, 13; 1 Peter, 2, 16; 2 Peter, 2, 19). Unlawful things ruin thousands; "lawful" things (unlawfully used), ten thousands. 13. The argument drawn from the indifference of meats (ch. 8, 5; Romans, 14, 14, 17; cf. Mark, 7, 18; Colossians, 2, 20-22) to that of fornication does not hold good. Meats doubtless are indifferent, since both they and the "belly" for which they are created are to be "destroyed" in the future state. But "the body is not (created) for fornication, but for the Lord, and the Lord for the body" (as its Redeemer, who hath Himself assumed the body); "And God hath raised up the Lord, and will also raise up us" (i.e., our bodies); therefore the "body" is not, like the "belly," after having served a temporary use, to be destroyed; Now "he that committeth fornication, sinneth against his own body" (v. 18). Therefore fornication is not indifferent, since it is a sin against one's own body, which, like the Lord for whom it is created, is not to be destroyed, but to be raised to eternal existence. Thus St. Paul gives here the germ of the three subjects handled in subsequent sections: (1.) The relation between the sexes. (2.) The question of meats offered to idols. (3.) The resurrection of the body, shall destroy—at the Lord's coming to change the natural bodies of believers into spiritual bodies (ch. 15, 44, 52). There is a real essence underlying the superficial phenomena of the present temporary organization of the body, and this essential germ, when all the particles are scattered, involves the future resurrection of the body incorruptible. 14. (Romans, 8, 11.) raised up—rather, "raised," to distinguish it from "will raise up us"; the Greek of the latter being a compound, the former a simple verb. Believers shall be raised up out of the rest of the dead (Note, Philippians, 3, 11); the first resurrection (Revelation, 20, 5). us—Here he speaks of the possibility of his being found in the grave when Christ comes; elsewhere, of his being possibly found alive (1 Thessalonians, 4, 17). In either event, the Lord's coming rather than death is the great object of the Christian's expectation (Romans, 8. 19). 15. Resuming the thought in v. 14, "the body is for the Lord" (ch. 12. 27; Ephesians, 4. 12, 14, 16; 6. 30). shall I then—such being the case, take—spontaneously alienating them from Christ. For they cannot be at the same time "the members of an harlot," and "of Christ." [BENGL.] It is a fact no less certain than mysterious, that moral and spiritual ruin is caused by such sins; which human wisdom (when untaught by revelation) held to be actions as blameless as eating and drinking. [CONYBEARE & HOWSON.] 16. Justification of his having called fornicators "members of an harlot" (v. 15). joined—by carnal intercourse; lit., cemented to; cleaving to. one body—with her. saith he—GOD speaking by Adam (Genesis, 2. 24; Matthew, 19. 6). "He which made them at the beginning said," &c. (Ephesians, 4. 31). 17. one spirit—with Him. In the case of union with a harlot, the fornicator becomes one "body" with her (not one "spirit" for the spirit which is normally the organ of the Holy Spirit in man, is in the carnal so overlaid with what is sensual that it is ignored altogether). But the believer not only has his body sanctified by union with Christ's body, but also becomes "one Spirit" with Him (John, 14. 1-7; 17. 21; 1 Peter, 1. 4; cf. Ephesians, 4. 23-24, and John, 2. 6). 18. Pile—The only safety in such temptations is flight (Genesis, 22. 15; Job, 31. 1). Every sin—The Greek is forcible, "Every sin whatsoever that a man doeth." Every other sin: even gluttony, drunkenness, and self-murder: are "without," i.e., comparatively external to the body (Mark, 7. 18; cf. Proverbs, 6. 30-32). He certainly injures, but he does not alienate the body itself: the sin is not terminated in the body; he rather sins against the perishing accidents of the body as the "belly," and the body's present temporary organization, and against the soul than against the body in its permanent essence, designed "for the Lord." "But" the fornicator alienates that body which is the Lord's, and makes it one with a harlot's body, and so "sinneth against his own body," i.e., against the verity and nature of his body; not a mere effect on the body from without, but a contradiction of the truth of the body, wrought within itself. [ALFORD.] 19. Proof that "he that fornicates sinneth against his own body" (v. 18). your body—not "bodies." As in ch. 3. 17, he represented the whole company of believers (souls and bodies), i.e., the church, as "the temple of God" the Spirit; so here, the body of each individual of the church is viewed as the ideal "temple of the Holy Ghost." So John, 17. 23, which proves that not only the church, but also each member of it, is "the temple of the Holy Ghost." Still though many the several members form one temple, the whole collectively being that which each is in miniature individually. Just as the Jews had one temple only, so in the fullest sense all Christian churches and individual believers form one temple only. Thus "YOUR (plural) body" is distinguished here from "HIS OWN (particular or individual) body" (v. 18). In sinning against the latter, the fornicator sins against "your (ideal) body," that of "Christ," whose "members your bodies" are (v. 16). In this consists the sin of fornication, that it is a sacrilegious desecration of God's temple to profane uses. The unseen, but much more efficient, Spirit of God in the spiritual temple now takes the place of the visible Shechinah in the old material temple. The whole man is the temple; the soul is the inmost shrine; the understanding and heart the holy place; and the body, the porch and exterior of the edifice. Chastity is the guardian of the temple to prevent any thing unclean entering which might provoke the indwelling God to abandon it as defiled. [TERTULLIAN de cultu fornicationis.] None but God can claim a temple; here the Holy Ghost is assigned one: therefore the Holy Ghost is God, not your own—The fornicator treats his body as if it were "his own," to give to a harlot if he please (v. 18; cf. v. 29). But we have no right to alienate our body which is the Lord's. In ancient servitude the person of the servant was wholly the property of the master, not his own. Purchase was one of the ways of acquiring a slave. Man has sold himself to sin (1 Kings, 21. 26; Romans, 7. 14). Christ buys him to Himself, to serve Him (Romans, 6. 16-22). So, bought with a price—Therefore Christ's blood is strictly a ransom paid to God's justice by the love of God in Christ for our redemption (Matthew, 20. 28; Acts, 20. 28; Galatians, 3. 13; Hebrews, 9. 12; 1 Peter, 1. 18, 19; 2 Peter, 2. 1; Revelation, 5. 6). Whilst He thus took off our obligation to punishment, He laid upon us a new obligation to obedience (ch. 7. 22, 23). If we accept Him as our Prophet to reveal God to us, and our Friend to atone for us, we must also accept Him as our King to rule over us as wholly His, presenting every token of our fealty (Isaiah, 54. 12). In your body—as "in" a temple (cf. John, 13. 23; Romans, 12. 1; Philippians, 1. 20). and in your spirit, which are Gods—Not in the oldest MSS. and versions, and not needed for the sense, as the context refers solely to the "body" (v. 18, 19). The "spirit" is incidentally mentioned, v. 17, which perhaps gave rise to the interpolation, at first written in the margin, afterwards inserted in the text.

CHAPTER VII.

VER. 1-40. REPLY TO THEIR INQUIRIES AS TO MARRIAGE: THE GENERAL PRINCIPLE IN OTHER THINGS IS, ABIDE IN YOUR STATION, FOR THE TIME IS SHORT. 1. The Corinthians in their letter had probably asked questions which tended to disparage marriage, and had implied that it was better to break it off when contracted with an unbeliever. good—i.e., expedient, because of "the present distress;" i.e., the unsettled state of the world, and the likelihood of persecutions tearing rudely asunder those bound by marriage-ties. Hebrews, 13. 4, in opposition to ascetic and Romish notions of superior sanctity in celibacy, declares, "MARRIAGE IS HONOURABLE IN ALL." Another reason why in some cases celibacy may be a matter of Christian expediency is stated v. 34, 35, "that ye may attend upon the Lord without distraction." But these are exceptional cases, and in exceptional times, such as those of St. Paul. 2. Here the general rule is given. to avoid fornication—More lit., "on account of fornications," to which as being very prevalent at Corinth, and not even counted sins among the heathen, unmarried persons might be tempted. The plural, "fornications," marks irregular lusts, as contrasted with the unity of the marriage relation. [BENGL.] let every man have—a positive command to all who have not the gift of continency, in fact to the great majority of the world (v. 6). The dignity of marriage is set forth by St. Paul, Ephesians, 5. 25-32, in the fact that it signifies the mystical union between Christ and the Church. 3. 4. The duty of cohabitation on the part of the married. See benevolence—The oldest MSS. read simply, "my due;" i.e., the conjugal cohabitation due by the marriage contract (cf. v. 4). 4. A paradox. She hath not power over her body, and yet it is her own. The oneness of body in which marriage places husband and wife explains this. The one complements the other. Neither without the other realizes the perfect ideal of man. 5. De-fraud . . . not—viz., of the conjugal duty "due" (v. 3; cf. LXX., Exodus, 21. 10). except it be—"unless perchance." [ALFORD.] give yourselves to—lit., be at leisure for: be free from interruptions for; viz., on some special season," as the Greek for "time" means (cf. Exodus, 19. 15; Joel, 2. 16; Zechariah, 7. 3). fasting and prayer—The oldest MSS. omit "fasting and," an interpolation, evidently, of ascetics, come together—The oldest MSS. read, "be together," viz., in the regular state of the married. Satan—who often thruste in his temple

holly thoughts amidst the holiest exercises, continency—because of your inability to “control your natural propensities, which Satan takes advantage of.” 6. by permission...not of merit—not by God’s permission to me to say it; way of permission to you, not as a command—“This” refers to the directions v. 2-5. 7. even if the gift of continence (Matthew, 19, 11, I wish does not hold good absolutely, else the will of mankind and of the church would cease; only to “the present distress” (v. 26). 8. to the—in general, of both sexes (v. 10, 11), and in particular, even as I—unmarried (ch. 9, 6), cannot contain—i.e., have not continency, burn a secret flame of lust, which lays waste the weaker man. [Cf. AUGUSTINE de Sancta Virginitate dew of God’s grace is needed to stifle the flesh otherwise would thrust men at last into 10. not I, but the Lord—(cf. v. 12, 25, 40). In cases he writes on inspired apostolic authority (Mark, 10, 11, 13). In both cases alike the latter are inspired by the Spirit of God, “but at all time, nor all on the primary truths of.” [ALFORD.] Let not the wife depart—lit., “be from.” Probably the separation on either her owing to the husband or to the wife, is 11. But and if she depart—or “be separated,” of separation has been committed, that of a wife is not to be added (Matthew, 5, 32), be—by appeasing her husband’s displeasure, serving his good will. let not... husband put her—In Matthew, 5, 32, the only exception allowed “saving for the cause of fornication.” 12. to—the other classes (besides “the married,” are both husband and wife are believers) whom the Corinthians had inquired, viz., those in mixed marriages with unbelievers. not by any direct command spoken by Him. she—Greek, “consents” implying his wish in the case, with which her consent. 13. the woman refer her not leave him—“her husband,” for “him,” is the reading of the oldest MSS. for “leave” is the same as in v. 12, “put away.” Let her not put away (i.e., part husband.” The wife had the power of effecting by Greek and Roman law. 14. sanctified inseparably connected with the people of God and thereby, so that the latter may retain the same without impairing their own sanctity (cf. 1, 4, 6); nay, rather imparting to the former some degree of their own hallowed character preparing the way for the unbeliever best sanctified inwardly by faith. by... by “in...in,” i.e., in virtue of the marriage-tie them. by the husband—The oldest MSS. read, rather, “It is the fact of the husband being, or,” i.e., a Christian, though the wife is not unchastity or hallow the union. else...children i.e., beyond the hallowed pale of God’s people: set to “holy,” i.e., all that is within the covenant. [CONYBEARE & HOWSON.] The phraseology with that of the Jews who regarded heathen “unclean,” and all of the elect nation as partakers of the holy covenant. Children included in the covenant, as God made it not only abram, but with his “seed after” him (Genesis 17).

So the faith of one Christian parent gives children a near relationship to the church, just parents were Christians (cf. Romans, 11, 16), the bearer of this epistle, is an instance in (12, 13). St. Paul appeals to the Corinthians using the principle, that the infants of heathen could not be admissible to Christian baptism, here is no faith on the part of the parents; but where one parent is a believer, the children are regarded as not aliens from, but admissible even in infancy as sharers in, the Christian covenant: for the church presumes that the believing parent will rear the child in the Christian faith. Infant baptism tacitly superseded infant circumcision, just as the Christian Lord’s day gradually superseded the Jewish sabbath, without our having any express command for, or record of, the transference. The setting aside of circumcision and of sabbaths in the case of the Gentiles was indeed expressly commanded by the apostles and St. Paul, but the substitution of infant baptism and of the Lord’s day were tacitly adopted, not expressly enacted. No explicit mention of it occurs till Irenæus in the third century; but no society of Christians that we read of disputed its propriety till 1500 years after Christ. Anabaptists would have us defer baptism till maturity, as the child cannot understand the nature of it. But a child may be made heir of an estate: it is his, though incapable at the time of using or comprehending its advantage: he is not hereafter to acquire the title and claim to it: he will hereafter understand his claim, and be capable of employing his wealth: he will then, moreover, become responsible for the use he makes of it. [ABERCRISHOP WHATELY.] 15. if...depart—i.e., wishes for separation; translate, “separateth himself;” offended with her Christianity, and refusing to live with her unless she renounce it. brother...is not under bondage—is not bound to renounce the faith for the sake of retaining her unbelieving husband. [HARRINGTON.] So Deuteronomy, 13, 8; Matthew, 10, 35-37; Luke, 14, 26. The believer does not lie under the same obligation in the case of a union with an unbeliever, as in the case of one with a believer. In the former case he is not bound not to separate, if the unbeliever separate or “depart,” in the latter nothing but “fornication” justifies separation. [PHOTIUS in Æcumenicus.] but God hath called us to peace—Our Christian calling is one that tends to “peace” (Romans, 12, 18), not quarrelling: therefore the believer should not ordinarily depart from the unbelieving consort (v. 12-14), on the one hand; and on the other, in the exceptional case of the unbeliever desiring to depart, the believer is not bound to force the other party to stay in a state of continual discord (Matthew, 5, 32). Better still it would be, not to enter into such unequal alliances at all (v. 40; 2 Corinthians, 6, 14). 16. What knowest thou but that by staying with thy unbelieving partner thou mayest save him or her? Enforcing the precept to stay with the unbelieving consort (v. 12-14). So Ruth the Moabitess became a convert to her husband’s faith: and Joseph and Moses probably gained over their wives. So conversely the unbelieving husband may be won by the believing wife (1 Peter, 3, 1). [CALVIN.] Or else (v. 15), if thy unbelieving consort wishes to depart, let him go, so that thou mayest live “in peace:” for thou canst not be sure of converting him, so as to make it obligatory on thee at all costs to stay with him against his will. [MENOCHIUS & ALFORD.] save—be the instrument of salvation to James, 5, 20. 17. But—Greek, “If not.” “Only.” Caution that believers should not take this direction (v. 16; as ALFORD explains it) a ground for separating of themselves (v. 12-14). Or, But if there be no hope of gaining over the unbeliever, still let the general principle be maintained, “As the Lord hath allotted to each, as God hath called each, so let him walk” (so the Greek in the oldest reading; i.e., let him walk in the path allotted to him and wherein he was called. The heavenly calling does not set aside our earthly callings. so ordain I in all churches—ye also therefore should obey. 18. not become uncircumcised—by surgical operation [1 Maccabees, 1, 15; JOSEPHUS, Antiquities, 12, 6, 11. Some Christians in excess of Anti-Jewish feeling might be tempted to this. let him not be circumcised—as the Judaizing Christians would have him (Acts, 15; Galatians, 2. 2. 19. circumcision...nothing, but...keeping of...commandments of God—viz., is all in all. In Galatians, 2. 2. this "keeping of the commandments of God" is defined to be "faith which worketh by love;" and in Galatians, 6. 15, "a new creature." Circumcision was a commandment of God; but not for ever, as "love." 20. the same calling—i. e., the condition from which he is called a Jew, a Greek, a slave, or a freeman. 21. care not for it—Let it not be a trouble to thee that thou art a servant or slave, use it rather—continue rather in thy state as a servant (v. 20; Galatians, 3. 28; 1 Timothy, 6. 2). The Greek, "But if even thou mayest be made free, use it," and the context (v. 20, 22) favours this view. (CHRYSOSTOM, BERGEL, & ALFORD.) This advice (if this translation be right) is not absolute, as the spirit of the gospel is against slavery. What is advised here is, contentment under one's existing condition (v. 24), though an undesirable one, since in our union with Christ all outward disparities of condition are compensated (v. 22). Be not unduly impatient to cast off "even" thy condition as a servant by unlawful means (1 Peter, 2. 13-15); as, e. g., Onesimus did by fleeing (Philemon, 10-18). The precept (v. 23), "Become not (so the Greek) the servants of men," implies plainly, that slavery is abnormal (cf. Leviticus, 25. 45), "Men-stealers," or slave-dealers, are classed in 1 Timothy, 1. 10, with "murderers" and "perjurers." NEANDER, GROTIUS, &c., explain, "If called, being a slave, to Christianity, be content—but yet, if also thou canst be free as a still additional good, which if thou canst not attain, be satisfied without it; but which, if offered to thee, is not to be despised, make use of the opportunity of becoming free, rather than by neglecting it to remain a slave." I prefer this latter view, as more according to the tenor of the gospel, and fully justified by the Greek. 22. the Lord's freeman—(Philemon, 16—rather, "freeman." Though a slave externally, spiritually made free by the Lord: from sin, John, 8. 36; from the law, Romans, 8. 2; from "circumcision," v. 19; Galatians, 5. 1. Christ's servant—(ch. 9. 21). Love makes Christ's service perfect freedom (Matthew, 11. 29, 30; Galatians, 5. 13; 1 Peter, 2. 16). 23. be not ye—Greek, "become not ye." St. Paul here changes from "thou" (v. 21) to "ye." YE ALL are "bought" with the blood of Christ, whatever be your earthly state (ch. 6. 20): "Become not servants to men," either externally, or spiritually the former sense applying to the free alone; the latter to Christian freemen and slaves alike, that they should not be servile adherents to their party leaders at Corinth, ch. 3. 21, 22; Matthew, 23. 8-10; 2 Corinthians, 11. 20; nor indeed slaves to men generally, so far as their condition admits). The external and internal conditions, as far as is attainable, should correspond, and the former be subservient to the latter (cf. v. 21, 32-35). 24. abide with God—being chiefly careful of the footing on which he stands towards God, rather than that towards men. This clause, "with God," limits the similar precept, v. 20. A man may cease to "abide in the calling wherein he was called," and yet not violate the precept here. If a man's calling be not favourable to his "abiding with God" (retaining holy fellowship with Him), he may use lawful means to change from it (cf. Note, v. 21). 25. no commandment of the Lord: yet...my judgment—I have no express revelation from the Lord commanding it, but I give my judgment (opinion): viz., under the ordinary inspiration which accompanied the apostles in all their canonical writings (cf. v. 40; ch. 14. 37; 1 Thessalonians, 4. 15). The Lord inspires me in this case to give you only a recommendation, which you are free to adopt or reject, not a positive command. In the second case (v. 10, 11) it was a positive command; for the Lord had already made known His will (Malachi, 2. 14, 16; Matthew, 6. 31, 32). In the third case (v. 12), the Old Testament commandment of God to put away strange wives (Exra, 10. 2, 3). St. Paul by the Spirit revokes mercy of the Lord—(1 Timothy, 1. 12). He attributes his apostleship and the gifts accompanying it (including inspiration) to God's grace alone. Faithful—in dispensing to you the inspired directions received by me from the Lord. 26. I suppose—"I consider." this—viz., "for a man so to be," i. e., in the same state in which he is (v. 27). for—by reason of, the present distress—the distresses to which believers were then beginning to be subjected, making the married state less desirable than the single; and which should prevail throughout the world before the destruction of Jerusalem, according to Christ's prophecy (Matthew, 24. 8-21; cf. Acts, 11. 28). 27. Illustrating the meaning of "so to be," v. 26. Neither the married (those "bound to a wife") nor the unmarried (those "loosed from a wife") are to "seek" a change of state (cf. v. 28, 24). 28. trouble in the flesh—Those who marry, he says, shall incur "trouble in the flesh" (i. e., in their outward state, by reason of the present distress), not in, which is the trouble of the spirit, but I spare you.—The emphasis in the Greek is on "I." My motive in advising you so is, to "spare you" such trouble in the flesh. So ALFORD after CALVIN, BERGEL, &c. ERRORS from Augustine explains it, "I spare you further details of the inconveniences of matrimony, lest even the incontinency may at the peril of lust be deterred from matrimony: thus I have regard to your infirmity." The antithesis in the Greek of "I, you" and "such" favours the former. 29. this I say—A summing up of the whole, wherein he draws the practical inference from what precedes (ch. 16. 50). the time—the season (so the Greek) of this present dispensation up to the coming of the Lord (Romans, 13. 11). He uses the Greek expression which the Lord used in Luke, 21. 8; Mark, 13. 33. short—fit, contracted, it remaineth.—The oldest MSS. read, "The time (season) is shortened as to what remains, in order that both they," &c.; i. e., the effect which the shortening of the time ought to have is, "that for the remaining time (henceforth) both they," &c. The clause, "as to what remains," though in construction belonging to the previous clause, in sense belongs to the following. However, Cyprian and Vulgate support English Version, as though they had none—We ought to consider nothing as our own in real or permanent possession. 30. they that weep...wept not—(cf. 2 Corinthians, 6. 10). they that buy...possessed not—(cf. Isaiah, 24. 1, 2). Christ specifies as the condemning sign of the men of Sodom not merely their open profligacy, but that "they bought, they sold," &c., as men whose all was in this world (Luke, 17. 28). "Possessed" in the Greek implies a holding fast of a possession: this the Christian will not do, for his "enduring substance" is elsewhere Hebrews, 10. 34). 31. not abusing it—not abusing it by an overmuch using of it. The meaning of "abusing" here is, not so much perverting, as using it to the full. (BERGEL.) We are to use it, not to take our all of its pursuits as our chief aim (cf. Luke, 10. 40-42). As the planets whilst turning on their own axis, yet revolve round the sun; so whilst we do our part in our own worldly sphere, God is to be the centre of all our desires, fashion—the present fleeting form. Cf. Psalm 39. 6, "vain show;" Psalm 73. 20, "a dream;" James, 4. 14, "a vapour." passeth away—not merely shall pass away, but is now actually passing away. The image is drawn from a shifting scene in a play represented on the stage (1 John, 2. 17). St. Paul inculcates not so much the outward denial of earthly things, as the inward spirit whereby the married and the rich, as well as the unmarried and the poor, would be ready to sacrifice all for Christ's sake. 32. without carefulness—I would have you to be not merely "without trouble," but "without distracting cares" (so the Greek), careful—if he uses aright the advantages of his condition, Indeed a woman undergoes a change of condition than a man in contract— 35. for your own profit—not to display authority, not... cast a snare upon you—throwing a noose over an animal in hunt—by hard injunctions I may entangle you; of committing sin, where there is no sin. CHAPTER VIII.

ON PARTAKING OF MEATS OFFERED TO though to those knowing that an idol has the question of eating meats offered to id in the letter of the Corinthians, cf. ch. seem unimportant, it is not so with some, mities of such should be respected. The the victims not offered on the altars be- to the priests, partly to the offerers; and at feasts in the temples and in private were often sold in the markets; so that ere constantly exposed to the temptation them, which was forbidden (Numbers, 25, 28). The apostles forbade it in their decree Jerusalem (Acts, 15, and 21, 25.); but St. St. allude here to that decree, as he rests his her on his own independent apostolic we know that we all have knowledge—The doubtless had referred to their "know- of the indifference of meats, as in them- no sanctity or pollution). St. Paul replies, are that we all have (speaking generally, Christian theory goes: for in v. 7 he speaks o practically have not this knowledge," suffeth up—when without "love." Here a begins; and the main subject is resumed; words, v. 4. "As concerning (touching) e eating," &c. "Puffing up" is to please ying" is to please one's neighbour. Know- ys, All things are lawful for me: Love adds, gs do not edify (BENGEI) (ch. 10, 23; Ro- edifieth—tends to build up the spiritual s; 6, 19). 2. And—Omitted in the oldest sence of the connecting particle gives an sententiousness to the style, suitable to the e first step to knowledge is to know our own ignorance. Without love there is only the appear- ance (note, "think," &c.) of knowledge. knoweth—The oldest MSS. read a Greek word implying personal exper- imental acquaintance, not merely knowledge of a fact, which the Greek of "we know" or are aware (v. 1) means, as he ought to know—experimentally and in the way of "love." 3. love God—the source of love to our neigh- bour (1 John, 4, 11, 12, 20; 5, 2). the same—lit., this man: he who loves, not he who "thinks that he knows," not having "charity" or love (v. 1, 2). is known of him — is known with the knowledge of approval, and is acknowledged by God as His (Psalm 1, 6; Galatians, 4, 9; 2 Timothy, 2, 19). Contrast, "I never knew you," Matthew, 7, 23. To love God is to know God; and he who thus knows God has been first known by God (cf. ch. 13, 12; 1 Peter, 1, 2). 4. As concerning, &c.—Resum- ing the subject begun in v. 1. "As touching," &c. idol is nothing—has no true being at all; the god it rep- resents is not a living reality. This does not contradict ch. 10, 20, which states that they who worship idols, worship devils: for here it is the gods believed by the worshippers to be represented by the idols which are denied to have any existence, not the devils which really under the idols delude the worshippers. none other God—The oldest MSS. omit the word "other:" which gives a clearer sense. 5. "For even supposing there are (exist) gods so called (2 Thessalonians, 2, 4), whether in heaven (as the sun, moon, and stars) or in earth (as deified kings, beasts, &c.), as there be (a re- cognised fact, Deuteronomy, 10, 17; Psalm 135, 6; 136, 2) gods many and lords many." Angels and men in authority are termed gods in Scripture, as exercising a divinely delegated power under God (cf. Exodus, 22, 9, with v. 28; Psalm 82, 1, 6; John, 10, 34, 35). 6. to us—be- lievers, of whom—from whom as Creator all things derive their existence. We in him—rather, "we for Him," or "unto Him." God the FATHER is the end for whom and for whose glory believers live. In Colossians, 1, 16, all things are said to be created (not only "by" Christ, but also) "for Him" (CHRIST). So entirely are the Father and Son one (cf. Romans, 11, 36; Hebrews, 2, 10). one Lord—contrasted with the "many lords" of heathendom (v. 8), by whom—(John, 1, 3; Hebrews, 1, 2). we by him—as all things are "of" the Father by creation, so they (we believers especially) are restored to Him by the new creation (Colossians, 1, 20; Revela- tion, 21, 6). Also, as all things are by Christ by creation, so they (we especially) are restored by Him by the new creation. 7. Howbeit—Though to us who "have knowl- edge" (v. 1, 4-6) all meats are indifferent, yet "this knowledge is not in all" in the same degree as we have it. St. Paul had admitted to the Corinthians that "we all have knowledge" (v. 1), i. e., so far as Christian theory goes: but practically some have it not in the same degree. with conscience—An ancient read- ing; but other very old MSS. read "association" or "habit." In either reading the meaning is: Some Gentile Christians, whether from old association of ideas or misdirected conscience, when they ate such meats, ate them with some feeling as if the idol were something real (v. 4), and had changed the meats by the fact of the consecration into something either holy or else polluted. unto this hour—after they have em- braced Christianity: an implied censure, that they are not further advanced by this time in Christian "knowl- edge," their conscience... is defiled—by their eating it "as a thing offered to idols." If they ate it uncon- sciously at the time that it had been offered to idols, there would be no defilement of conscience. But conscious of what it was, and not having such knowledge as other Corinthians boasted of, viz., that an idol is nothing and can therefore neither pollute nor sanctify meats, they by eating them sin against conscience (cf. Romans, 14, 15-23). It was on the ground of Christian expediency, not to cause a stumblingblock to "weaker" brothers, that the Jerusalem decree against partaking of such meats (though indifferent to themselves) was passed (Acts, 15.). Hence he here vindicates it against the Corinthian asserters of an inexpedient liberty. 8. Other old MSS. read, "Neither if we do not eat, are we the better: neither if we eat, are we the worse;" the language of the eaters who justified their eating thus. [LACHMANN.] In English Version St. Paul admits that "meat neither presents [to the Greek for "commendeth"] us as commended nor as disapproved before God;" it does not affect our standing before God (Romans, 14. 6., 9. this liberty of yours—the watchword for lax Corinthians. The very indifference of meats, which I concede, is the reason why ye should "take heed" not to tempt weak brethren to act against their conscience (which constitutes sin, Romans, 14. 23, 23). 10. If any man—being weak, which hast knowledge—The very knowledge which thou prides thyself on (v. 1), will lead the weak after thy example to do that against his conscience, which thou doest without any scruple of conscience, viz., to eat meats offered to idols. Conscience of him which is weak—rather, "His conscience, seeing he is weak." [ALFORD, &c.] emboldened—lit., built up. You ought to have built up your brother in good: but by your example your building him up is the emboldening him to violate his conscience. 11. shall...perish—The oldest MSS. read "perisheth." A single act seemingly unimportant may produce everlasting consequences. The weak brother loses his faith, and, if he do not recover it, his salvation [BENJAMIN] (Romans, 14. 23), for whom Christ died—and for whose sake we too ought to be willing to die (1 John, 3. 16.). And yet professing Christians at Corinth virtually tempted their brethren to their damnation, so far were they from sacrificing aught for their salvation. Note here, That it is no argument against the dogma that Christ died for all, even for those who perish, to say that thus He would have died in vain for many. Scripture is our rule, not our suppositions as to consequences. More is involved in redemption than the salvation of man: the character of God as at once just and loving is vindicated even in the case of the lost; for they might have been saved, and so even in their case Christ has not died in vain. So the mercies of God's providence are not in vain, though many abuse them. Even the condemned shall manifest God's love in the great day, in that they too had the offer of God's mercy. It shall be the most awful ingredient in their cup, that they might have been saved but would not: Christ died to redeem even them. 12. wound their weak conscience—lit., "smite their conscience, being as yet (i. e. a weak state)." It aggravates the cruelty of the act that it is committed on the weak, just as if one were to strike an invalid, against Christ—on account of the sympathy between Christ and His members (Matthew, 25. 40; Acts, 9. 4, 6.). 13. meat—Old English for "food" in general, make...to offend—Greek, "is a stumblingblock to." no flesh—in order to ensure my avoiding flesh offered to idols, I would abstain from all kinds of flesh, in order not to be a stumblingblock to my brother.

CHAPTER IX.

Ver. 1-27. HE CONFIRMS HIS TEACHING AS TO NOT PUTTING A STUMBLINGBLOCK IN A BROTHER'S WAY (ch. 8. 13) BY HIS OWN EXAMPLE IN NOT USING HIS UNDOUBTED RIGHTS AS AN APOSTLE, SO AS TO WIN MEN TO CHRIST. 1. Am I not an apostle? am I not free? —The oldest MSS. read the order thus, "Am I not free? am I not an apostle?" He alludes to ch. 8. 9., "this liberty of yours: If you claim it, I appeal to yourselves as the witnesses, have not I also it? "Am I not free?" If you be so, much more I. For "am I not an apostle?" so that I can claim not only Christian, but also apostolic liberty, have I not seen Jesus—corporeally, not in a mere vision: cf. ch. 15. 8, where the fact of the resurrection, which he wishes to prove, could only be established by an actual bodily appearance, such as was vouchsafed to Peter and the other apostles. In Acts, 9. 7, 17, the contrast between "the man with him seeing no man," and "Jesus that appeared unto thee in the way," shows that Jesus actually appeared to him in going to Damascus. His vision of Christ in the temple (Acts, 22. 17) was "in a trance." To be a witness of Christ's resurrection was a leading function of an apostle (Acts, 1. 22). The best MSS. omit "Christ," ye my work in the Lord—your conversion is His workmanship (Ephesians, 2. 10) through my instrumentality: the "seal of mine apostleship" (v. 2). 2. yet doubtless—yet at least I am such to you, seal of mine apostleship—your conversion by my preaching, accompanied with miracles ("the signs of an apostle," Romans, 15. 18, 19; 2 Corinthians, 12. 12), and your gifts conferred by me (ch. 1. 7), vouch for the reality of my apostleship, just as a seal set to a document attests the genuineness (John, 3. 33; Romans, 4. 11). 3. to them that...examine me—i. e., who call in question mine apostleship. Is this—viz., that you are the seal of mine apostleship. 4. Have we not you—Greek, "right," or lawful power, equivalent to "liberty" claimed by the Corinthians (ch. 8. 9). The "we" includes with himself his colleagues in the apostleship. The Greek interrogative expresses, "You surely would say (will you?) that we have not the power or right," &c. eat and drink—without labouring with our hands (v. 11, 12, 14). St. Paul's not exercising this right was made a plea by his opponents for insinuating that he was himself conscious he was no true apostle (2 Corinthians, 12. 13-16). 5. lead about a sister, a wife—i. e., "a sister as a wife"; "a sister" by faith, which makes all believers brethren and sisters in the one family of God: "a wife" by marriage covenant. St. Paul implies he did not exercise his undoubted right to marry and "lead about" a believer, for the sake of Christian expediency, as well to save the church the expense of maintaining her in his wide circuits, as also that he might give himself more undistractedly to building up the church of Christ (ch. 7. 25, 25, 33). Contrast the Corinthians' want of self-sacrifice in the exercise of their "liberty" at the cost of destroying, instead of edifying, the church (ch. 8. 9, 10, Margins, 11-13), as other apostles—implying that some of them had availed themselves of the power which they all had, of marrying. We know from Matthew, 8. 14, that Cephas or Peter was a married man. A confutation of St. Peter's self-styled followers, the Romanists, who exclude the clergy from marriage. CLEMENS ALEXANDRINUS Stromata or Miscellaneous, 7. sec. 63, records a tradition, that he encouraged his wife when being led to death by saying, "Remember, my dear one, the Lord.—held in especial esteem on account of their relationship to Jesus (Acts, 1. 14; Galatians, 1. 6). James, Joseph, Simon, and Judas. Probably cousins of Jesus: as cousins were termed by the Jews "brethren." ALFORD makes them literally brothers of Jesus by Joseph and Mary. Cephas—Probably singled out as being a name carrying weight with one particular section at Corinth. "If your favourite leader does so, surely so may I" (ch. 1. 12; 3. 22). 6. Barnabas—long the associate of Paul, and, like him, in the habit of self-denyingly forbearing to claim the maintenance which is a minister's right. St. Paul supported himself by tent-making (Acts, 18. 3; 20. 34; 1 Thessalonians, 2. 9; 2 Thessalonians, 3. 8). 7. The minister is spiritually a soldier (1 Timothy, 2. 3), a vine-dresser (ch. 3. 6-8; Song of Solomon, 1. 6), and a shepherd (1 Peter, 5. 2, 4), of the fruit—The oldest MSS. omit "of." 8. as a man—I speak thus not merely according to human judgment, but with the sanction of the divine law also. 9. c.e., treadst...corn—(Deuteronomy, 25. 4.) In the East to the present day they do not after reaping carry the sheaves home to barns as we do, but take them to under the open air to be thrashed by the oxen with them with their feet, or else drawing a threshing-trument over them (cf. Micah, 4, 13). Doth God for oxen?—rather, "Is it for the oxen that God?" Is the animal the ultimate object for whose law was given? No. God does care for the animal (Psalm 36, 6; Matthew, 10, 29), but it is the ultimate aim of the welfare of man, the head and creation. In the humane consideration for the lower animal, we are to learn that still ought it to be exercised in the case of man, the object of the law; and that the human (spiritual) as temporal labourer is worthy of his hire, together—join this with "saith." "Does he [the lawgiver] by all means say it for our sakes?" It would be untrue, that God saith it altogether (in the sense of solely) for our sakes. But it is true, that all means saith it for our sakes as the ultimate in the lower world. GROTIIUS, however, translates "or" especially, instead of altogether, meaning that [ALTOGETHER]; id est, because, should ought to plow in hope. The obligation rests on people not to let their minister labour without remuneration, he that thrasheth in hope should be so of his hope.—The oldest MSS. versions and read, "He that thrasheth should or ought to in the hope of partaking," viz., of the fruit of his lab. "He that ploweth," spiritually, is the first of a church in a place (cf. ch. 3, 6, 9); "he that sith," the minister who tends a church already. 11. we, we—emphatical in the Greek. We, we persons who have sown to you the infinitely precious treasures of the spirit, may at the least in return what is the only thing you have to us, the goods that nourish the flesh ("your carnal"). 12. others—whether true apostles (v. 5) or men (2 Corinthians, 11, 20). we rather—consider greater labours for you (2 Corinthians, 11, 23). all things—without complaining of it. We desire id est, hold as a water-tight vessel any distress suffer from straitened circumstances. The same is in ch. 13, 7. lest we ... hinder... gospel—not to a hindrance to its progress by giving a handle to imputation of self-seeking, if we received support on our flock. The less of encumbrance and examined to the church, and the more of work done, siter for the cause of the gospel (2 Timothy, 2, 4); lest about holy things—the Jewish priests and s. The Greek especially applies to the former, lest offering sacrifices, partakers with the altar of the victims going to the service of the altar, rest being shared by the priests (Leviticus, 7, 6; vers. 15, 8, &c.; Deuteronomy, 18, 1, &c.). 14. Even is only inference to be drawn from this passage is that the Christian ministry is of a sacrificial character as the Jewish priesthood, but simply, that as siter was supported by the contributions of the people, so should the former. The stipends of the latter were at first from voluntary offerings at the supper. At the love feast preceding it every one, according to his ability, offered a gift; and the expense of the table had been defrayed, the laity aside a portion for himself, the presbyters, leacons; and with the rest relieved widows, orphans, confessors, and the poor generally. (TRIBUT-dology, ch. 30.) The stipend was in proportion to dignity and merits of the several bishops, presbyters, and deacons. (CYPRIAN, c. 4, ep. 6.) preach...—plainly marked as the duty of the Christian minister, in contrast to the ministering about sacrifices (see the Mass is supposed to be); this 14th would certainly have been worded so, to answer 13. Note the same Lord Christ "ordains" the ordinances in the Old and in the New Testaments (Matthew, 10, 10; Luke, 10, 7). 15. Paul's special gift of continence, which enabled him to abstain from marriage, and his ability to maintain himself without interrupting seriously his ministry, made that expedient to him which is ordinarily inexpedient, viz., that the ministry should not be supported by the people. What to him was a duty, would be the opposite to one, for instance, to whom God had committed a family, without other means of support. I have used none of these things—none of these "powers" or rights which I might have used (v. 4-6, 12). neither—rather. "Yet I have not written," so done unto me—id est, in my case; as is done in the case of a soldier, a planter, a shepherd, a plowman, and a sacrificing priest (v. 7, 10, 13). make my glorying void—deprive me of my privilege of preaching the gospel without remuneration (2 Corinthians, 11, 7-10). Rather than hinder the progress of the gospel by giving any pretext for a charge of interested motives (2 Corinthians, 12, 17, 18), St. Paul would "die" of hunger. Cf. Abraham's similar disinterestedness, Genesis, 14, 22, 23. 16. though I preach... I have nothing to glory of—i.e., If I preach the gospel, and do so not gratuitously, I have no matter for "glorying." For the "necessity" that is laid on me to preach (cf. Jeremiah, 20, 9, and the case of Jonah) does away with ground for "glorying." The sole ground for the latter that I have, is my preaching without charge (v. 18); since there is no necessity laid on me as to the latter, it is my voluntary act for the gospel's sake. 17. Translate. "If I be doing this (i.e., preaching) of my own accord (which I am not, for the "necessity" is laid on me which binds a servant to obey his master), I have a reward; but if (as is the case) involuntarily (Acts, 9, 15; 22, 16; 26, 16; not of my own natural will, but by the constraining grace of God; Romans, 9, 16; 1 Timothy, 1, 13-16), I have had a dispensation (of the gospel) intrusted to me," and so can claim no "reward," seeing that I only "have done that which was my duty to do," Luke, 17, 10, but incur the "woe," v. 16, if I fail in it. 18. What is my reward?—The answer is in v. 19, viz., that by making the gospel without charge, where I might have rightfully claimed maintenance, I might "win the more." of Christ.—The oldest MSS. and versions omit these words. abuse—rather. "that I use not to the full my power." This is his matter for "glorying;" the "reward" ultimately aimed at is the gaining of the more (v. 19). The former, as involving the latter, is verbally made the answer to the question, "What is my reward?" But really the "reward" is that which is the ultimate aim of his preaching without charge, viz., that he may gain the more; it was for this end, not to have matter of glorying, that he did so. 19. free from all men—i.e., from the power of all men. gain the more—i.e., as many of them ("all men") as possible. "Gain" is an appropriate expression in relation to a "reward" (1 Thessalonians, 2, 19, 20); he therefore repeats it frequently (v. 20-22). 20. I became as a Jew—in things not defined by the law, but by Jewish usage. Not Judaizing in essentials, but in matters where there was no compromise of principle (cf. Acts, 16, 3; 21, 20-26); an undesigned coincidence between the history and the epistle, and so a sure proof of genuineness. To them that are under the law, as under the law—in things defined by the law; such as ceremonies not then repugnant to Christianity. Perhaps the reason for distinguishing this class from the former is that St. Paul himself belonged nationally to "the Jews," but did not de jure belong to the class of "them that are under the law." This view is confirmed by the reading inserted here by the oldest MSS., versions, and fathers, "not being (i.e., parenthetically, "not that I am") myself under the law." 21. To them... without law—i.e., without revealed law; the heathen (cf. Romans, 2, 12, with v. 15). as without law—not urging on them ceremonies and "works of the law," but "the bearing of faith" (Galatians, 3. 2). Also discoursing in their own manner, as at Athens, with arguments from their own poets (Acts, 17. 29), being not without law to God—"Whilst thus conforming to others in matters indifferent, taking care not to be without law in relation to God, but responsible to law (lit., IN LAW) in relation to Christ." This is the Christian's true position in relation to the world, to himself, and to God. Every thing develops itself according to its proper law. So the Christian, though no longer subject to the literal law as constraining him from without, is subject to an inward principle or law, the spirit of faith in Christ acting from within as the germ of a new life. He does not in the Greek (as in English Version) say "under the law (as he does in e. 20) to Christ," but uses the milder term, "in . . . law," responsible to law. Christ was responsible to the law for us, so that we are no longer responsible to it (Galatians, 3. 13, 26), but to Him, as the members to the Head (ch. 7. 23; Romans, 8. 1-4; 1 Peter, 2. 16). Christians serve Christ in newness of spirit, no longer in oldness of the letter (i.e., the old external law as such), Romans, 7. 6-8. To Christ, as man's Head, the Father, has properly delegated His authority (John, 8. 21, 27); whence here he substitutes "Christ" for "God" in the second clause, "not without law to God, but under the law to Christ." The law of Christ is the law of love (Galatians, 6. 2; cf. 6. 13). 23. gain the weak—i.e., establish, instead of being a stumblingblock to, inexperienced Christians (ch. 8. 7). Romans, 14. 1, "Weak in the faith." ALFORD thinks the "weak" are not Christians at all, for these have been already "won"; but those outside the church, who are yet "without strength" to believe (Romans, 8. 6. But when "weak" Christians are by the condescending love of stronger brethren kept from falling from faith, they are well said to be "gained" or won, by all means . . . some. The gain of even "some" is worth the expenditure of "all means." He conformed himself to the feelings of each in the several classes, that out of them all he might gain some. 23. partaker thereof—Greek, "fellow-partaker" of the gospel blessings promised at Christ's coming; "with" (not as English Version, "you" but them, viz., with those thus "gained" by me to the gospel. 24. Know ye not?—The Isthmian games, in which the foot race was a leading one, were of course well known, and a subject of patriotic pride to the Corinthians who lived in the immediate neighbourhood. These periodical games were to the Greeks rather a passion than a mere amusement; hence their suitability as an image of Christian earnestness. In a race—Greek, "in a race course." all—one—Although we knew that one alone could be saved, still it would be well worth our while to run. [BENGL.] Even in the Christian race not "all" who enter on the race win (ch. 10. 1-6). So run, that ye may obtain—said parenthetically. These are the words in which the instructors of the young in the exercise schools (gymnasia) and the spectators on the race-course exhorted their pupils to stimulate them to put forth all exertions. The gymnasium was a prominent feature in every Greek city. Every candidate had to take an oath that he had been ten months in training, and that he would violate none of the regulations (2 Timothy, 2. 5; cf. 1 Timothy, 4. 7, 8). He lived on a strict self-denying diet, refraining from wine and pleasant foods, and enduring cold and heat and most laborious discipline. The "prize" awarded by the judge or umpire was a chaplet of green leaves; at the Isthmus, those of the indigenous pine, for which parsley leaves were temporarily substituted (v. 25). The Greek for "obtain" is fully obtain. It is in vain to begin, unless we persevere to the end (Matthew, 10. 22; 24. 13; Revelation, 2. 16). The "so" expresses, run with such perseverance in the heavenly course, as "all" the runners exhibit in the earthly "race" just spoken of: to the end that ye may obtain the prize. 25. strive—in wrestling; a still more severe contest than the foot race. It tempers—So Paul exercised self-denial, abstaining from claiming assistance for the sake of the "reward," viz., to "gain the more" (v. 18, 19). corruptible—soon withering, as being only of fir-leaves taken from the fir-groves which surrounded the Isthmian race-course or stadium. Insuperable—(1 Peter, 1. 4; Revelation, 2. 16). "Crown" here is not that of a king (which is expressed by a different Greek word, viz., "diadem"), but a wreath or garland. 26. I—Return to his main subject, his own self-denial, and his motive in it. run, set as uncertainly—not as a runner uncertain of the goal. Ye Corinthians gain no end in your entering idol temples or eating idol meats. But I, for my part, in all my acts, whether in my becoming "all things to all men," or in receiving no sustenance from my converts, have a definite end in view, viz., to "gain the more." I know what I aim at, and how to aim at it. He who runs with a clear aim, looks straight forward to the goal, makes it his sole aim, casts away every encumbrance (Hebrews, 12. 1, 2), is indifferent to what the bystanders say, and sometimes even a fall only serves to rouse him the more. [BENGL.] set as one that beatech the air—instead of beating the adversary. Alluding to the Sciamachia or sparring (as the school is sham-fight (cf. ch. 14. 9), wherein they struck out into the air as if at an imaginary adversary. The real adversary is Satan acting on us through the flesh. 27. keep under—lit., bruise the face under the eyes, so as to render it black and blue; so to chastise in the most sensitive part. Cf. "mortify the deeds of the body," Romans, 8. 13; also 1 Peter, 2. 11. It is not ascetic fasts or macerations of the body which are here recommended, but the keeping under of our natural self-seeking, so as, like Paul, to lay ourselves out entirely for the great work. my body—the old man and the remainders of lust in my flesh. "My body," so far as by the flesh it opposes the spirit [ERRIT.] (Galatians, 6. 17). Men may be severe to their bodies and yet indulge their lust. Ascetic "neglect of the body" may be all the while a more subtle "satisfying of the flesh" (Colossians, 2. 23). Unless the soul keep under the body, the body will get above the soul. The body may be made a good servant, but is a bad master. bring it into subjection—or bondage, as a slave or servant led away captive; so the Greek, preached—lit., heralded. He keeps up the image from the races. The heralds summoned the candidates for the foot race into the race-course [PLATO, Legg. 8. 833], and placed the crowns on the brows of the conquerors, announcing their names. [BENGL.] They probably proclaimed also the laws of the combat; answering to the preaching of the apostles. [ALFORD.] The Christian herald is also a combatant; in which respect he is distinguished from the herald at the games, a cast-away—falling shamefully of the prize myself, after I have called others to the contest. Rejoiced by God, the Judge of the Christian race, notwithstanding my having, by my preaching, led others to be accepted. Cf. the equivalent term, "reprobate," Jeremiah, 6. 30; 2 Corinthians, 13. 6. St. Paul implies, if such earnest, self-denying watchfulness over himself be needed still, with all his labours for others, to make his own calling sure, much more is the same needed by the Corinthians, instead of their going, as they do, to the extreme limit of Christian liberty.

CHAPTER X.

Ver. 1-33. DANGER OF FELLOWSHIP WITH IDOLATRY ILLUSTRATED IN THE HISTORY OF ISRAEL: SUCH FELLOWSHIP INCOMPATIBLE WITH FELLOWSHIP IN THE LORD'S SUPPER. EVEN LAWFUL THINGS ARE TO BE FORBIDDEN, SO AS NOT TO HURT WEAK BRETHREN. 1. Mo. cxxxv—The oldest MSS. read "FOL."

 ceedingly need to exercise self-denying watchfulness in the use of all your privileges, lest ye be cast church stands in the relation of parent to the church. All—Arrange as the Greek, "Our phasis. Not so much as one of so great a [E.L.] Five times the "all" is repeated, in the of the five favours which God bestowed (Ex. 1-4). Five times, correspondingly, they Moses as God's servant by the miracle of the setting them, and by their being conducted safely through the Red sea: therefore they to be "baptized unto" him (Exodus, 14, 31).

 " is here equivalent to "initiated;" it is commedation to St. Paul's argument to the as; they, it is true, have been "baptized," but ritually were the Israelites of old; if the ptism of the latter availed not to save them doom of just, neither will the actual baptism ner save them. There is a resemblance be-symbols also: for the cloud and sea consist to the other of the two Christian sacraments, supper. St. Paul plainly implies the inwhich was attached to these two sacraments ristians in those days: "an inspired protest ose who lower their dignity, or deny their oise." [ALFORD.] Still he guards against the ome of thinking the mere external possession of privileges will ensure salvation. Moreover there been seven sacraments as Rome o. Paul would have alluded to them, whereas o only the two. He does not mean by "the alike had "the same" spiritual privilege of he manna (cf. v. 17). It was "spiritual meat" or food; because given by the power of God's spirit, not by human labour. [GROTIUS & ALFORD.] Galatians, 4, 29, "born after the Spirit," i.e., supernaturally. Psalm 78, 24, "corn of heaven" (Psalm 105, 40). Rather, "spiritual" in its typical signification, Christ, the true bread of heaven, being signified (John, 6, 32). Not that the Israelites clearly understood the signification; but believers among them would feel that in the type something more was meant; and their implicit and reverent, though indistinct, faith was counted to them for justification, of which the manna was a kind of sacramental seal. "They are not to be heard which feign that the old fathers did look only for transitory promises" (Article vii. Church of England), as appears from this passage (cf. Hebrews, 4, 2). 4. drink—(Exodus, 17, 6.) In Numbers, 20, 8, "the beasts" also are mentioned as having drunk. The literal water typified "spiritual drink," and is therefore so called. spiritual Rock that followed them—rather, "accompanied them."

 Not the literal rock (or its water) "followed" them, as ALFORD explains, as if St. Paul sanctioned the Jews' tradition (Rabbi Solomon on Numbers, 20, 2) that the rock itself, or at least the stream from it, followed the Israelites from place to place (cf. Deuteronomy, 9, 21). But Christ, the "Spiritual Rock" (Psalm 78, 20, 25; Deuteronomy, 32, 4, 15, 18, 20, 31, 37; Isaiah, 28, 16; 1 Peter, 2, 6), accompanied them (Exodus, 33, 15).
 "Followed" implies His attending on them to minister to them; thus, though mostly going before them, He, when occasion required it, followed "behind" (Exodus, 14, 19). He satisfied all alike as to their bodily thirst whenever they needed it; as on three occasions is expressly recorded (Exodus, 15, 24, 25; 17, 6; Numbers, 20, 8); and this drink for the body symbolised the spiritual drink from the Spiritual Rock (cf. John, 4, 13, 14; see Note, v. 3). 5. But—Though they had so many tokens of God's presence, many of them—rather, "the majority of them;" "the whole part." All except Joshua and Caleb of the first generation, not—in the Greek emphatically standing in the beginning of the sentence: "Not," as one might have naturally expected, "with the more part of them was," &c. God—whose judgment alone is valid. For—the event shewed, they had not pleased God, overthrown—lit. strewn in heaps. in the wilderness—far from the land of promise.
 6. were—Greek, "came to pass as." our examples—samples to us of what will befall us, if we also with all our privileges walk carelessly. Just—the fountain of all the four other offences enumerated, and therefore put first (James, 1, 14, 15; cf. Psalm, 109, 14). A particular case of just was that after flesh, when they pined for the fish, leeks, &c., of Egypt, which they had left (Numbers, 11, 4, 33, 34). These are included in the "evil things," not that they are so in themselves, but they became so to the Israelites when they lusted after what God withheld, and were discontented with what God provided. 7. idolaters—A case in point. As the Israelites sat down (a deliberate act), ate, and drank at the idol feast to the calves in Horeb, so the Corinthians were in danger of idolatry by a like act, though not professedly worshipping an idol as the Israelites (ch. 8, 10, 11; 10, 14, 20, 21; Exodus, 32, 6). He passes here from the first to the second person, as they alone (not he also) were in danger of idolatry, &c. He resumes the first person appropriately at the 16th verse. some—The multitude follow the lead of some bad men, play—with lascivious dancing, singing, and drumming round the calf (cf. "rejoiced," Acts, 7, 41). 8. fornication —lit. Fornication was generally, as in this case (Numbers, 25), associated at the idol feasts with spiritual fornication, i.e., idolatry. This all applied to the Corinthians (ch. 5, 1, 9; 6, 9, 15, 18; ch. 8, 10). Balaam tempted Israel to both sins with Midian (Revelation, 2, 14).
 Cf. ch. 8, 7, 9, "stumblingblock," &c. ... things offered unto...idol." three and twenty thousand.—In Numbers, 25, 9, "twenty and four thousand." If this were a real discrepancy, it would militate rather against inspiration of the subject matter and thought, than against verbal inspiration. The solution is: Moses in Numbers includes all who died "in the plague;" St. Paul, all who died "in one day;" 1000 more may have fell next day. [KITTO, Biblical Cyclopaedia.] Or, the real number may have been 23,000 and 24,000, say 23,500, or 23,600; when writing generally where the exact figures were not needed, one writer might quite veraciously give one of the two round numbers near the exact one, and the other writer the other. [BENGEL.] Whichever be the true way of reconciling the seeming discrepant statements, at least the ways given above prove they are not really irreconcilable. 9. tempt Christ.—So the oldest versions, Irenaeus (264.), and good MSS. read. Some of the oldest MSS. read "Lord," and one MS. only, "God." If "Lord" be read, it will mean Christ. As "Christ" was referred to in one of the five privileges of Israel (v. 4), so it is natural that He should be mentioned here in one of the five corresponding sins of that people. In Numbers, 21, 5, it is "spoke against God" (whence probably arose the alteration in the one MS., 1 Corinthians, 10, 9, "God," to harmonize it with Numbers, 21, 5). As either "Christ" or "Lord" is the genuine reading, "Christ" must be "God." Cf. "Why do ye tempt the Lord?" Exodus, 17, 2, 7. Cf. Romans, 14, 11, with Isaiah, 45, 22, 23. Israel's discontented complainings were temptings of Christ especially, the "Angel" of the covenant (Exodus, 23, 20, 21; 32, 34; Isaiah, 63, 9). Though they drank of "that Rock... Christ" (v. 4), they yet complained for want of water (Exodus, 17, 2, 7). Though also eating the same spiritual meat (Christ, "the true manna," "the bread of life"), they yet murmured. "Our soul loatheth this life bread." In this case, being punished by the fiery serpents, they were saved by the brazen serpent, the emblem of Christ (cf. John, 8, 56; Hebrews, 11, 26). The Greek for "tempt" means, tempt or try, so as to wear out the long-suffering of Christ (cf. Psalm, 95, 8, 9; Numbers, 14, 22). The Corinthians were in danger of provoking God's long-suffering by walking on the verge of idolatry, through overweening confidence in their knowledge. 10. some of them...murmured—upon the death of Korah and his company, who themselves were murmurers (Numbers, 16, 41, 49). Their murmurs against Moses and Aaron were virtually murmurs against God (cf. Exodus, 10, 8, 10). St. Paul herein glances at the Corinthian murmurs against himself, the apostle of Christ, destroyed—14,700 perished, the destroyer—THE same destroying angel sent by God as in Exodus, 12, 23, and 2 Samuel, 24, 16. 11. Now...these things...ensamples—resuming the thread of v. 6. The oldest MSS. read, "by way of example," the ends of the world—lit., "of the ages;" the New Testament dispensation in its successive phases (plural, "ends") being the winding up of all former "ages." No new dispensation shall appear till Christ comes as Avenger and Judge; till then the "ends" being many include various successive periods (cf. Hebrews, 9, 26). As we live in the last dispensation, which is the consummation of all that went before, our responsibilities are the greater; and the greater is the guilt. St. Paul implies, to the Corinthians, which they incur if they fall short of their privileges. 12. thinketh he standeth—stands and thinks that he stands [BENGEL]; i.e., stands "by faith" "well pleasing" to God: in contrast to v. 5, "with many of them God was not well pleased" (Romans, 14, 20). Fall—from his place in the church of God (cf. v. 8, "fell"). Both temporally and spiritually (Romans, 14, 4). Our security, so far as relates to God, consists in faith; so far as relates to ourselves, it consists in fear. 13. Consolation to them under their temptation: it is none but such as is "common to man," or "such as man can bear," adapted to man's powers of endurance." (WARR.) faithful—Psalm 125, 3; Isaiah, 27, 3, 8; Revelation, 3, 10.) "God is faithful" to the covenant which He made with you in calling you [1 Thessalonians, 5, 24]. To be led into temptation is distinct from running into it, which would be "tempting God" (v. 9; Matthew, 4, 7). way to escape—Jeremiah, 39, 11; 2 Peter, 2, 9.) The Greek is, "the way of escape;" the appropriate way of escape in each particular temptation: not an immediate escape, but one in due time, after patience has had her perfect work (James, 1, 2-4, 12). He "makes" the way of escape simultaneously with the temptation which His providence permissively arranges for His people, to bear it—Greek, to bear up under it, or against it. Not, He will take it away [2 Corinthians, 12, 7-9, 14]. Resuming the argument, v. 7; ch. 8, 9, 10. flee—do not tamper with it by doubtful acts, such as eating idol meats on the plea of Christian liberty. The only safety is in scholily shunning whatever borders on idolatry [3 Corinthians, 6, 10, 17]. The Holy Spirit herein also presently warned the church against the idolatry, subsequently transferred from the idol feast to the Lord's supper itself, in the signment of transubstantiation. 15. Appeal to their own powers of judgment to weigh the force of the argument that follows: viz., that as the partaking of the Lord's supper involves a partaking of the Lord himself, and the partaking of the Jewish sacrificial meats involved a partaking of the altar of God, and, as the heathens sacrifice to devils, to partake of an idol feast is to have fellowship with devils. We cannot divest ourselves of the responsibility of "judging" for ourselves. The weakness of private judgment is not an argument against its use, but its abuse. We should the more take pains in searching the infallible word, with every aid within our reach, and above all with humble prayer for the Spirit's teaching (Acts, 17, 11). If St. Paul, an inspired apostle, not only permits, but urges, men to judge his sayings by Scripture, much more should the fallible ministers of the present visible church do so. "To wise men," refers with a mixture of irony to the Corinthian boast of "wisdom" (ch. 4, 40; 2 Corinthians, 11, 19). Here you have an opportunity of exercising your "wisdom" in judging "what I say." 16. The cup of blessing—Answering to the Jewish "cup of blessing," over which thanks were offered in the Passover. It was in doing so that Christ instituted this part of the Lord's supper (Matthew, 26, 27; Luke, 22, 17, 20). we bless—we, not merely ministers, but also the congregation. The minister "blesses" (i.e., consecrates with blessing) the cup, not by any priestly transmitted authority of his own, but as representative of the congregation, who virtually through him bless the cup. The consecration is the corporate act of the whole church. The act of joint blessing by him and them (not "the cup" itself, which, as also "the bread," in the Greek is in the accusative, and the consequent drinking of it together, constitute the communion, i.e., the joint participation "of the blood of Christ." Cf. v. 18, "They who eat...are partakers" (joint communicants), &c. "Is" in both cases in this verse is literal, not represents. He who with faith partakes of the cup and the bread, partakes really but spiritually of the blood and body of Christ (Ephesians, 5, 30, 32), and of the benefits of His sacrifice on the cross (cf. v. 18). In contrast to this is to have "fellowship with devils" (v. 20). ALFORD explains, "The cup...is the [joint] participation (i.e., that whereby the act of participation takes place) of the blood," &c. It is the seal of our living union with, and a means of our partaking of, Christ as our Saviour (John, 6, 53-57). It is not said, "The cup...is the blood," or "the bread...is the body," but "is the communion (joint-participation) of the blood...body." If the bread be changed into the literal body of Christ, e is the sign of the sacrament? Romanists eat a "in remembrance of Himself." To drink literal would have been an abomination to Jews, which 1st Christians were (Leviticus, 17, 11, 19). Break the bread was part of the act of consecrating it, for was represented the crucifixion of Christ's body (1 Corinthians, 11, 24). The distinct specification of bread and the wine disproves the Romish doctrine of concomitancy, and exclusion of the laity from the

17. one bread—rather, "loaf." One loaf alone is to have been used in each celebration. and one—Omit "and;" "one loaf (that is, one body.)" The many (viz., believers assembled; so the Greek), one bread (by our partaking of the same loaf, it becomes assimilated to the substance of all our selves; and so we become), one body" (with Christ, as with one another), we, all—Greek, "the whole." 18. Israel after the flesh—the literal, as distinguished from the spiritual, Israel (Romans, 2, 29; 4, 2; Galatians, 4, 29). partakers of the altar—and so of, whose is the altar: they have fellowship in and His worship, of which the altar is the symbol. What say I then?—The inference might be drawn from the analogies of the Lord's supper and Jewish feasts, that an idol is really what the heathen thought be, a god, and that in eating idol meats they had communion with the god. This verse guards against an inference: "What would I say then; that a thing offered to an idol is any real thing (in the sense that heathen regard it), or that an idol is any real thing?" (The oldest MSS. read the words in this order: by "Nay;") "But (I say) that the things which Gentiles sacrifice, they sacrifice to devils" (demons). Paul here introduces a new fact. It is true that, said, an idol has no reality in the sense that the heathen regard it, but it has a reality in another sense; hence being under Satan's dominion as "prince of this world," he and his demons are in fact the powers opposed by the heathen, whether they are or are unconscious of it (Deuteronomy, 32, 17; Leviticus, 17, 7; Chronicles, 11, 15; Psalm 106, 37; Revelation, 9, 20). "idol" is in the Greek restricted to Satan, "demons" a term applied to his subordinate evil spirits, rather than love, is the motive of heathen worship, the English word "panic," from PAN, whose horns and cloven hoofs gave rise to vulgar representations of Satan which prevail; just as fear is the spirit of Satan and his demons (1 Cor. 2, 19). I would not that ye... have fellowship with devils—by partaking of idol feasts (ch. 5, 10, 21, 22, 23, &c.—really and spiritually; though ye may hardly (1 Kings, 18, 20). cup of devils—in contrast with the cup of the Lord. At idol feasts libations were made from the cup to the idol first, and then guests drank; so that in drinking they had fellowship with the idol. The Lord's table—The Lord's supper is a feast on a table, not a sacrifice on an altar. Only altar is the cross, our only sacrifice that of Christ once for all. The Lord's supper stands, however, in the same relation, analogically, to Christ's sacrifice, as the Jews' sacrificial feasts did to their feasts (cf. Malachi, 1, 7, "altar," table of the Lord), and the heathen idol feasts to their idolatrous feasts (Isaiah, 65, 11). The heathen sacrifices were offered to idol nonentities, behind which Satan lurked. Jew's sacrifice was but a shadow of the substance which was to come. Our one sacrifice of Christ is the substantial reality; therefore, whilst the partaker of Jew's sacrificial feast partook rather "of the substance" (1 Cor. 18) than of God manifested fully, and the heathen idol-feaster had fellowship really with demons, our communicant in the Lord's supper has in it a real union of, or fellowship in, the body of Christ sacrificed, and now exalted as the Head of redeemed humanity. 22. Do we provoke the Lord to jealousy

—by dividing our fellowship between Him and idols (Ezekiel, 20, 29). Is it our wish to provoke Him to assert His power? Deuteronomy, 32, 21, is before the apostle's mind [ALFORD] (Exodus, 20, 5). are we stronger?—that we can risk a contest with Him, 23. All things are lawful for me, &c.—Recurring to the Corinthian plea (ch. 6, 12), he repeats his qualification of it. The oldest MSS. omit both times "for me," edily not—tend not to build up the spiritual temple, the church, in faith and love. St. Paul does not appeal to the apostolic decision (Acts, 15), which seems to have been not so much regarded outside of Palestine, but rather to the broad principle of true Christian freedom, which does not allow us to be governed by external things, as though, because we may use them, we must use them (ch. 6, 12). Their use or non-use is to be regulated by regard to edification. 24. (Verse 23; ch. 12, 5; Romans, 15, 1, 2.) 25. shambles—butchers' stalls; the flesh-market, asking no question—whether it has been offered to an idol or not. for conscience' sake—If on asking you should hear it had been offered to idols, a scruple would arise in your conscience which was needless, and never would have arisen had you asked no questions. 26. The ground on which such eating without questioning is justified is, the earth and all its contents ("the fulness thereof," Psalm 20, 1; 60, 12), including all meats, belong to the Lord, and are appointed for our use; and where conscience suggests no scruple, all are to be eaten (Romans, 14, 14, 20; 1 Timothy, 4, 4, 5; cf. Acts, 10, 15). 27. ye be disposed to go—tacitly implying, they would be as well not to go, but yet not forbidding them to go (v. 9). [GROTIUS] The feast is not an idol feast, but a general entertainment at which, however, there might be meat that had been offered to an idol. for conscience' sake—See Note, v. 25. 28. if any man—a weak Christian at table, wishing to warn his brother, offered in sacrifice unto idols—The oldest MSS. omit "unto idols." At a heathen's table the expression, offensive to him, would naturally be avoided, for conscience' sake—not to cause a stumbling-block to the conscience of thy weak brother (ch. 8, 10-12). for the earth is the Lord's, &c.—Not in the oldest MSS. 29. Conscience... of the other—the weak brother introduced in v. 25. for why is my liberty judged of another man's conscience?—St. Paul passes to the first person, to teach his converts by putting himself as it were in their position. The Greek terms for "the other" and "another" are distinct. "The other" is the one with whom St. Paul's and his Corinthian converts' concern is; "another," is any other with whom he and they have no concern. If a guest know the meat to be idol meat whilst I know it not, I have "liberty" to eat without being condemned by his "conscience." [GROTIUS.] Thus the "for," &c., is an argument for v. 27, "Eat, asking no questions." Or, "Why should I give occasion by the rash use of my liberty that another should condemn it [ESTIUS], or that my liberty should cause the destruction of my weak brother?" [MEMORICUS.] Or, the words are those of the Corinthian objector (perhaps used in their letter, and so quoted by St. Paul), "Why is my liberty judged by another's conscience? why should not I be judged only by my own, and have liberty to do whatever it sanctions? St. Paul replies in v. 31. Your doing so ought always to be limited by regard to what most tends "to the glory of God." [VATABLUS, CONYBEARE & HOWSON]. The first explanation is simplest: the "for," &c., in it refers to "not thine own" (i.e., "not my own," in St. Paul's change to the first person); I am to abstain only in the case of liability to offend another's conscience; in cases where my own has no scruple, I am not bound, in God's judgment, by any other conscience than my own. 30. For—The oldest MSS. omit "for," by grace—rather, "thankfully" [ALFORD.] I... be partaker—I partake of the food set before me. evil spoken of—by him who does not use his liberty, but will eat nothing without scrupulosity and questioning whence the meat comes. give thanks—which consecrates all the Christian's acts (Romans, 14. 6; 1 Timothy, 4. 3, 4). 31. Contrast Zechariah, 7. 6, the picture of worldly men. The godly may "eat and drink," and it shall be well with him (Jeremiah, 22. 15, 16), to the glory of God—(Colossians, 3. 17; 1 Peter, 4. 11)—which involves our having regard to the edification of our neighbour. 32. Give none offence—in things indifferent (ch. 8. 13; Romans, 14. 13; 2 Corinthians, 6. 3); for in all essential things affecting Christian doctrine and practice, even in the smallest detail, we must not swerve from principle, whatever offence may be the result (ch. 1. 23). Giving offence is unnecessary, if our own spirit cause it; necessary, if it be caused by the truth. 33. I please—I try to please (ch. 9. 19, 22; Romans, 15. 2). not seeking mine own—(v. 24.) many—rather as Greek, "the many."

CHAPTER XI.

Ver. 1-34. CENSURE ON DISORDERS IN THEIR ASSEMBLIES: THEIR WOMEN NOT BEING VEILED, AND ABUSES AT THE LOVE FEASTS. 1. Rather belonging to the end of ch. 10, than to this chapter. follows—Greek, "imitators," of Christ—who did not please Himself (Romans, 15. 3); but gave Himself, at the cost of laying aside his Divine glory, and dying as man, for us (Ephesians, 5. 2; Philippians, 2. 4, 8). We are to follow Christ first, and earthly teachers only so far as they follow Christ. 2. Here the chapter ought to begin, ye remember me in all things—in your general practice, though in the particular instances which follow ye fail. ordinances—Greek, "traditions," i.e., apostolic directions given by word of mouth or in writing (v. 23; ch. 15. 3; 2 Thessalonians, 2. 15). The reference here is mainly to ceremonies: for in v. 23, as to the LORD'S SUPPER, which is not a mere ceremony, he says, not merely "I delivered unto you," but also, "I received of the Lord:" here he says only "I delivered to you." Romanists argue hence for oral traditions. But the difficulty is to know what is a genuine apostolic tradition intended for all ages. Any that can be proved to be such ought to be observed; any that cannot, ought to be rejected (Revelation, 22. 18). Those preserved in the written word alone can be proved to be such. 3. The Corinthian women, on the ground of the abolition of distinctions of sexes in Christ, claimed equality with the male sex, and, overstepping the bounds of propriety, came forward to pray and prophesy without the customary head-covering of females. The gospel, doubtless, did raise women from the degradation in which they had been sunk, especially in the East. Yet, whilst on a level with males as to the offer of, and standing in grace (Galatians, 3. 28), their subjection in point of order, modesty, and seamliness, is to be maintained. St. Paul reproves here their unseemliness as to dress: in ch. 13. 34, as to the retiring modesty in public which becomes them. He grounds his reproof here on the subjection of woman to man in the order of creation. the head—an appropriate expression, when he is about to treat of woman's appropriate head-dress in public. of every man ... Christ—(Ephesians, 5. 23.) of ... woman ... man—(v. 8; Genesis, 3. 16; 1 Timothy, 2. 11, 12; 1 Peter, 3. 1, 5, 6.) head of Christ is God—(ch. 3. 23; 15. 27, 28; Luke, 3. 22, 38; John, 14. 28; 20. 17; Ephesians, 3. 9.) "Jesus, therefore, must be of the same essence as God: for, since the man is the head of the woman, and since the head is of the same essence as the body, and God is the head of the Son, it follows the Son is of the same essence as the Father." [S. CHRYSOSTOM.] "The woman is of the essence of the man, and not made by the man; so, too, the Son is not made by the Father, but of the essence of the Father." (THEODORET, t. 3, p. 171.) 4. praying—in public (v. 17). prophesying—breaching in the Spirit (ch. 12. 10). having—i.e., if he were to have: a supposed case to illustrate the impropriety in the woman's case. It was the Greek custom (and so that at Corinth) for men in worship to be uncovered; whereas the Jews wore the Tallith, or veil, to show reverence before God, and their unworthiness to look on him (Isaiah, 6. 2); however, Maimonides (Mishna) excepts cases where (as in Greece) the custom of the place was different. dishonoureth his head—not as ALFORD, "Christ" (v. 3); but literally, as "his head" is used in the beginning of the verse. He dishonours his head (the principal part of the body) by wearing a covering or veil, which is a mark of subjection, and which makes him look downwards instead of upwards to His Spiritual Head, Christ, to whom alone he owes subjection. Why, then, ought not man to wear the covering in token of his subjection to Christ, as the woman wears it in token of her subjection to man? "Because Christ is not seen: the man is seen; so the covering of him who is under Christ is not seen; of her who is under the man, is seen." [BENJEL.] (Cf. v. 7.) 5. woman ... prayeth ... prophesieth—This instance of women speaking in public worship, is an extraordinary case, and justified only by the miraculous gifts which such women possessed as their credentials; for instance, Anna the prophetess and Priscilla (so Acta, 2. 18). The ordinary rule to them is, silence in public (ch. 14. 34, 35; 1 Timothy, 2. 11, 12). Mental receptivity and activity in family life, are recognised Christianity as most accordant with the dignity of woman. This passage does not necessarily sanction women speaking in public, even though possessing miraculous gifts; but simply records what took place at Corinth, without expressing an opinion on it, reserving the censure of it till ch. 14. 34, 35. Even those women endowed with prophecy were designed to exercise their gift, rather in other times and places, than the public congregation. dishonoureth...head—in that she acts against the Divine ordinance and the modest propriety that becomes her: in putting away the veil, she puts away the badge of her subjection to man, which is her true "honour": for through him it connects her with Christ, the head of the man. Moreover, as the head-covering was the emblem of maiden modesty before man (Genesis, 24. 66), and conjugal chastity (Genesis, 29. 16); so, to uncover the head indicated withdrawal from the power of the husband, whence a suspected wife had her head uncovered by the Priest (Numbers, 5. 18). ALFORD takes "her head" to be man, her symbolical, not her literal head; but as it is literal in the former clause, it must be so in the latter one. all one as if ... shaven—As woman's hair is given her by nature, as her covering (v. 15), to cut it off like a man, all admit, would be indecorous: therefore, to put away the head-covering, too, like a man, would be similarly indecorous. It is natural to her to have long hair for her covering: she ought, therefore, to add the other (the wearing of a head-covering) to show that she does of her own will that which nature itself teaches she ought to do, in token of her subjection to man. 6. A woman would not like to be "shorn" or (what is worse) "shaven": but if she chooses to be uncovered (unveiled) in front, let her be so also behind, i.e., "shorn," a shame—an unbecoming thing (cf. v. 13-16). Thus the shaving of nuns is "a shame," 7-9. Argument, also, from man's more immediate relation to God, and the woman's to man. man ... image ... glory of God—being created in God's "image" first, and directly: the woman, subsequently, and indirectly, through the mediation of man. Man is the representative of God's "glory" (this ideal of man being realized most fully in the Son of man) (Psalm 8. 4, 5; cf. 2 Corinthians, 8. 23). Man is declared in Scripture to be both the "image," and in the "likeness," of God (cf. James, 3. 9). But "image" alone is applied to the Son of God (Colossians, 1. 15; cf. Hebrews, 1. 3).

image," Greek, the impress. The Divine Son only "like" God, He is God of God, "being of one (essence) with the Father." [NICENE woman ... glory of ... man—He does not say, "image of the man." For the sexes differ: the woman is created in the image of God, the man (Genesis, 1, 26, 27). But as the moon to the sun (Genesis, 37, 9), so woman shines with light direct from God, as with light on man, i. e., in her order in creation; not does not in grace come individually into communion with God; but even here much of edge is mediately given her through man, on is naturally dependent. 8. is of...of—takes from ("out of")...from: referring to woman's nation, "taken out of man" (cf. Genesis, 2, woman was made by God mediately through and God, and, therefore, should wear the id-covering in public worship, in acknowledgment of this subordination to man in the order. The man being made immediately by glory, has no veil between himself and God, RAPUENSIS in Bengel.] 9. Neither—rather? Another argument: The immediate object's creation. "The man was not created for the woman; but the woman for the sake of (Genesis, 2, 18, 21, 22). Just as the church, is made for Christ; and yet in both the natural spiritual creations, the bride, whilst made iderroom, in fulfilling that end, attains her "glory," and brings "shame" and "dishonour" by any departure from it (v. 4, 6). 10. er head—the kerchief: French "couvre-chef," ing, the emblem of "power on her head;" the r being under man's power, and exercising authority under him. St. Paul had before the root-connection between the Hebrew "veil" (Radid), and subjection (Radud), be angels—who are present at our Christian (cf. Psalm 138, 1, "gods," i. e., angels), and the orderly subordination of the several God's worshippers in their respective places rd demeanour and dress of the latter being of that inward humility which angels know it pleasing to their common Lord (ch. 4, 9; 3, 10; Ecclesiastes, 5, 6). HAMMOND quotes n, "Thou standest with angels; thou singest; thou hymnest with them; and yet dost d laughing!" BENGEI explains, "As the in relation to God, so the woman is in relation. God's face is uncovered; angels in his are veiled (Isaiah, 6, 2). Man's face is unroman in his presence is to be veiled. For be so, would, by its indecorousness, offend (Matthew, 18, 10, 31). She, by her weakness, needs their ministry; she ought, therefore, to ore careful not to offend them." 11. Yet r is insulated and independent of the other istian life. [ALFORD.] The one needs the o sexual relation; and in respect to Christ ord), the man and the woman together (or n be dispensed with) realize the ideal of romantically represented by the bride, the church. woman was formed out of (from) the man, man born by means of woman; but all things both man and woman are from God as ce (Romans, 11, 36; 2 Corinthians, 5, 18), nd mutually each on the other, and both on Appeal to their own sense of decorum. a nata God—By rejecting the emblem of sube head-covering, she passes at one leap in sibly beyond both the man and angels. | 14. The fact that nature has provided sd not man, with long hair, proves that man was designed to be uncovered, and woman covered. The Nazarite however, wore long hair lawfully, as being part of a vow sanctioned by God (Numbers, 6, 5). Cf. as to Absalom, 2 Samuel, 14, 26, and Acts, 18, 18, 15, her hair... for a covering—Not that she does not need additional covering. Nay, her long hair shows she ought to cover her head as much as possible. The will ought to accord with nature, [BENGEI.] 16. A summary close to the argument by appeal to the universal custom of the churches. If any... seem—the Greek also means "thinks" (B) (cf. Matthew, 3, 9). If any man chooses (still after all my arguments) to be contentious. If any be contentious and thinks himself right in being so. A reproof of the Corinthians' self-sufficiency and disputatiousness (ch. 1, 20). we—apostles; or we of the Jewish nation, from whom ye have received the gospel, and whose usages in all that is good ye ought to follow: Jewish women veiled themselves when in public, according to Tertullian, [ESTIUS.] The former explanation is best, as the Jews are not referred to in the context; but he often refers to himself and his fellow-apostles, by the expression, "we—us" (ch. 4, 9, 10; 10, 5, 6). as such custom—as that of women praying uncovered. Not as CHRYSOSTOM, &c., "that of being contentious." The Greek term implies a usage, rather than a mental habit (John, 18, 39). The usage of true "churches" (plural; not, as Rome uses it, 'the church,' as an abstract entity; but 'the churches' as a number of independent witnesses) of God" (the churches which God Himself recognises), is a valid argument in the case of external rites, especially, negatively, e.g., Such rites were not received among them, therefore, ought not to be admitted among us: but in questions of doctrine, or the essentials of worship, the argument is not valid [SOLATER] (ch. 7, 17; 14, 53). neither—nor yet. Catholic usage is not an infallible test of truth, but a general test of decency. 17. in this—which follows. I declare—rather, "I enjoin;" that the Greek is always so used. The oldest MSS. read Id., "This I enjoin (you) not praising (you)!" that—inasmuch as: in that you, &c. Here he qualifies his praise (v. 2). "I said that I praised you for keeping the ordinances delivered to you; but I must now give injunctions in the name of the Lord, on a matter in which I praise you not, viz., as to the Lord's supper (v. 23; ch. 14, 37). not for the better—not so as to progress to what is better, for the worse—so as to retrograde to what is worse. The result of such "coming together" must be "condemnation" (v. 34). 18. first of all—in the first place. The "divisions" (Greek, schisms) meant, are not merely those of opinion (ch. 1, 10), but in outward acts at the love feasts (Agape) (v. 21). He does not follow up the expression, "in the first place," by "in the second place." But though not expressed, a second abuse was in his mind when he said, "In the first place," viz., THE ABUSE OF SPIRITUAL GIFTS, which also created disorder in their assemblies [ALFORD] (ch. 12, 1, &c.; 14, 23, 26, 33, 40). in the church—not the place of worship; for Isidore of Pelusius denies that there were such places specially set apart for worship in the apostles' times (Ep. 246, 2). But, "in the assembly" or "congregation;" in convocation for worship, where especially love, order, and harmony should prevail. The very ordinance instituted for uniting together believers in one body, was made an occasion of "divisions" (schisms), partly—He hereby excepts the innocent. "I am unwilling to believe all I hear, but some I cannot help believing" [ALFORD]; whilst my love is unaffected by it. [BENGEI.] 19. heresies—Not merely "schisms" or "divisions" (v. 18), which are "recent dissensions of the congregation through differences of opinion" (Augustin Con. Crescon. Don. 2, 7, quoted by French Synonyms, New Testament), but also "heresies," i. e., "schisms which have now become irreparable;" "Secta" [CAMPELL, vol. 2., p. 136, 137].

so Acts, 5, 17; 15, 5, translate the same Greek. At present there were dissensions at the love feasts; but St. Paul, remembering Jesus' words (Matthew, 18, 7; 24, 10, 12; Luke, 17, 1), foresees "there must be (come) also" matured separations, and established parties in secession, as separatists. The "must be" arises from sin in professors necessarily bearing its natural fruits: these are overruled by God to the probation of character of both the godly and the ungodly, and to the discipline of the former for glory. "Heresies" had not yet its technical sense ecclesiastically, referring to doctrinal errors; it means confirmed schisms. St. Augustine's rule is a golden one as regards questions of heresy and catholicity: "In doubtful questions, liberty; in essentials, unity; in all things, charity." that ... approved may be made manifest—through the disapproved (reprobates) becoming manifested (Luke, 2, 25; 1 John, 2, 19). 20. Wass ... therefore—Resuming the thread of discourse from v. 18, this is not to—rather, "there is no such thing as eating the Lord's supper": it is not possible where each is greedily intent only on devouring; "his own supper," and some are excluded altogether, not having been waited for (v. 22, where some are "drunken," whilst others are "hungry" (v. 21). The love feast usually preceded the Lord's supper (as eating the Passover came before the Lord's supper at the first institution of the latter). It was a club-feast, where each brought his portion, and the rich, extra portions for the poor; from it the bread and wine were taken for the Eucharist; and it was at it that the excesses took place, which made a true celebration of the Lord's supper during or after it, with due discernment of its solemnity, out of the question. 21. one taketh before other—The rich "before" the poor, who had no supper of their own. Instead of "tarrying for one another" (v. 22); hence the precept (ch. 12, 21, 25). his own supper—"His own" belly is his God (Philippians, 3, 19; "the Lord's supper," the spiritual feast never enters his thoughts. drunken—The one has more than is good for him, the other less. [BENONI]. 22. What!—Greek, For, houses—(cf. v. 24)—"at home." That is the place to satiate the appetite, not the assembly of the brethren. [ALFORD.] despise ye the church of God—the congregation mostly composed of the poor, whom "God hath chosen," however ye show contempt for them (James, 2, 4; cf. "of God" here, marking the true honour of the church. *shame them that have not—viz., houses to eat and drink in, and who, therefore, ought to have received their portion at the love feasts from their wealthier brethren. I praise you not—resuming the words (v. 17). 23. His object is to show the unworthiness of such conduct from the dignity of the holy supper. I—Emphatic in the Greek. It is not my own invention, but the Lord's institution. received of the Lord—by immediate revelation (Galatians, 1, 12; cf. Acts, 22, 17, 18; 2 Corinthians, 12, 1-4). The renewal of the institution of the Lord's supper by special revelation to St. Paul, enhances its solemnity. The similarity between St. Luke's and St. Paul's account of the institution, favours the supposition that the former drew his information from the apostle, whose companion in travel he was. Thus, the undesigned coincidence is a proof of genuineness. night—the time fixed for the Passover (Exodus, 12, 6; though the time for the Lord's supper is not fixed. betrayed—With the traitor at the table, and death present before His eyes, He left this ordinance as His last gift to us, to commemorate His death. Though about to receive such an injury from man, He gave this pledge of His amazing love to man. 24. *break—the breaking of the bread involves its distribution, and reproves the Corinthian mode at the love feast, of "every one taking before other his own supper." my body ... broken for you — "Given" (Luke, 22, 19) for you (Greek, in your behalf), and "broken," so as to be distributed among you. The oldest MSS. omit "broken," leaving it to be supplied from "break." The two old versions, Memphitic and Thebaic, read for Luke, "given." The literal "body" could not have been meant; for Christ was still sensibly present among his disciples when he said, "This is my body." They could only have understood Him symbolically and analogically: As this bread is to your bodily health, so my body is to the spiritual health of the believing communicant. The words, "Take, eat," are not in the oldest MSS. 25. when he had supped—Greek, "after the eating of supper," viz., the Passover supper which preceded the Lord's supper, as the love feast did subsequently. Therefore, you Corinthians ought to separate common meals from the Lord's supper. [BENONI.] the new testament—or "covenant." The cup is the parchment-deed, as it were, on which my new covenant, or last will is written and sealed, making over to you all blessings here and hereafter. in my blood—ratified by MY blood; "not by the blood of goats and calves" (Hebrews, 9, 13). as oft as—Greek, as many times sever; implying that it is an ordinance often to be partaken of. in remembrance of me—St. Luke expresses this, which is understood by St. Matthew and St. Mark. St. Paul twice records it as suiting his purpose. The old sacrifices brought sins continually to remembrance (Hebrews, 10, 1, 2). The Lord's supper brings to remembrance Christ and His sacrifice once for all for the full and final remission of sins. 26. For—In proof that the Lord's supper is "in remembrance" of Him. show—announce publicly. The Greek does not mean to dramatically represent, but "ye publicly profess each of you, the Lord has died FOR ME." [WABL.] This word, as "is" in Christ's institution (v. 24, 25), implies not literal presence, but a veridical realization, by faith, of Christ in the Lord's supper, as a living person, not a mere abstract dogma, "bone of our bone, and flesh of our flesh" (Ephesians, 5, 30; cf. Genesis, 2, 23; and ourselves "members of His body, of His flesh, and of His bones," "our sinful bodies made clean by His body (once for all offered), and our souls washed through His most precious blood." [Church of England Prayer Book.] "Show," or "announce," is an expression applicable to new things; cf. "show" as to the Passover, Exodus, 13, 8. So the Lord's death ought always to be fresh in our memory; cf. in heaven, Revelation, 5, 6. That the Lord's supper is in remembrance of Him, implies that he is bodily absent, though spiritually present, for we cannot be said to commemorate one absent. The fact that we not only show the Lord's death in the supper, but eat and drink the pledges of it, could only be understood by the Jews, accustomed to such feasts after propitiatory sacrifices, as implying our personal appropriation therein of the benefits of that death, till he come—when there shall be no longer need of symbols of His body, the body itself being manifested. The Greek expresses the certainty of His coming. Rome teaches that we eat Christ present corporally. "till He come" corporally: a contradiction in terms. The showbread, lit., bread of the presence, was in the sanctuary, but not in the Holiest place (Hebrews, 9, 1-3); so the Lord's supper in heaven, the antitype to the Holiest place, shall be superseded by Christ's own bodily presence: then the wine shall be drunk "anew" in the Father's kingdom, by Christ and His people together, of which heavenly banquet, the Lord's supper is a spiritual foretaste and specimen (Matthew, 26, 29). Meantime, as the showbread was placed anew, every Sabbath, on the table before the Lord (Leviticus, 24, 5-8); so the Lord's death was shown, or announced afresh at the Lord's table the first day of every week in the primitive church. We are now "priest's unto God" in the dispensation of Christ's spiritual presence, antitypical to the HOLY PLACE: the perfect and eternal dispensation, which shall not begin till Christ's coming, is antitypical to the HOLIEST PLACE, which Christ our High Priest alone in the flesh as yet has entered (Hebrews, 9, 8, 7); but which, at his coming, we, too, who are believers, shall enter (Revelation, 7, 15; 21, 22). The supper joins the two closing periods of the Old and the New dispensations. The first and second comings are considered as one coming, whence the expression is not "return," but "come" (cf., however, John, 14, 3). 27. eat and drink—So one of the oldest MSS. reads. But three or four equally old MSS., the Vulgate and Cyprian, read, "or." Romanists quote this reading in favour of communion in one kind. This consequence does not follow. St. Paul says, Whosoever is guilty of unworthy conduct, either in eating the bread, or in drinking the cup, is guilty of the body and blood of Christ. Improperly in only one of the two elements, vitiate true communion in both. Therefore, in the end of the verse, he says, not "body or blood," &c., but "body and blood." Any who takes the bread without the wine, or the wine without the bread, "unworthily" communicates, and so "is guilty of Christ's body and blood;" for he disobeys Christ's express command to partake of both. If we do not partake of the sacramental symbol of the Lord's death worthily, we share in the guilt of that death. Cf., "crucify to themselves the Son of God afresh," Hebrews, 6, 6. Unworthiness in the person, is not what ought to exclude any, but unworthily communicating: However unworthy we be, if we examine ourselves so as to find that we penitently believe in Christ's gospel, we may worthily communicate. 28. examine—Greek, prove, or test, his own state of mind in respect to Christ's death, and his capability of "discerning the Lord's body" (v. 29, 31). Not auricular confession to a priest, but self-examination is necessary. so—after due self-examination, of... of—In v. 27, where the receiving was unworthily, the expression was, "eat this bread, drink... cup" without "of." Here, the "of" implies due discernment in communicating. [BENGEL.] let him eat—His self-examination is not in order that he may stay away, but that he may eat, i.e., communicate. 29. damnation—A mistranslation which has put a stumblingblock in the way of many in respect to communicating. The right translation is "judgment." The judgment is described (v. 30-32) as temporal, not discerning—not duly judging; not distinguishing in judgment (so the Greek: the sin and its punishment thus being marked as corresponding) from common food, the sacramental pledges of the Lord's body. Most of the oldest MSS. omit "Lord's," see v. 27. Omitting also "unworthily," with most of the oldest MSS., we must translate, "He that eateth and drinketh, eateth and drinketh judgment to himself, if he discern not the body" (He, 10, 29). The church is "the body of Christ" (ch. 12, 27): The Lord's body is His literal body appreciated and discerned by the soul in the faithful receiving, and not present in the elements themselves. 30. weak, sickly—He is "weak" who has naturally no strength; "sickly," who has lost his strength by disease. [TITM. Synonyms] sleep—are being lulled in death: not a violent death; but one the result of sickness, sent as the Lord's chastening for the individual's salvation, the mind being brought to a right state on the sick-bed (v. 31). 31, if we would judge ourselves—Most of the oldest MSS. read "But," not "For." Translate also lit., "If we duly judged ourselves, we should not be (or not have been) judged," i.e., we should escape (or have escaped) our present judgments. In order to duly judge or "discern (appreciate) the Lord's body," we need to "duly judge ourselves." A present warning against the dogma of priestly absolution after full confession, as the necessary preliminary to receiving the Lord's supper. 32. chastened—(Revelation, 3, 19.) with the world—who, being bastards, are without chastening (Hebrews, 12, 8). 33.

Tarry one for another—In contrast to v. 31. The expression is not, "Give a share to one another," for all the viands brought to the feast were common property, and, therefore, they should "tarry" till all were met to partake together of the common feast of fellowship. [THEOPHYL.] 34. if any...hunger—so as not to be able to "tarry for others," let him take off the edge of his hunger at home [ALFORD] (v. 22). the rest—the other questions you asked me as to the due celebration of the Lord's supper." Not other questions in general; for he does subsequently set in order other general questions in this epistle.

CHAPTER XII.

VER. 1-31. THE USE AND THE ABUSE OF SPIRITUAL GIFTS, ESPECIALLY PROPHECYING AND TONGUES. This is the second subject for correction in the Corinthian assemblies: the "first" was discussed (ch. 11, 18-34). 1. spiritual gifts—the signs of the Spirit's continued efficacious presence in the church, which is Christ's body, the complement of His incarnation, as the body is the complement of the head. By the love which pervades the whole, the gifts of the several members, forming reciprocal complements to each other, tend to the one object of perfecting the body of Christ. The ordinary and permanent gifts are comprehended together with the extraordinary, without distinction specified, as both alike flow from the Divine indwelling Spirit of life. The extraordinary gifts, so far from making professors more peculiarly spiritual, than in our day, did not always even prove that such persons were in a safe state at all (Matthew, 7, 22). They were needed at first in the church, (1.) as a pledge to Christians themselves who had just passed over from Judaism or heathendom, that God was in the church; (2.) for the propagation of Christianity in the world; (3.) for the edification of the church. Now that we have the whole written New Testament, which they had not, and Christianity established as the result of the miracles, we need no further miracle to attest the truth. So the pillar of cloud which guided the Israelites was withdrawn when they were sufficiently assured of the Divine presence, the manifestation of God's glory being thenceforward enclosed in the Most Holy place. [ARCHBISHOP WHATLEY.] St. Paul sets forth in order, I. The unity of the body (v. 1-27). II. The variety of its members and functions (v. 27-30). III. The grand principle for the right exercise of the gifts, viz., love (v. 31, and ch. 13.). IV. The comparison of the gifts with one another (ch. 14.). I would not have you ignorant—with all your boasts of "knowledge" at Corinth. If ignorant now, it will be your own fault, not mine (ch. 14, 38). 2. (Ephesians, 2, 11.) that ye were—The best MSS. read, "That when ye were," thus "ye were" must be supplied before "carried away"—Ye were bodily transported hither and thither at the will of your false guides, these dumb idols—Greek, "the idols which are dumb" contrasted with the living God who "speaks" in the believer by his Spirit (v. 3, &c.). This gives the reason why the Corinthians needed instruction as to spiritual gifts, viz., their past heathen state, wherein they had no experience of intelligent spiritual powers. When blind, ye went to the dumb, as ye were led.—The Greek is, rather, "as ye might (happen to) be led," viz., on different occasions. The heathen oracles led their votaries at random, without any definite principle. 3. The negative and positive criteria of inspiration by the Spirit—the rejection or confession of Jesus as Lord [ALFORD] (1 John, 4, 2; & 1). St. Paul gives a test of truth against the Gentiles; St. John against the false prophets. by the Spirit—rather, as Greek, "in the Spirit," that being the power pervading him, and the element in which he speaks [ALFORD] (Matthew, 16, 17; John, 15, 26). of God... Holy—The same Spirit is called at one time, "the Spirit of God," at another, "the Holy Ghost," or
